Kaiser Wilhelm's Life on Board his Yacht, the "Hohenzollern"—He is a Natural Sailor and Loves the Sea—His Splendid Vessel.

CRUISING along the Baltic, the North Sea and the British Channel in his steam yacht, the Hohenzollern, the young Emperor of Germany has spent a considerable portion of the summer, forgetting for the time, the cares of state and the possibilities of European complications, in the pure enjoyment of the free and invigorating ocean breezes. For it cannot be denied that to very many people, life at sea has peculiar charms which can be found nowhere else. Kaiser Wilhelm is a natural lover of the sea and displayed a fondness for it even in boyhood that has increased with the years. Then, too, his ambition to control a great navy and to bring Germany to the front rank among naval powers has led him to devote more attention to seamanship than would otherwise have been the case. Although his imperial yacht, the Hohenzollern is really a formidable steel-built steamer of 4,500 tons, with 9,000 horse power engines and twin screws, and carries eight Krupp guns, he is not averse at times to leaving her spacious and superbly upholstered cabins and saloons and roughing it with a crew of hardy seamen on his yacht Meteor, which is a much smaller and less commodious craft. Indeed, he has been known on different occasions to take his share of the work of handling rope or tiller on the Meteor and to submit with a good grace to the intermittent drenching which every yachtsman expects when his boat points her nose into the passing wave.

But on the Hohenzollern such discomforts need not be encountered. She is a floating palace with splendid suites of rooms for the Emperor and Empress. The photographic reproductions on this page afford an idea of the drawing-room and dining-saloon, but their furnishings are eclipsed by the magnificence of the imperial apartments, which are mostly in maple and rosewood, upholstered with imitation tapestry of subdued colors. The Emperor's study is characteristic of the practical German ruler, being furnished with a telephone, log-book and a full supply of nautical works. In the grey-and-white upholstered dining-saloon (shown in the illustration) the portieres are so arranged that the apartment can be enlarged or contracted at pleasure. On the centre tables, filled with flowers, are several of the cups awarded to the royal yachtsman. In the great saloon, where the family gatherings are held, the decorations are in blue-and-silver, and bright, little water-color sketches lighten up the walls, side by side with photographs of William's sons and daughters. A peep into the Empress' own room reveals a bedstead of nickel, with hangings of grey satin and counterpane of purple wadded silk. Remote from all is the Kaiser-Commodore's private study. Here he has a signalling apparatus which enables him to communicate with any part of the vessel. In this little and almost plainly-furnished snuggery, secure from intrusion, he reads his favorite authors. Like all the German princes, William had the benefit of an excellent religious training, and it is not unlikely that in those hours of solitude on the ocean, the spirit of this modern viking may be lifted up far above thoughts of war and conquest, to nearer communion with Him who makes and unmakes nations and holds the seas in the hollow of His hand.

Woman's Broader Education.

It is claimed by many writers, remarks Emily Rayner in Humanity and Health, that the broader education of woman, absorbing more years for its completion, as the term is used, and increasing her independence, has extended the period of girlhood by at least ten years. The woman of thirty, it is now affirmed, is really no older, and often not as old, as was her grandmother at twenty. At the beginning of this century, and until long after its first quarter had waned, it was no unusual thing for girls of fifteen to marry. To-day a marriage at that tender age is commented upon. The standard of education is so much higher at present, that at fifteen the school days of a young girl, even in moderate circumstances, have hardly begun, and comparatively few now graduate until they have passed their twentieth year. It therefore follows that the period of girlhood must be extended. The great class of cultivated young women are thoughtful of the present and considerate of the future. In no way is the change in womanhood more apparent than in the matter of physical culture and the clothing of the body. The laws of perfect health are now the study of the cultured woman, and through her influence the knowledge of these essential matters are spreading through the great class of life's laborers. The change also affords a greater opportunity for the development of woman's spiritual nature, before she assumes the heavier burdens and cares of life, which when undertaken too young are often so onerous as to be a hindrance to growth of character.

RELIGIOUS FEELINGS OF THE YOUNG.

IN a recent address to young women, Rev. Henry Drummond, the famous writer on morals and religion, says: "I know more about boys than girls, but I find girls exceedingly modest concerning their religious feelings. I think sometimes that they have none. I find that they are disgusted with themselves because the church seems so slow. Don't think yourself a heathen for that; perhaps the fault is not wholly yours. All ministers have not the art of interesting. Don't judge religion from sermons. I find again that they have secret feelings that it's all over with them because they do not love to read the Bible. I have great sympathy with them. Much of the Bible without its historical setting is unintelligible.

"Again, their need has not come. A sailing directory, marking all the little rocks and shoals, is a dry thing on land, but out in the storms at sea, it is the most interesting, the only thing of value. Again, truth is truth, always. At breakfast you had an egg, shell and all; at dinner you had an egg, but it was stirred up in a pudding. It nourished you just as much. So there is a great deal of Bible truth stirred up in modern literature, in poetry, history, biography and fiction. Don't be discouraged if you can't pray by the half hour. A boy should be religious as a boy, not as his grandmother; a girl as a girl. Fruits of youth differ from fruits of old age. Christ does not come alone in churches. He comes in work. As life goes on, other avenues close and we find God in worship."

A Wooden Library.

In these days of cheap printing, hardly a home of any pretensions to comfort or culture is without its library. How odd to American eyes, accustomed to beautifully-bound volumes, must appear the library of the town of Cassel, Germany, which is made up of a singular lot of books. It is a library of 500 volumes—each a perfect book, made of a different kind of wood. The back of each volume is formed of the bark of its peculiar tree, the sides of the wood in its mature state, the top of young, immature wood, and the bottom of the same after having been dried and seasoned. When opened, these remarkable books are found to be without leaves, the inside being a box containing the flower, seed, fruit, and leaf of the tree from which the box-book has been made. Russia employed a cabinetmaker during the entire winter of 1877-78 in making a library of the woods found in the extensive Russian forests. They were classified and arranged for the Russian exhibit at the Paris Expositions of both 1878 and 1889. As in the Cassel library, this Russian wood collection showed the wood in several growths, as well as fruit, leaves, and seeds, either natural or imitated in wax and were very beautiful.

CHAPTER VII.

STARTLING DISCOVERIES.

"MASTER GUY—Master Guy—O it is my own dear boy, it is. O my lamb, do not tell me you do not know me—that you have forgotten your old nurse, Nan, you used to love so well."

Guy, walking along the narrow lane, deep in thought, was startled at finding himself thus addressed by an elderly and poorly dressed woman, who seemed to have run after him, so breathless was her condition, and as he paused in doubt and uncertainty as to what could be the meaning of that strange address, she had found enough breath to recommence.

"What, my bairn—not know your old nurse—when you cried to say good-bye, and vowed you would come across the sea to find me. And your sweet mother in her grave they tell me—alack a day—it is always the sweetest flowers that wither first. I knew she was too much the saint to be long for this world. And to think you should not know me again—and yet you must have changed more than myself."

"But I do know you now," answered Guy, a smile lighting his face, as he held out his hands, and took those of the old nurse in a warm clasp. "Of course I remember our dear old Martha—as if I could ever forget—only you have changed much—or my recollection is fainter than I thought. But, Martha, what brings you here? You did not come to see me, I suppose?"

"I did, and I did not," was the oracular reply. "I came back over the water because my husband wished to spend his old age among his own people, and we have saved enough to keep us in comfort the rest of our lives. But I knew that his home was near to the home of the Dangerfields, and I thought I might chance to see my own boy again, or at least hear tidings of him. O, Master Guy, my dear, what a fine young man you have grown, and the very image of your poor dear dead father, too."

So they tell me: but Martha, I want to know more about yourself. So you married out there, did you? And what is your name now instead of Liston."

"Stapleton, it is. I married a settler out of this very place. It seemed home-like to have a husband who had known and loved my dear master, and we took to one another from the day we found out that we had both known Mr. Guy Dangerfield. And O, my dear, they are all as fond and proud of you as if you had been born and bred among them, and right fierce they are that you have not got the place and the money, and they do say if right was done that you would be lord of everything yet."

"Now, Martha, don't you go and let them put that nonsense into your head. I am a richer man than I ever expected to be, and I have everything I can reasonably wish for, and my cousin has been the best brother and friend a man ever had. I do not like to hear such things said, so if you care for my good opinion, you will not talk in that fashion yourself."

"O yes, just like your father—he never could see or care for his own interests—if he had done, maybe things would be different for you, my dearie. But I can't stop folks' tongues, no more can't you, Master Guy, my dear, and the old grandfather at home, he do vow and declare that there be another will somewhere in the house, which would do you justice. He says he can't rest of a night thinking of it, and wondering what's gone of it."

"Nonsense, Martha, that sort of thing would never happen with a man of my grandfather's methodical habits. Besides it would have been found long ago. Your husband's relations have got hold of some distorted notions. They never liked my uncle or his family, and they are angry to see them back in the old house, and do not take the trouble to conceal their annoyance. That is the long and the short of the whole matter, and it is all folly to talk as if there were something underhand or mysterious going on."

"Well, my Guy, you are welcome to your own opinion, and your father would have said just the same. But if so be as things are as you say—why did the old Squire, just a little while before his death, take the trouble to tell the old man, our grandfather, that he would likely enough live to see Guy's son—them were his very own words—Guy's son reigning at Dangerfield? What did he mean by that, they all ask?"

Guy looked at his old nurse in surprise. "Did he ever say that?"

"Ay, he did. Grandfather has all his wits about him, and there's no danger but what he remembers every word that passed that day. You know he was a kind friend to all my husband's people, though Mr. Charles drove them off the estate, and his proud wife would have nothing to say to any of them—and all, they say, because they loved the rightful heir, and could not abide to see his place filled up. Well, the old Squire with all his harsh ways, liked them none the less for being faithful in their attachment, and he would come down many a time to see them, and sit and chat beside the old man's fire. It wasn't his way in most houses, but he would do it for grandfather."

"For my father's sake, I suppose," said Guy feeling touched; "I suppose he really loved him all along?"

"Loved him—why he loved the very memory of his wildest prank better than all the steady dutiful conduct of his other son. If your father had but come back all would have been right directly—but they were both so eaten up with pride they would neither make the first sign—"

"Yes, yes, I know that. What I want to know is what he said to this grandfather of yours before his death."

"It was but a few weeks before—he was failing fast then, for he had never held up his head since his eldest son had gone away, and had grown white in the head, and quite the old man. Well, it was one of the last times he was ever out alone—Madam, she generally went with him if she could, or sent a servant, for she gave out that he was not well enough to go about unattended: but he got his own way when he had a mind to, and so he came down for a chat with grandfather and they got talking of Mr. Guy, as was their way, and he told him plainly—grandfather did—that he ought to have him home again before he died, so that the old place might not be left without a master."

"What did he say to that? Was he angry?"

"Never a bit of it—he knew it wasn't much good being angry with grandfather, who never cared for his harsh words. He looked at him quite gentle-like, and shook his head and said,

"'Stapleton,' says he, quite quiet like, 'Guy has been dead these many years now.'

"And at that grandfather fairly burst out crying, for though he had half feared it before, he had never heard it put so plain, and whilst he was blubbering for the young master like a bit of a baby, Squire, he put his hand on his knee and patted it quite kindly like, and said very clearly and plainly,

"'Never you mind, old friend,' says he. 'Things are bad, but they might have been worse. You will never see your young master back: but you will live to see his son in his place—Guy's boy will be master of Dangerfield. And I think you will live to see it—for I shall not keep him out much longer.'

"Them is the very words he spake, Mr. Guy, my dear, and I don't see how you can get out of them by hook or by crook. He would never have taken the trouble to say things if they had not been true, for the master never told a lie in his life—that he didn't, and he was dead before two months were over, so he hadn't much time to change his mind, even if that had been his way. So now unless there has been some foul play—and the right will has been made away with, I don't see how we can understand it at all. Someone is keeping you out of your rights, and there is others as is thirsting to see you get them, and willing to fight tooth and nail, if you will but speak the word."

Guy looked very much perplexed. He could not doubt the genuine earnestness of his old nurse, and she had evidently learned the story from the lips of the old man himself: and yet it was difficult to understand the existence of another will which had never been found, and on the whole he found the subject more distasteful than pleasant. He disliked the feeling of being brought into rivalry with Monk: and despite the fierce loyalty of these strange people to his father and himself, he always shrank from them, and disapproved their words and ways. They were the most notorious poachers in the neighborhood, and bore a very bad character all over the place. It was not particularly pleasant to him to be mixed up with them, and he wished that his old nurse had married into another family in the place, if she had to return there to live.

"Well, Martha, if ever my grandfather had made a will in my favor it is very plain that he must have destroyed it upon his death-bed. Most likely he saw, as he came to die, how much more his second son had been to him, and done for him, than ever his eldest had, and he would be wishful to do his family justice at the last. The less talk there is now about this business the better I shall be pleased. You do not seem to understand that it is all very painful to me. I am under immense obligations to my aunt and cousins, and nothing is more disagreeable than to hear people talk as though my eldest cousin and I were rivals, and as though some injustice were being done me. If it is painful to me, it must be ten times more so to them, so if you have any influence with your husband's family, I wish you would exert it for putting down all this foolish gossip. Nothing could possibly be made out in the way of evidence of a few words spoken years and years ago, and the sooner they are forgotten the better. You understand me, I think, Martha: and if you love me still, you will do as I ask."

"Love you—ay, that I do, my darling, love every single bone in your body. Haven't I loved you with all my heart ever since that bitter, bitter winter day, when the snow was falling so fast the doctor couldn't get anigh us till you had been two hours born? And your poor dear father lying dead—and your mother more dead than alive, and 'twas myself that thought I should have to be father and mother in one to you, my beautiful boy—for you was that beautiful even then, though you did come into the world in such a sad time of sorrow. Love you? Ay, that I did and always shall. Who could help loving you, a poor little helpless mite, coming into the world at such a time of trouble?"

Again a look of surprise crossed Guy's face. "Come, come, Martha, you are romancing—I was born in April, three months after my father's death. There could hardly have been such a snow-storm then. You must be dreaming."

"Dreaming, am I?" cried the worthy woman. "Why bless your little heart, did your mother never tell you the truth of it? You were born in the evening of the day your poor father was brought home dead. But your poor mother, bless her for a tender-hearted woman, could never bear that your birthday should be a sad one, and so we kept it always on your Christening day in April. Did she never tell you so? Well, maybe she almost forgot herself, or tried to, poor thing: and what does a few weeks matter one way or the other? Your real birthday is the twenty-first of January, as you will see for yourself if you look in your mother's old Bible." And Martha rambled on with reminiscences of his infancy and very early youth, as old nurses love to do, as Guy walked on as one in a dream, for as if by a lightning flash he seemed to see the whole thing, and to understand what it was that had been puzzling some folks so long.

"Martha," he said, in as negligent a tone as he could assume. "Do you know if my grandfather was ever written to about this?"

"About your father's death, and your birth, do you mean? Why to be sure he was. One of the first things the mistress did when she had strength to hold the pen was to write to tell him everything. She told him all about it. "'It isn't that I want his help—I wrote once to him before, soon after our marriage,' she said, 'to try and make the peace, and he returned me my letter, and wrote across it that he had not the honor of knowing the lady who had addressed him, and that he held no communication with strangers on family matters. After that it is not likely I should expect anything, or even wish for anything from him. But in justice to my child and his, I must let him know what has happened,' and she did. She sent him some certificates—enough to prove to him that the child was his legal heir, and then she felt she had done her duty. No notice was ever taken—she always said she believed her letter was burnt unread: but she never wrote another. I think she was almost afraid of anything coming to part her from her child. I thought as she did till I got here. But when I heard what the old man had said to grandfather—I said then to myself: —'Ah he had the letter after all—he knew his son was dead, and he had done justice to the boy.' But what is the good of all that, when there was them about him as made away with——"

"Silence, Matha," Guy spoke so sternly that his old nurse looked at him in surprise. The bright color had faded from his face, his eyes were burning, and there was a look of conflict in his expression which she saw without understanding. And when he saw her eyes fixed upon his face, he mastered himself by a strong effort and said lightly,

"I do not mean to be savage, but I cannot have my kinsfolk maligned. If there is another will, it must come to light in time; but I am certain it is all a delusion of yours. And now, Martha, do not tell anybody else that I have been wrong all these years about my birthday. You see a fellow feels rather a fool at not knowing his own age: and it is just possible it might get me into trouble, for you see I have been sending in my age for examinations and all that as three months under the right one, and it would be better not to let it be known that I am older then I have always said. You haven't told anybody else, I suppose?"

"Not I. I don't even know as I ever thought of it."

"Well, then, don't—don't say a word to anyone: for people gossip about together, and there is no end to it. I might really get me into a mess, Martha, so I beg you will keep silence. I'm sure you would not like to be the means of getting me into trouble."

"Nay, that I should not," answered Martha. "I'll not say a word to nobody for what does it matter? What difference does three months make to anybody? Don't you be afraid of me letting on it out."

Guy smiled and thanked her, and said he must be leaving her now, though he would not be long in paying her a visit at her own cottage. He felt an imperative need of solitude and silence in which to arrange his thoughts and make up his mind and after leaving Martha, he plunged into the very heart of a deep wood, and flung himself along the ground resting his chin upon his hands.

He saw it all now—all that hinged upon the simple question of the date of his birth. That stern old man who had never forgiven the son in his life-time, had forgiven him after his death, and had made his son his heir—at least so it almost seemed, if old Stapleton's testimony was to be trusted—and yet, as he had another grandson of that name, was it not rather strange that he had held no communication with the widow, telling her what he had done, and putting her in the way of claiming rights that she might never hear of and which no one else would understand?

Was it possible that after all he had burnt the letter unread, and had meant Monk all the time? It was possible, and had it not been for old Stapleton's evidence Guy would have felt disposed to think that this had indeed been so. And if Monk had been meant, was it for him to take advantage of a legal quibble to oust him from the position to which he had been brought up? Even if not, could he ever bear to put forward a claim which would be the same surprise to them as it was to him.

Guy had never forgotten the night of his mother's death, when he had stood beside her bed, with Monk's hand closely clasped in his, and his aunt's tender look bent on the dying woman. What was the promise he had made that dying mother then? Was it not to love and cherish those who had been so good to them? To love them and show his gratitude by every means in his power?

At this point in his train of thought it was impossible not to let his imagination run riot for a few seconds. Let the thing be done—let Guy occupy the place of Lord of the Manor and master of Dangerfield Park, and what fair hopes might not open out before him. Would not the mother of the girl Monk loved, and he dreamed of only too often when he let his imagination stray whither it would unchecked, would not she be glad and proud to listen to his suit for her daughter's hand, and were not Joyce's eyes as bright for him as for Monk? Did she not welcome them both with equal good will, equal maidenly friendliness? Her heart had not as yet been won. It might fall to him to touch it as soon as to Monk: and with a wife like Joyce at his side, what might not life be to him?

But if for a moment he was tempted, he drove the thought back with a keen sense of indignation against his own weakness and treachery.

THE ATONEMENT.*

PUNISHMENT is not necessarily for reformation. Its purpose may be answered by satisfying a sense of equity, by expressing abhorrence of and deterring others from wrong-doing. But the Sacrifice of Christ, while accomplishing this, saves the transgressor also not only from the penalty of sin but from its ruling power, producing in him repentance and reformation. While evil consequences of sin are removed from the sinner, beneficial results of punishment are secured to the universe. God is glorified, law honored, government upheld, at the same time that guilt is cancelled and the sinner saved. Thus did Jesus "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself"—as a punishment by securing its ends; and as a power by giving spiritual life to the dead sinner and turning him from his iniquities.

Christ perfectly obeyed the law broken by men, and echoed back from humanity God's thoughts respecting sin and holiness. He offered, as our Representative, a perfect obedience, so that the Father beholding him as the Son of Man, and for men, could say: "I am well pleased." He could not as Divine, nor, as a perfect Man, offer the Atonement of remorse; for he "knew no sin." But he did suffer on our behalf many of the consequences of sin—physical infirmities, social wrongs, the malignity of the wicked, mental anguish, spiritual trials; and "became obedient unto death." Throughout his whole life his sympathizing human heart was oppressed with that just appreciation of sin for which his Divine nature rendered him competent. Though sinless, he stood in the place of sinners, confessing their guilt; and thus "his soul was made an offering for sin."

Death was not forced on him to satisfy God's justice, but was his joyful concurrence with God's love. Owing nothing on his own account, he ransomed those who owed "ten thousand talents, and had nothing to pay." In the words of Diognetus in the first century, often cited, "God himself gave up his Son as a ransom for us: the Holy for the unholy; the Sinless for the sinful; the Immortal for the mortal; for what else but his righteousness could cover our sins? O sweet change! O unsearchable work! O unexampled benefit, that the wickedness of many should be covered by One righteous, the righteousness of One should justify many sinners." His Divine nature gave infinite capacity for this great work, and infinite value to the work when performed. This was substituted for the punishment which otherwise both justice and love demanded from the guilty, for the welfare of the Universe. The method of forgiveness vindicates the Law. Its costliness declares both condemnation of sin, and Love in providing such a remedy. Thus reverence and gratitude are together promoted in the pardoned sinner. If he is taught the exceeding evil of the sin needing such Atonement, so he is assured most absolutely that the purpose of God has been fulfilled in "so great Salvation." The Atonement proclaims him to be both Light and Love: establishing Law while saving the transgressor. If one company of Cherubim exclaim, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts," another respond, "for his mercy endureth forever."

THE OLD MEN'S TEARS†

In the midst of the almost universal acclaim of joy and praise [at the laying of the foundation of the second Temple, Ezra 3: 12], there was the note of sadness wailed by the old men, who could recollect the venerable fane in which their fathers had worshipped before the ruthless soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar had reduced it to a heap of ashes. Possibly some of them had stood on this very spot half a century before, in an agony of despair, while they saw the cruel flames licking the ancient stones and blazing up among the cedar beams, and all the fine gold dimmed with black clouds of smoke. Was it likely that the feeble flock just returned from Babylon could ever produce such a wonder of the world as Solomon's temple had been? The enthusiastic young people might be glad in their ignorance; but their sober elders, who knew more, could only weep. We cannot but think that, after the too common habit of the aged, these mournful old men viewed the past in a glamor of memory, magnifying its splendors as they looked back on them throught the mists of time. If so, they were old indeed; for this habit, not years, makes real old age. He is aged who lives in bygone days, with his face ever set to the irreparable past, vainly regretting its retreating memories, uninterested in the present, despondent of the future. The true elixir of life, the secret of perpetual youth of soul, is interest in the present and future, with the forward glance of faith and hope. Old men who cultivate this spirit have young hearts though the snow is on their heads. And such are wise. No doubt, from the standpoint of a narrow common sense, with its shrunken views always confined to the material and the mundane, the old men who wept had more reason for their conduct than the inexperienced younger men who rejoiced. But there is an imprudence that is sublime in its daring, because it springs from faith. The despair of old age makes one great mistake, because it ignores one great truth. In noting that many good things have passed away, it forgets to remember that God remains. God is not dead. Therefore the future is safe. In the end the young enthusiasts of Jerusalem were justified. A prophet arose who declared that a glory which the former temple had never known should adorn the new temple, in spite of its humble beginning; and history verified his word when the Lord took possession of his house in the person of his Son.

A PEARL FROM THE SLUMS.*

In the branches of the trees some birds were singing. Meg's eyes turned from the contemplation of the children with the Guinea pig and the sweet flowers and looked up into the tree, clasping her hands in a quaint way peculiar to herself.

"The little mite is praying," whispered Elsie softly. "She often does when she thinks no one is looking at her."

Millie's eyes filled with tears.

"What a blessed thought it was of your mother's to hunt up that pearl from the slums," she said. "What she has done for little Meg recalls to my mind a beautiful story I read. A poor man whose heart God had touched, dreamed one night that one called him by name. As he listened he heard also these words: 'Look to-morrow on the street, I am coming.' He knew not the meaning of his singular dream, yet his heart was strangely warm all the day. He wrought in his little shop and watched the people as they went by. By and by came an old soldier with a shovel, and began to clear away the snow from the sidewalk. The shoemaker saw him and observed, at length, that the soldier was very weary. Going to the door, he invited him to come in and have some warm tea. The exhausted man gratefully accepted the invitation, and, greatly refreshed by the kindness, at length went his way. Later a woman in poor garb, and carrying a child, stopped before the window. Both mother and child were thinly clad, and the child was crying.

Again the shoemaker opened his door, called to the woman and bade her come into his shop where it was warm. The astonished mother obeyed, and, sitting by the stove, told her story of hunger and want. Soon the old man brought food for her and her child, sending them forth warmed and fed, and with some money to provide for future need. Next it was an old apple woman who drew the shoemaker's attention. A rude boy was annoying her. Again the kind-hearted man went out of his shop and acted as peacemaker and friend. Thus the day passed. At his work the shoemaker, whose name was Martuni, remembered continually the viston of the night before, and watched all the hours for the appearing of him who had promised to come. He saw no bright presence, but a number of poor people he helped and comforted. Night came, and the sboemaker took down his New Testament to read. Again he seemed to hear some one stepping behind him, and there was a voice in his ear: 'Martuni, did you not recognize me?' 'Whom?' asked the old man. 'Me,' repeated the voice. 'It is I;' and the old soldier Martuni had fed and warmed stepped from the shadows, smiled and vanished. 'And this is I,' said the voice again, while from the darkness the woman and her child appeared, smiled and vanished. 'And this is I,' again spoke the voice, and the poor apple woman stepped forward, beamed a kindly look and passed out of sight. The old man put on his glasses and began to read where his New Testament chanced to open. He read: 'For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in;' and further down, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.' Then Martuni understood that his dream did not deceive him; that the Saviour really called on him that day, and that he really received him.'"

"That is a lovely story," was Elsie's comment, "but, my dear Millie," putting her arm lovingly around her friend's shoulder, "it isn't one bit more applicable to mamma than it is to you. I do not believe there is a day in the year that either one of you fail to find Christ in some garb or other. No one can say of you that

Without a recognition
You passed him yesterday.

I wish no one could ever say it of me."

It was a smiling, peaceful landscape, with nothing to indicate the presence of an army; but here and there from behind fresh mounds of earth, would now and then come a puff of white smoke, soon followed by a loud report.

I was told we were on the picket-line, and behind those mounds were keen, watchful eyes, losing no chance to lay low an enemy who should carelessly expose himself—taking deliberate aim with no more compunction than if it were a wild bird at which they were firing! Only think how horrible! And then at a signal which both sides understood, the firing ceases and there is an interval of amity, when they meet half-way, exchange gossip and tobacco for coffee, sugar, flour, etc.; and then, at a signal, each party betakes himself to his post, and war begins again. The eye that smiled and the hands which clasped in friendly recognition, deal out death on the first opportunity.

We saw a man waving a red flag from a great high tower, up and down, right and left, then fast and slow. "Why does he expose himself?" I exclaimed. "He will be shot." And sure enough, shells began to explode all about the tower where he stood. "Why does he not come away?" I cried. The officer laughed, and explained to me that he was signalling some movements of troops, and would not think of deserting his post until his message was given. Then taking his glass, he said, "I'll tell you what he is saying: 'A small body of men approaching from the direction of Petersburg bearing white flag.' Good! That's our conferees coming to arrange for the exchange of prisoners."

Before the Confederate officers arrived I saw General Grant. When, in reply to his questions as to how he might serve me, I said, "General, I want to go to Richmond," you should have seen the humorous twinkle with which he said, "And so do I. So you expect to do what I have tried in vain to accomplish with a hundred thousand men, eh? Thus far we have only come within hailing distance."

IN GOD'S LAND.

HAPPY morn, when I shall wake,
In that land;
Freed from sorrow and heartbreak
In that land.

No night there, but endless noon;
No December follows June;
And all lips hosannas tune,
In that land,
In that land!

I shall lay life's distaff down,
In that land;
Drop the cross and take the crown,
In that land.

Hope will fade from view no more
But—a beacon on the shore—
It will blaze forevermore,
In that land,
In that land!

Roll on Time, then—carry me
To that land,
Where the forms of loved ones be,
In that land.

Waft me on that I may rest
'Mong my saints and on God's breast,
Fetterless and crowned and blessed,
In that land,
In that land!

Welcome to Hood's

We say at our house, because of the good it has done me. No one knows the intense misery I endured for 20 years with dyspepsia. No prescriptions seemed to help me and I had great prejudice against proprietary medicines. But being strongly urged by a friend who had been cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, to give this medicine a trial, I did so. I am now using my fourth bottle, and feel better than I have in twenty years, and consider myself cured. Use this

THY LOVE.

DEAR Lord, could I but have to me,
The Spirit's fullness given,
I'd haste to tell thy love to men
And point the way to heaven.

I would portray thy beauteous life,
Before each human eye:
And plead, with all that did me hear,
The heavenly road to try.

I'd tell them of thy cruel death,
Thy midnight hours of grief;
And how thou bore thy Cross to give
A sin-cursed world relief.

I'd tell them of thy wondrous love,
And how for them thou died:
I'd move all hearts to give thee praise,
And seek thy bleeding side.

Yes, I would love to tell throughout
All lands beneath the sun,
That over sin and death and hell
A triumph thou hast won.

Divine Redeemer, could I speak
Thy love so full and free,
Unto each heart that needs thy grace
I'd bring this world to thee.

Then grant me this, most gracious Lord,
Thy richest love to share,
And for thy noblest service here,
My heart and life prepare.

THE INTERMITTENT SPRING.

On one of his recent journeys into the interior of China, Dr. Wilson, of the China Inland Mission, stopped at a small pool near the foot of a certain sacred mountain to watch a man who was vigorously hammering the rock with a heavy stone. A crowd of pilgrims passing on had just scooped the pool nearly dry, either drinking the water from their cups, or carrying it away in bottles, and another crowd stood eagerly waiting. The missionary asked the rock-pounder what he was doing, and he replied that he was trying to make the water run.

After he had beaten the rock awhile the water would gush out of it, he said. And sure enough it did. Suspecting that there was an intermittent spring there, Dr. Wilson told the man that the rock would yield water without pounding. He evidently was anxious that the people around should not know this; but as Dr. Wilson began to tell them about the living water which Christ gives, he grew interested and ceased pounding to listen. As he stood with the stone in his hand the water gushed out again of itself, to the evident surprise of the pilgrims. Those men at least will have no more faith in the efficacy of the pounding of the rock; it may be hoped that they heard enough to lead them to believe in him who can give them living water.

RESPECT FOR BUDDHISM.

A remarkable order has been issued in respect to Lower Burma by the English Government. It runs as follows: "The Government has decided after consultation with its officers and with the priests and the most respectable persons, to prohibit the possession or use of opium in any form by Burmans in Lower Burma just as in Upper Burma. The use of opium is condemned by the Buddhist religion, and the Government believing the latter religion to be right, ardently hopes that the use of opium by persons of the Burmese race shall forever cease."

We may be thankful that the trade in opium in that land is to cease, whatever the cause that operated may have been; but it is somewhat strange that the Government should have assigned as a reason that the Buddhist religion condemns it. They have known for a long time that it was condemned by the Christian religion which one would have supposed they would have regarded as a more important fact.

THE ORIGIN OF A FLOWER MISSION.

[illegible] the origin of her work in the Flower Mission of the city in which she lived. She says: "I was returning from my country home to my [illegible] little boy followed with such wistful eyes that I took a rose out of my basket and gave it to him. He ran away with it; but before my [illegible] got one for them?' pointing to the boys. If [illegible] not have watched more eagerly. I gave two [illegible] with children—pale, ragged, starved little creatures. I do not know where they came from; they seemed to swarm out of the earth. I gave them all my roses, and all the flowers in my garden, too, feeling quite ashamed to think how many I had and how little I valued them, while to the children they were such priceless treasures. Most of the children ran home with their flower, as if it had been a rare jewel. Later, another poor little waif rang the bell to ask if this was the house where they gave away flowers. I made up my mind that it should be. Out of this chance gift of a rose grew the flower mission of a big city that has put many happy hours into the lives of such a number of little children."

A DOUBLE CURE.

An illustration of the value of Medical Mission work appears in the current number of Dr. Dowkontt's Medical Missionary Record. Dr. Swanson, who is laboring in China, says: "An old woman came to one of our hospitals lately and asked to see the doctor, and she told the doctor what she wanted. She said: 'The head man of our town was with you here; he was an extremely bad man; he thrashed his wife and made his children miserable; he gambled away his money, and his mouth was so foul, all the waters of the rivers would not wash it clean. He came here and he has returned home, but the tiger is changed into a lamb, and his wife is astonished at the change. He has ceased thrashing her, they are now quite comfortable, and he never says a bad word.'

"'Well, asked the doctor, 'what do you want?'

"'Well,' she replied, 'don't tell any one, but I have a foul mouth; I do a little grumbling, and I fear very much my daughters-in-law are not as comfortable as they should be, for I am not a good woman, and I have come here for some of the medicine that has cured that old man, so that I may be what I ought to be.'"

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practiced by George Thomas Congreve.

THIS WEEK'S INTERVIEW.

By the Special Commissioner.

At Torquay, with Mr. Fred. Heath, of St. Leonard's Terrace, Newton Abbot, Plumber, whose case appeared in the weekly papers December, 1891.

TWO YEARS AFTER

The "plain unvarnished tale" told by Mr. Heath, of Newton Abbot, Devon, is worthy of attention of all those who are suffering from any form of chest disease. It would be very easy to describe the statements therein made as "wonderful," "remarkable," or even as almost passing belief, but I prefer to tell the story "just as t'was told to me."

"Mr. Heath had a severe attack of bronchitis, following on Russian influenza, and this was accompanied by terrible cough and night sweats.

"I cannot tell you what I suffered," said Mr. Heath, as we sat chatting in a Torquay hotel recently. "My health entirely gave way. The attacks of hæmorrhage were dreadful, and they left me very weak. The expectoration was offensive and purulent. I became very thin, with the exception of my legs and feet, and they commenced to swell. I had the best available medical advice both in Torquay and Newton Abbot.

No less than eight doctors had me in hand at different times, and they all said I was in a decided consumption, with ulceration proceeding at the back of the lungs."

'Of course you were not able to work?" I asked.

"No; I was laid up for eight and a-half months, unable to earn anything."

"Some portion of that time you spent in the hospital?"

"I was in Teignmouth Hospital for three weeks, and in the Consumption Hospital at Torquay for four months. I was discharged from the latter, my case being given up as hopeless,

I was so thin that you could see through my hands, and every one who knew me said I was a dying man. One of the doctors who attended me told my wife that I should never do another day's work—in fact, that

I couldn't live very long."

Mr. Heath to-day is a man in the best of health, possessing an amount of strength which he rightly describes as wonderful, so I naturally asked him how the change—miraculous almost—was brought about.

"Well," he answered, "when I was so bad that they watched by my bed for a fortnight, expecting me to die,

I heard of Mr. Congreve's treatment, and, as a last resourse, I commenced to take it. After about the first four days, I mended rapidly. For a time I brought up a little blood, but that soon ceased after taking special medicine prescribed for me by Mr. Congreve. In about two months I was well enough to go to work."

"Then, do I understand that after being so ill for between eight and nine months, in so short a time you were enabled to go to work?"

"Yes, and more than that.

I have never ailed anything since.

My occupation is a trying one. Perhaps for a time I am standing before a fierce fire, and immediately after I am exposed to the cold air."

"I suppose plenty of persons have witnessed your recovery."

"Hundreds of people who knew me well. After I got to work again, one of the doctors who had treated me asked me to come up and be examined. After the examination was over, he told me he was never more surprised in his life there was absolutely nothing the matter with me except a little weakness. He said he thought I should have been dead and in my grave. People who knew me when I was so ill regard me as a living wonder."

"You certainly appear in good health now?"

"My health is perfect. From the time Mr. Congreve cured me I have not had an hour's ailment. Many strangers who have heard about me come sos my house to inquire, and I tell them exactly the same as I have told you."

"Then you won't mind my publishing your case in the Torquay papers, Mr. Heath?"

"I shall be only too pleased for you to do so, and I will gladly answer any enquiries which may be addressed to me. I ought to add, to show how strong my chest is now, that I belong to a band connected with a religious organization, and play a wind instrument four nights a week, and nearly all day on Sunday."

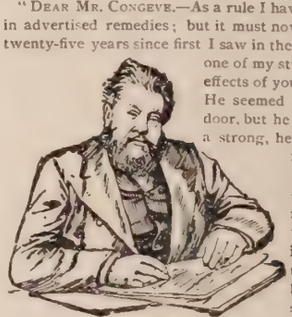
This is Mr. Heath's testimony. Anyone who doubts it can communicate with him at the address above given, and he will be happy to answer any questions.

NOTE.—While in Newton Abbot I met several persons who corroborated Mr. Heath's statement. One gentlemen—Mr. Churton, Rock-villa, Wolborough-hill—who knows all the facts, vouches for their correctness. He has also seen the good effects of Mr. Congreve's treatment in other cases, and speaks of it as the most wonderful medicine he ever knew.

The case of Mr. Heath is one of a number in the neighborhood of Torquay, visited by the special commissioner.

Spurgeon's Own Words.

"DEAR MR. CONGEVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy He seemed at death's door, but he lives now a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have save numbers from consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude.



REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation.

"Yours heartily (Rev.)

C. H. Spurgeon

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my Balsamic elixir, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza, and all Chest Affections.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

CONGREVE'S Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from all Drug Stores, or will be mailed direct from my own depot, postpaid for 50c., $1.00, 1.75, 3.75 or 7.00 according to size.

Every case of Consumption and wasting disease, however slight the indications, is likely, if neglected to lead to serious consequences and early death. But no case is too serious for despair, remembering the marvellous cures resulting from my treatment. My book on the "Cure of consumption" will tell you of many sufferers who had given up all hope, but were restored to enjoying vigorous, happy, healthy lives, through the timely use of my treatment. I will mail my book on Consumption and Diseases of the Chest on receipt of 25 cents, or will send the book with a 50 cent bottle of Balsamic Elixir, and a 50 cent box of pills upon receipt of One Dollar.

GEORGE THOMAS CONGREVE,
4 WOOSTER STREET, NEW YORK.

[N. B.—The Rev. Richard Baxter, of London, [illegible] had many opportunities of witnessing the beneficial effects of Mr. Congreve's treatment, particularly in the case of sufferers whom he, Mr. Baxter, especially recommended to adopt the treatment, and who are now leading happy, useful lives, whereas, before, they simply dragged on a weary distressful and emaciated existence.]

"WE STILL HAVE THE SAVIOUR WITH US"*

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

YES, we have the Saviour with us!
And so beautiful and true,
Is the pattern that he set us;
We will strive like him to do.

We will strive to bear so meekly
Words that cut as sharp as swords
And will show by our example
That we truly are the Lord's.

And, if to the Saviour nearer
With a holy longing we Strive to get, he will be dearer,
And more satisfied we'll be.

And the world will not so largely Occupy our thoughts and time,
Minor things will, as they should, be Subject unto things divine.

A BLIND MAN'S LOGIC.

In an English journal the Rev. John Mitchell relates the following incident of railroad travel: A noted infidel was traveling in a car in which a minister was seated. He at once commenced an argument with the clergyman in a loud tone, so as to be heard by other passengers. Among the latter was a blind man who listened attentively. Turning suddenly to him in a pause in the argument, the infidel said. "Do you, sir, believe in a God, who has made this beautiful earth, and the sun to shine upon it, and who has adorned the heavens with myriads of stars, and yet, without any offence on your part, has deprived you for ever of the power of beholding them?"

"I am surprised, my dear sir," replied the man, "that you should ask me such a question. I do believe in the existence of God as firmly as I do in my own, and I could doubt the one as easily as the other. There is, however, one thing that strikes me as being very peculiar in what you have said. When you reason of God you do not seem to be governed by the same principles as when reasoning about men and the common affairs of everyday life." The infidel denied the inference, and the blind man continued: "Suppose, on reaching your home, and on entering your room, you find a lighted lamp upon the table —what will be your conclusion?"

"Why," answered the infidel, with a sneer, "I shall conclude that some one placed it there."

"Well, then, when you look into the heavens and see those innumerable lights of which you have spoken, why do you not come to the same conclusion, that some intelligent being placed them there?"

The sceptic declined to talk any more on the subject, but it was evident to all the passengers that he felt thoroughly humbled and uncomfortable.

NEW MISSIONARY GROUND.

American missionaries are not altogether uninterested in the settlement of the Siamese troubles. The Presbyterian Board has several devoted missionaries in the North Eastern districts which are known as the Laos country. One of these, Dr. S. C. Peoples has just reported the opening of the Province of Pra to the Gospel. He says: "We have had a five days' journey through forests and over mountains, a most delightful journey. We travelled with carriers and two horses, one horse for the tent, and one for myself. After the first day but my horse became lame, and I walked for two days. We passed through only three considerable towns, at points where we crossed rivers. The purpose of my visit was to negotiate with the authorities in Pra about securing a site for locating a mission in that province. I did very little active evangelistic work as I thought it our best course to keep rather quiet for fear of awaking hostility and defeating the end of our visit. The two native workers who went with me did good work, however, in a quiet way. The people were remarkably approachable, and many of them listened with the interest of persuasion. Some of our carriers were citizens of Pra who had come to inquire and learn the new religion. There are now quite a number of the Pra people who are members of the Church.

"Our mission was entirely successful. We secured a most desirable site immediately outside the city wall, on the river bank, large enough for two residences and a hospital, for three hundred rupees. We put two men on this place to clear it off and enclose it with a temporary fence, and bought a few logs to be sawed into lumber for a hospital ward, which will serve as a temporary residence for the missionary who goes to prepare the way for permanent occupation. The expense of these purchases and this work is borne by private parties, in anticipation of the action of the Board in granting the request of the mission to open Pra."

* This beautiful sentence fell from the lips of a Minister's wife, and I then wrote these stanzas; she has since gone to be with the Saviour whom she loved.

Ruth, the Moabitess.

The Most Beautiful of Pastorals—Her Meeting With Boaz While Gleaning in the Field —A Picture that Recalls the Bible Story.

RUTH, THE GLEANER.

A LITTLE way out of Bethlehem, down a valley that slopes gently to the east, lies the Field of Boaz where were enacted the scenes in the beautiful story of Ruth the Moabitess, one of the sweetest pastorals in all literature. It is in a locality now known as Wady Kharubeh (Valley of Carobs), and the identity of the place where the young widow of Mahlon, came to glean is established beyond question by a line of unbroken tradition. There were, in olden times, neither hedges nor fences in Palestine, except around orchards or gardens, and the field of Boaz was, like all the others, marked off by boundary stones, which in Hebrew eyes were regarded as divinely ordained landmarks, not to be removed. The women shared equally with the men the toil of harvesting, and reapers and workers came from distant parts of the country to aid in gathering the grain, some bringing their wives and families with them, that the latter might get a share of the gleaning. In many parts of Palestine, similar scenes may yet be witnessed at harvest-time, and even now, as in the ancient days, the master salutes his harvesters with the words of Boaz: "The Lord be with thee," and the familiar response comes: "The Lord bless thee." Although many fields are mentioned in the Bible, there is probably none around which so many tender memories cling as those acres, which once belonged to the generous-hearted kinsman of the young widow from beyond Jordan. Our illustration shows the field in its entirety, as it is to-day. The lime-stone fence is of comparatively recent date, and where the clump of olive trees now stands, the ripe, yellow grain once waved in unbroken rows.

These fields must have been a pleasant sight to look at, when Ruth and Naomi came to Bethlehem at "the beginning of barley-harvest." In all countries, harvest is a time of joy and activity. The field of Boaz was yielding to the sickle, as she came up and modestly began to glean at some little distance from the reapers. It was a field

> Crowded with grain, in which the reapers toiled,
> Each with a sharp-tooth'd sickle in his hand.
> Along the furrow here, the harvest fell
> In frequent handfuls.

One can picture, in imagination, the busy scene: a hot sun, tempered by a gentle breeze waving and tossing the grain like a golden sea; the tawny reapers bending to their sickles, and the little scattered knots of gleaners, one of them—apart from the rest—being the Moabitess. Boaz, coming to the field, sees the sweet-faced, gentle woman, and asks the chief of the reapers concerning her. On learning who she was, and somewhat of her history, his sympathetic heart seems to have warmed instantly to the exile, for he not only accorded her permission to glean, but commended her fidelity to Naomi and honored her above the handmaidens by himself handing her parched corn as they sat eating the noontide meal spread for the refreshment of the harvesters. Nowadays, gleaners are not allowed to come into a field of grain till the sheaves are carried away to the threshing-floor; then they come in hundreds, searching for stray ears. Many of these gleaners in Palestine are very clever at picking up the ears, and gather a good-sized bundle before the close of the day. Besides the chance that Ruth had of gleaning among the sheaves, she was allowed to come and eat with Boaz's maids; while now, in Palestine, to invite the gleaners to eat is out of the question, unless they are relations of the master of the field. Learning who the maid was, Boaz directed his servants to give Ruth a courteous welcome, so that she could go home laden with enough food to support her mother-in-law and herself.

The friendship thus begun in the field, resulted in the union in matrimonial bonds of the wealthy kinsman and the poor Moabitess. According to Oriental custom, Boaz was bound, as her next of kin or "goel," to redeem Ruth by marriage, from the calamity of widowhood and this duty he was not loath to accept. There was another person more nearly related to the family than himself, whose title must be first disposed of. Without delay, Boaz applied himself to ascertaining whether this man in question was inclined to assert his right—a right which extended to the purchase of the ransom of Elimelech's estate. Finding him indisposed to fulfil his obligation, there was then no obstacle to his own union with Ruth.

Widows or unmarried women in the East occupied a most unhappy and insecure position. Their only sure refuge from servitude, insult or neglect was a husband's house; hence Naomi, on taking leave of her young widowed daughters-in-law uttered the invocation: "The Lord grant you that ye may find rest (mennehah), each in the house of her husband." (Ruth 1: 9.) Under the law of Moses, provision was made for the succor and protection of a widow whose deceased husband had left brothers or near male relatives. (Deut. 25: 5-10.) On the other hand the widow was required not to marry again, except the nearest kinsman of her late spouse, but that kinsman was permitted, if he so desired, to transfer his obligation to the next nearest of kin. A widow, childless and no longer marriageable, could relinquish her estate in favor of a childless and widowed daughter-in-law—as Naomi did voluntarily in the case of Ruth. These peculiar social conditions and customs justified, to Oriental eyes at least, the steps taken by Ruth to secure her right under the ancient Mosaic law of privilege.

From Boaz and his Moabitish spouse sprang an illustrious and royal line. The wealthy land-owner was himself of noble stock, tracing his descent from Israel's kings and judges, and by this marriage so strangely and divinely arranged, he was destined to still higher honors as the progenitor of the House of David and of Mary the mother of "David's Greater Son," the Saviour of the world, who was also born in the same Judean village, within sight of whose white walls Ruth first met her future husband, as she "gleaned in the field."

To the pilgrim who visits Bethlehem, the Field of Boaz, hardly picturesque though it seems, holds memories and suggestions of a character very different from those awakened by the Shepherds' Plain, or the Grotto of the Nativity; yet it gives an impression that lingers long in the mind, like a pleasant fragrance. The whole region is spiritualized by its memories: the shepherd king watched his father's flocks and drew inspiration on its hillsides and valleys for his immortal psalms of pastoral life; the Song of Songs fell from angelic lips over those plains; and the life of the Saviour himself has kept the whole world's heart warm toward Bethlehem through the centuries, and will do so to the end of time.

Ruth and Boaz were striking examples of virtue and uprightness in a rude age and among an idolatrous people, another history illustrates the workings of Divine providence, The greatness of Ruth's spiritual character was, according to the Christian fathers, to be measured by the greatness of her reward in being chosen as the ancestress of Christ.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

REINFORCEMENT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Luke 17: 5, "Lord, increase our faith."

"WHAT a pity he is going there," said my friend, a most distinguished general of the army, when he was told that the reason for my not being present on a celebrated day in Brooklyn was that on that day I had sailed for the Holy Land. "Why do you say that?" enquired some one. My military friend replied: "Oh, he will be disillusioned when he gets amid the squalor and commonplace scenes of Palestine, and his faith will be shaken in Christianity, for that is often the result." The great general misjudged the case. I went to the Holy Land for the one purpose of having my faith strengthened, and that was the result which came of it. In all our journeying, in all our reading, in all our associations, in all our plans, augmentation, rather than the depletion of our faith, should be our chief desire. It is easy enough to have our faith destroyed. I can give you a recipe for its obliteration. Read infidel books, have long and frequent conversations with sceptics, attend the lectures of those antagonistic to religion, give full swing to some bad habit, and your faith will be so completely gone that you will laugh at the idea that you ever had any. If you want to ruin your faith, you can do it more easily than you can do anything else. After believing the Bible all my life, I can see a plain way by which, in six weeks, I could enlist my voice and pen and heart and head and entire nature in the bombardment of the Scriptures and the Church and all I now hold sacred. That it is easy to banish soon and forever all respect for the Bible, I prove by the fact that so many have done it. They were not particularly brainy, nor had especial force of will, but they so thoroughly accomplished the overthrow of their faith that they have no more idea that the Bible is true, or that Christianity amounts to anything, than they have in the truth of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," or the existence of Don Quixote's "windmills." They have destroyed their faith so thoroughly that they never will have a return of it. Fifty revivals of religion may sweep over the city, the town, the neighborhood where they live, and they will feel nothing but a silent or expressed disgust. There are persons in this house to-day, who, twenty years ago, gave up their faith and they will never resume it. The black and deep-toned bell of doom hangs over their head, and I take the hammer of that bell, and I strike it three times with all my might, and it sounds, Woe! Woe! Woe! But my wish, and the wish of most of you, is the prayer expressed by the disciples to Jesus Christ, in the words of my text: "Lord, increase our faith."

The first mode of accomplishing this is to study the Bible itself. I do not believe there is an infidel now alive who has read the Bible through. But as so important a document needs to be read at least twice through in order that it may be thoroughly understood, and read in course, I now offer one hundred dollars reward to any infidel who has read the Bible through twice and read it in course. But I cannot take such a man's own word for it, for there is no foundation for integrity, except the Bible, and the man who rejects the source of truth, how can I accept his truthfulness? So I must have another witness in the case before I give the reward. I must have the testimony of some one who has seen him read it all through twice. Infidels fish in this Bible for incoherencies and contradictions and absurdities, and if you find their Bible, you will see interlineations in the Book of Jonah and some of the chapters of that unfortunate prophet nearly worn out by much use, and some parts of Second Samuel or First Kings, you will find dim with finger-marks, but the pages which contain the Ten Commandments and the Psalms of David and the Sermon on the Mount and the Book of John the Evangelist, will not have a single lead pencil stroke in the margin, nor any finger-marks showing frequent perusal. The father of one of the Presidents of the United States was a pronounced infidel. I knew it when many years ago I accepted his invitation to spend the night in his home. Just before retiring at night, he said, in a jocose way: "I suppose you are accustomed to read the Bible before going to bed, and here is my Bible from which to read." He then told me what portions he would like to have me read, and he only asked for those portions on which he could easily be facetious.

You know you can make fun about anything. I suppose you could take the last letter your father or mother ever wrote and find something in the grammar or the spelling, or the tremor of the penmanship about which to be derisively critical. The internal evidence of the truthfulness of the Bible is so mighty that no one man out of the sixteen hundred million of the world's present population, or the vaster millions of the past ever read the Bible in course, and read it prayerfully and carefully but was led to believe it. John Murray, the famous book publisher of Edinburgh and the intimate friend of Southey, Coleridge, Walter Scott, Canning, and Washington Irving, bought of Moore, the poet, the "Memoirs of Lord Byron," and they were to be published after Byron's death. But they were not fit to be published, although Murray had paid for them $10,000. That was a solemn conclave when eight of the prominent literary people of those times assembled in Albemarle Street after Byron's death to decide what should be done with the "Memoirs" which were charged and surcharged with defamations and indelicacies. The "Memoirs" were read and pondered, and the decision came that they must be burned, and not until the last word of those "Memoirs" went to ashes did the literary company separate. But, suppose now all the best spirits of all ages were assembled to decide the fate of the Bible, which is the last Will and Testament of our Heavenly Father, and these Memoirs of our Lord Jesus, what would be the verdict? Shall they burn or shall they live? The unanimous verdict of all is, "Let it live, though all else burn." Then put together on the other hand all the debauchees and profligates and assassins of the ages, and their unanimous verdict concerning the Bible would be, "Let it burn." Mind you, I do not say that all infidels are immoral, but I do say that all the scapegraces and scoundrels of the universe agree with them about the Bible. Let me vote with those who believe in the Holy Scriptures. Men believe other things with half the evidence required to believe the Bible. The distinguished Abner Kneeland rejected the Scriptures, and then put all his money into an enterprise for the recovery of that hocus-pocus "Captain Kidd's Treasures," Kneeland's faith for doing so being founded on a man's statement that he could tell where those Treasures were buried from the looks of a glass of water dipped from the Hudson River. The internal evidence of the authenticity of the Scriptures is so exact and so vivid that no man, honest and sane, can thoroughly and continuously and prayerfully read them without entering their discipleship. So I put that internal evidence paramount. How are you led to believe in a letter you receive from husband or wife or child or friend? You know the handwriting. You know the style. You recognize the sentiment. When the letter comes you do not summon the postmaster who stamped it and the postmaster who received it and the letter-carrier who brought it to your door to prove that it is a genuine letter. The internal evidence settles it, and by the same process you can forever settle the fact that the Bible is the handwriting and communication of the infinite God.

Furthermore: as I have already intimated, we may increase our faith by the testimony of others. Perhaps we of lesser brain may have been overcome by superstition or cajoled into an acceptance of a hollow pretension. So I will, this morning, turn this house into a court-room and summon witnesses, and you shall be the jury, and I now empanel you for that purpose, and I will put upon the witness stand men whom all the world acknowledge to be strong intellectually and whose evidence in any other court-room would be incontrovertible. I will not call to the witness-stand any minister of the Gospel, for he might be prejudiced. There are two ways of taking an oath in a court-room. One is by putting the lips to the Bible and the other is by holding up the right hand toward heaven. Now, as in this case, it is the Bible that is on trial, we will not ask the witness to put the book to his lips, for that would imply that the sanctity and divinity of the book is settled, and that would be begging the question. So I shall ask each witness to lift his hand toward heaven in affirmation. Samuel P. Chase, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, appointed by President Lincoln, will take the witness-stand. "Chief Justice Chase, upon your oath, please to state what you have to say about the book commonly called the Bible." The witness replies: "There came a time in my life when I doubted the divinity of the Scriptures, and I resolved, as a lawyer and judge, I would try the book as I would try anything in the court-room, taking evidence for and against. It was a long and serious and profound study, and using the same principles of evidence in this religious matters as I always do in secular matters, I have come to the decision that the Bible is a supernatural book, that it has come from God, and that the only safety for the human race is to follow its teachings." "Judge, that will do. Go back again to your pillow of dust on the banks of the Ohio." Next I put upon the witness-stand a President of the United States — John Quincy Adams. "President Adams, what have you to say about the Bible and Christianity?" The President replies: "I have for many years made it a practice to read through the Bible once a year. My custom is to read four or five chapters every morning immediately after arising from my bed. It employs about an hour of my time and seems to me the most suitable manner of beginning the day. In what light soever we regard the Bible, whether with reference to revelation, to history or to morality, it is an invaluable and inexhaustible mine of knowledge and virtue." Next I put upon the witness-stand Sir Isaac Newton, the author of the Principia and the greatest natural philosopher the world has ever seen. "Sir Isaac, what have you to say concerning the Bible?" The philosopher's reply is: "We account the Scriptures of God to be the most sublime philosophy." Next I put upon the witness-stand the enchantment of letters, Sir Walter Scott: and when I ask him what he thinks of the place that our great book ought to take among other books he replies: "There is but one book and that is the Bible." Next I put upon the stand the most famous geologist of all time, Hugh Miller, an elder of Dr. Guthrie's Presbyterian Church, in Edinburgh, and Faraday, and Keppler, and they all testify to the same thing. They all say the Bible is from God and that the mightiest influence for good that ever touched our world is Christianity. "Chancellor Kent! What do you think of the Bible?" Answer: "No other book ever addressed itself so authoritatively and so pathetically to the judgment and moral sense of mankind." "Edmund Burke! What do you think of the Bible?" Answer: "I have read the Bible morning, noon, and night, and have ever since been the happier and the better man for such reading." Next I put upon the stand William E. Gladstone, the head of the English Government, and I hear him saying what he said to me in January of 1890, when, in reply to his telegram, "Pray come to Hawarden to-morrow," I visited him. Then and there I asked him as to whether, in the passage of years, his faith in the Holy Scriptures and Christianity was on the increase or decrease, and he turned upon me with an emphasis and enthusiasm such as no one who has not conversed with him can fully appreciate, and expressed by voice and gesture, and illumined countenance his ever-increasing faith in God and the Bible and Christianity as the only hope of our ruined world. "That is all, Mr. Gladstone, we will take of your time now, for, from the reports of what is going on in England just now, I think you are very busy." The next man I put upon the witness-stand is the late Earl of Kintore, and I ask him what he thinks of Christianity, and he replies, "Why do you ask me that? Did you not hear me preach Christ in the 'Midnight Mission' of London?" "Oh, yes! I remember!" But I see many witnesses present to-day in the court-room, and I call you to the witness-stand, but I have only a second of time for any one of you. As you pass along just give one sentence in regard to Christianity. "Under God it has changed my entire nature," says one, "It brought me from drunkenness and poverty to sobriety and a good home," says another. "It solaced me when I lost my child," says another. "It gave me a hope of future treasures when my property was swept off by the last panic," says another. "It has given me a peace and a satisfaction more to me than all the world beside," says another. "It has been to me, light, and music, and fragrance, and radiant anticipation," says another. Ah! stop the procession of witnesses. Enough! Enough! All those voices of the past and the present have mightily increased our faith.

Again, our belief is reinforced by archaeological exploration. We must confess that good men at one time were afraid of geologist's hammer and chemist's crucible and archaeologist's investigation, but now intelligent Christians are receiving and still expecting nothing but confirmation from all such sources. What supports the "Palestine Exploration Society?" Contributions from churches and Christian benefactors. I saw the marks of the shovels of that Exploring Society amid the ruins of ancient Jericho, and all up and down from the Dead Sea to Cesarea Philippi. "Dig away!" says the Church of God, "and the deeper you dig the better I like." The discovered monuments of Egypt have chiselled on them the story of the sufferings of the Israelites in Egyptian bondage, as we find it in the Bible; there, in imperishable stone, representations of the slave, of the whips and of the task-masters who compelled the making of bricks without straw. Exhumed Nineveh and Babylon, with their dusty lips, declare the Bible true. Napoleon's soldiers in the Egyptian campaign pried up a stone, which you many find in the British Museum, a stone, as I remember it, presenting perhaps two feet of lettered surface. It contains words in three languages. That stone was the key that unlocked the meaning of all the hieroglyphics of tombs and obelisks, and tells over and over again the same events which Moses recorded. The signs of the time indicate that almost every fact of the Bible from lid to lid will find its corroboration in ancient city disentombed, or ancient wall, cleared from the dust of ages, or ancient document unrolled by archaeologist. Before the world rolls on as far into the twentieth century as it has already rolled into the nineteenth an infidel will be a man who does not believe his own senses, and the volumes now critical and denunciatory of the Bible, if not entirely devastated by the book worms, will be taken down from the shelf as curiosities of ignorance or idiocy. All success to the pickaxes and crow-bars and powder-blasting of those apostles of archaeological exploration. I like the ringing defiance of the old Hugenots to the assailants of Christianity: "Pound away, you rebels! Your hammers break, but the anvil of God's Word stands." How wonderfully the old book hangs together. It is a library made up of sixty-six books and written by at least thirty-nine authors. It is a supernatural thing that they have stuck together. Take the writings of any other thirty-nine authors, or any ten authors, or any five authors, and put them together, and how long would they stay together? Books of "elegant extracts" compiled from many authors are proverbially short-lived. I never knew one such book, which, to use the publisher's phrase, "had life in it" for five years. Why is it that the Bible, made up of the writings of at least thirty nine authors, has kept together for a long line of centuries when the natural tendency would have been to fly apart like loose sheets of paper when a gust of wind blows upon them? It is because God stuck them together and keeps them together. Bring me all the Bibles of the earth into one pile, and blindfold me so that I cannot tell the difference between day and night, and put into my hand any one of all that Alpine mountain of sacred books, and put my finger on the last page of Genesis, and let me know it, and I can tell you what is on the next page, namely, the first chapter of Exodus, or while thus blindfolded, put my finger on the last chapter of Matthew, and let me know it, and I will tell you what is on the next page, namely, the first chapter of Mark. In the pile of five hundred million Bibles there will be no exception. In other words, the book gives me confidence by its supernatural adhesion of writing to writing. Even the stoutest ship sometimes shifts its cargo, and that is what made our peril the greater in the ship Greece of the National Line when the cyclone struck us off the coast of Newfoundland, and the cargo of iron had shifted as the ship swung from larboard to starboard and from starboard to larboard. But thanks be to God this old Bible ship, though it has been in thousands of years of tempest, has kept its cargo of gold and precious stones compact and sure and in all the centuries nothing about it has shifted. There they stand, shoulder to shoulder, David and Solomon and Isaiah and Jeremiah and Ezekiel and Daniel and Hosea and Joel and Amos and Obadiah and Jonah and Micah and Nahum and Habakkuk and Zephaniah and Haggai and Zechariah and Malachi and Matthew and Mark and Luke and John and Paul and Peter, all there, and with a certainty of being there until the heavens and the earth, the Creation of which is described in the first book of the Bible, shall have collapsed, and the white horse of the Conqueror described in the last book of the Bible shall paw the dust in universal demolition. By that tremendous fact my faith is reinforced. The discussion is abroad as to who wrote those books of the Bible called the Pentateuch, whether Moses or Hilkiah or Ezra or Samuel or Jeremiah or another group of ancients. None of them wrote it. God wrote the Pentateuch, and in this day of stenography and typewriting that ought not to be a difficult thing to understand. The great business men of our towns and cities dictate nearly all their letters, they only sign them after they are dictated. The prophet and evangelist and apostle were Jehovah's stenographers or typewriters. They put down only what God dictated; he signed it afterward. He has been writing his name upon it all through the vicissitudes of centuries.

But I come to the height of my subject when I say the way to reinforce our faith is to pray for it. So the disciples in my text got their abounding faith: "Lord, increase our faith." Some one suggests: "Do you really think that prayer amounts to anything?" I might as well ask you is there a line of telegraphic poles from New York to Washington, is there a line of telegraphic wires from Manchester to London, from Cologne to Berlin. All the people who have sent and received messages on those lines know of their existence. So there are millions of souls who have been in constant communication with the Capital of the Universe, with the Throne of the Almighty, with the Great God himself, for years and years and years. There has not been a day when supplications did not flash up and blessings did not flash down. Will some ignoramus, who has never received a telegram or sent one, come and tell us that there is no such thing as telegraphic communication? Will some one who has never offered a prayer that was heard and answered come and tell us that there is nothing in prayer? It may not come as we expect it, but as sure as an honest prayer goes up, a merciful answer will come down. During the blizzard of four or five years ago, you know that many of the telegraph wires were prostrated, and I telegraphed to Chicago by the way of Liverpool, England, and the answer, after a while, came round by another wide circuit, and so the prayer we offer may come back in a way we never imagined, and if we ask to have our faith increased, although it may come by a widely different process than that which we expected, our confidence will surely be augmented. Oh, put it in every prayer you ever make between your next breath and your last gasp: "Lord, increase our faith"—faith in Christ as our personal ransom from present guilt and eternal catastrophe: Faith in the omnipotent Holy Ghost: Faith in the Bible, the truest volume ever dictated or written or printed or read: Faith in adverse providences, harmonized for our best welfare: Faith in a Judgment Day that will set all things right which have for ages been wrong. Increase our faith, not by a fragile addition, but by infinitude of recuperation. I like the way that the minister's widow did in Elisha's time, when, after the family being very unfortunate, her two sons were about to be sold for debt, and she had nothing in the house but a pot of oil, and at Elisha's direction she borrowed from her neighbors all the vessels she could borrow, and then began to pour out the oil into those vessels and kept on pouring until they were all full, and she became an oil merchant with more assets than liabilities, and when she cried, "Bring me yet a vessel," the answer came, "There is not a vessel more." So let us take what oil of faith we have and use it until the supply shall be miraculously multiplied. Bring on your empty vessels, and by the power of the Lord God of Elisha they shall be filled until they can hold no more of jubilant, all-inspiring and triumphant faith.

What a frightful time we had a few days ago down on the coast of Long Island, where I have been stopping. That archangel of tempest, which, with its awful wings, swept the Atlantic coast from Florida to Newfoundland, did not spare our region. A few miles away, at Southampton, I saw the bodies of four men, whom the storm had slain and the sea had cast up. As I stood there among the dead bodies, I said to myself, and I said aloud: "These men represent homes. What will mother and father and wife and children say when they know this?" Some of the victims were unknown, only the first name of two of them was found out—Charley and William. I wondered then and I wonder now if they will remain unknown, and if some kindred far away may be waiting for their coming and never hear of the rough way of their going. The ship had become helpless six miles out, and as one wave swept the deck and went down on the furnaces till they hissed and went out, the cry was, "Oh, my God, we are lost!" Then the crew put on life-preservers, one of the sailors saying to the other, "We will meet again on the shore, and, if not, well, we must all go sometime." Of the twenty-three men who put on the life-preservers, only three lived to reach the beach. But what a scene it was as the good and kind people of Southampton, led on by Dr. Thomas, the great and good surgeon of New York, stood watching the sailors struggling in the breakers. "Are you still alive?" shouted Dr. Thomas to one of them out in the breakers, and he signalled yes, and then went into unconsciousness. Who should do the most for the poor fellows and how to resuscitate them, were the questions that ran up and down the beach at Southampton. How the men and women on the shore stood wringing their hands impatiently waiting for the sufferers to come within reach, and then they were lifted up and carried indoors and waited on with as much kindness and wrapped as warmly as though they had been the princes of the earth. "Are they alive?" "Are they breathing?" "Do you think they will live?" "What can we do for them?" were the rapid and intense questions asked, and so much money was sent for the clothing and equipment of the unfortunates that Dr. Thomas had to make a proclamation that no more money was needed. In other words, all that day it was resuscitation. And that is the appropriate word for us this morning, as we stand and look off upon this awful sea of doubt and unbelief on which hundreds are this moment being wrecked. Some of them were launched by Christian parentage on smooth seas and with promise for prosperous voyage, but a Voltaire cyclone struck them on one side and a Tom Paine cyclone struck them on the other side, and a bad-habit cyclone struck them on all sides, and they have foundered far away from shore, far away from God, and they have gone down or are washed ashore with no spiritual life left in them. But, thank God, there are many here today with enough faith left to encourage us in the effort at their resuscitation. All hands to the beach! With a confidence in God that takes no denial, let us lay hold of them! Fetch them out of the breakers! Bring Gospel warmth and Gospel stimulus, and Gospel life to their freezing souls! Resuscitation! Resuscitation!

NAPOLEON'S SOLDIERS FINDING THE ROSETTA STONE IN THE DESERT.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

S S. Lesson for Oct. 1. Rom 1 : 8-17. Golden Text, I. Thes. 1 : 5 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

BEFORE the apostle Paul wrote to the Romans about the power of the Gospel he had known that power in his own life. He could fully endorse the words of his Master: "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." (John 3 : 11.) It was the power of the Gospel which led the once proud Pharisee to address the Romans as being himself a servant—"a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the Gospel of God" (ver. 1). Paul took the appellation of "servant" as his by right, but "apostle" as his by calling, always remembering that he was "not meet to be called an apostle," because he persecuted the church of God.

Paul was not the servant of the Romans although he had made himself servant unto all. He was the servant of God, and as such, at the service of the Church, but only as the Lord called him. There was both in the position he took up, it was the lowest place as the servant, but it was a place of authority as a servant under orders to God, and not to man. He was separated, not to the service of the Roman church, or the Corinthian, Ephesian, or any other special Church, but "unto the Gospel of God." This was Paul's parish, "all nations," his was a cosmopolitan ministry. He needed, and God gave him a heart of all nations, and his name and his ministry touched the world of his day. Speaking to the Romans he treats them as parts of the great whole "among whom," i.e., among "all nations" "are ye also called to be Jesus Christs': to all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints; grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." (R.V.)

Paul had great things to write to the Roman Church; in no other epistle did he bring out so fully what redemption and what salvation really mean. He had a burden on his heart, and he must gain the attention of his correspondents, and this he did as was usual with him, by first of all encouraging them, and recognising what there was of the grace of God in them: "I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of thoughout the whole world." When a man who knew, as Paul knew, how dependent we are on the Holy Ghost for the true power of prayer, had the burden of a Church laid upon him, it meant a very real entering into the interests of that Church. This was no forced prayer, it was the privilege of fellowship with his Master. "For I long to see you," he said, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established, that is that I may be by the mutual faith both of you and me." Paul knew that wherever God sent him he should not go in vain: it would be a gain to the Roman Church if he paid them a visit, but, at the same time, it would be a gain to him personally. The apostle understood, and highly valued, the privilege of the communion of saints. He knew it was no light matter for men and women of God to meet together in his presence each contributing his or her quotum of the plenitude of the Spirit, of the presence of an indwelling God, of the experience in spirit soul and body of a life yielded up to God. As the father in Christ, he should impart some spiritual gift, as the brethren in Christ and fellow-workers of the Lord, the Romans should strengthen his faith.

How little did Paul know when he thus felt the drawing of the Spirit towards a ministry in Rome, under what circumstances he should come there! In the latter part of this Epistle he writes: "I have been much hindered from coming to you. But now, having no place in these parts (Corinth and the cities of Greece), and having a great desire these many years to come unto you, whensoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come unto you" (chap. 15: 22-24). Truly "man proposes and God disposes." The journey took place indeed, but the Apostle of the Gentiles traveled under arrest; he came, not as a preacher but as a prisoner, and yet, as we have seen, sent of God.

"I should like to win some souls for the Master in France," said a young, earnest, worker. "O how I would like to bring some of the native Hindoos to the knowledge of the Lord," said another. With "Paul the aged" there was a deeper motive:

"I am Debtor."

Seeing as he did the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body. The apostle felt that, redeemed by the blood of Christ, and looking for his return to consummate his work, and deliver the groaning creation, he was a debtor. It was: "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." (1.Cor. 9: 16). "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise. So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also, for I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ."

Many were ashamed of it who nevertheless believed in its truth and divine origin. There was much in Paul's time to lead the natural man to be ashamed of the cross of Christ. All its associations were with the criminal courts, the Pharisee, Saul of Tarsus, who could say of himself that he had been, touching the righteousness which is of the law, found blameless, had to endure the bitter scorn of those who now regarded him as the fanatical follower of an executed criminal, who was publicly regarded as an evil doer! This was no light cross for Paul. The religion in which he was brought up, and the strictest sect of the Pharisees of which he had been a member could only look upon him as a recreant, and as a disgrace to the name of Pharisee. The state religion of Rome was just as adverse. Paul lost caste, lost influence, lost respect and prestige; those who had been wont to look up to him as an aristocratic, honorable, pious Jew, and as one privileged to be a Roman citizen, could now only regard him with the last degree of contempt. From all sides shame was heaped on him, and yet Paul was not ashamed! Heaven had been opened to him on his way to Damascus, he had not been "disobedient to the heavenly vision;" old things had then passed away and all things had become new. Paul saw with other eyes from that day forward, he could afford to bear the contempt of man for the Gospel. The good news concerning Jesus of Nazareth had become a power, the power of God unto salvation, and had transplanted Paul into another world, with another point of view: the power of the Gospel made him look, not at the things which are seen but the things which are not seen, and God was nearer to him, and more real to him, than any earthly thing. Phariseeism had been to him a doctrine, an opinion, obstinately pertinaciously held and persevered in; but the Gospel was

A Power to Deliver.

The old doctrine developed what he was, and its fruit was threatenings and slaughter." The Gospel brought salvation and delivered him from what he was, and made him what Christ was, so that as crucified with Christ, he could say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." And Paul knew and taught that that same Gospel which was such a power to him was not something peculiar to him, but the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. The same condition which he had recognized and complied with was sufficient for others, too, "to the Jew first and also to the Gentiles."

"For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." Faith for forgiveness and justification, but only to lead on to faith for deliverance from sin through dying to sin. And again deliverance from sin leading on to another step of faith, deliverance from the flesh by the indwelling of the Spirit of God, and then from deliverance from the flesh to the recognition by faith of our indebtedness to the creation which is waiting for the manifestation of the grown-up, developed, educated, purified "sons of God," according to the purpose of God which again we enter into by faith. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son that he might be the first born among many brethren."

O, thank God, the Gospel is not a theory, but a power; it is not a device of man but a call of God with the power attached to it, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure. O the mystery and yet the open mystery of the grace of God, open to faith, how glorious it is! Shall we be ashamed of the Gospel of Christ? Rather let us be ashamed that, in spite of God's provision, it has been so little in our lives what God meant it to be: the power of God unto salvation, a salvation which has development from faith to faith! Paul simply yielded himself and became in his own life a witness to all he taught; and thus his word had such wondrous might and power. Paul when he preached was filled with the Holy Ghost. Let us yield up ourselves as he yielded himself and then our lives, too, shall be a witness to the power of the Gospel which shall convince others, and so we shall not have lived in vain.

ANCIENT SCROLLS IN CASE.

DURING Paul's stay at Corinth he found time to dictate to Tertius the letter which, in our Bibles, bears the title of the Epistle to the Romans. It was written about the year 58, when Paul was getting ready to leave Corinth to go to Jerusalem. Some scholars have doubted whether it was addressed to the Christians in Rome, as the greetings and other expressions in the sixteenth chapter are not such as would be used by a man who had not been in Rome. Besides, Aquila and Priscilla, who are mentioned, were as we know from the Acts, not in Rome at the time, but in Ephesus. The truth seems to be that it was an encyclical letter, intended to be read in various churches. Its natural ending is the close of the fifteenth chapter. The tone changes with the beginning of the sixteenth, from the distant and polite phraseology of the courteous stranger to the familiar words of one having an intimate acquaintance with the persons addressed. That chapter was probably added to the copy of the letter which went to Ephesus and was not on the one sent to Rome. If all the tried friends mentioned by name in that chapter had been living in Rome, Paul would not have had to complain, three years afterwards, as he does (II.Tim. 4: 16), that no one stood by him in his extremity. The character of the letter confirms this theory. It is a manifesto, or declaration of the doctrines and principles of Paul's preaching and an elaborate defence of his contention that the Gentiles need not obey the Jewish law. Thus it was of interest to the whole church and Paul would naturally wish that it should reach every convert, both Jew and Gentile. It presents also, in a closely reasoned argument, Paul's conception of the principles of God's dealing with the world from the beginning, on which he bases his doctrine of the universality of sin, the need of a universal remedy, the absurdity of the Jews trying to maintain exclusive religious privileges, and the philosophic soundness of the distinctive principle of what he calls his Gospel—the principle that no man can be saved by obedience to the law, or by good works, but only by the exercise of faith. It is the most profound and logical book of the Bible, a recondite treatise on abstract truths. Peter had probably been reading a copy of it when he said that his beloved brother Paul wrote "some things hard to be understood."

I make mention of you always in my prayer. No one knows the limit of what God can and will do when one who loves him and whom he loves appeals to him. "When I was a child in the Sabbath school in the old country," said a Christian lady, "my faithful teacher used to say, 'I have prayed too much for my class for one of them to be lost.' I was a thoughtless girl at the time, and remember wondering at it and thinking it a very self-confident remark. She is so sure. 'I shall have them all,' she would say. 'I shall say to Christ at the judgment,' "Here am I and the class thou hast given me." "And were they all converted?" I asked. "Yes; she did not live to see it, but my eyes have seen it—the last of sixteen gathered into the fold."

Comforted by mutual faith. The influence of association is more potent that we can estimate. Even the great Apostle expected to receive benefit as well as to impart it in association with people of like faith. A story is told of a gentleman who had a valuable singing canary. A friend wanted to see if he could teach his sparrows to sing by keeping the canary with them. He borrowed it and placed it in the cage with the sparrows. Instead, however, of teaching them to sing, the poor bird got so timid among the strange birds that it stopped singing altogether, and did nothing but chirp like the sparrows. The owner then took it back, but still it would not sing. It then occurred to him to put it beside any canary which sang well. This had the desired effect; the old note, was sung as before.

"Give him a cheer," said one in a crowd gathered round a great conflagration, as he saw a fireman falter for a moment at the final effort that was needed to save a life. "Give him a cheer," and as the admiring huzza was raised the heart of the brave hero gathered new courage, so that he succeeded in his noble endeavor. Just in the same way the sympathy of any gathering or audience bears up a speaker as the water does the ship upon the waves. There is a constant action and reaction between the orator and his hearers. As Mr. Gladstone once put it, "He gets from them in vapor that which he gives back to them in flood."

I'm not ashamed of the Gospel. Something more than fifty years ago there was a dinner party in the West End of London. The ladies had withdrawn and under the guidance of one member of the company, the conversation took a turn of which it will be enough here and now to say that it was utterly dishonorable to Jesus Christ our Lord. One of the guests said nothing, but presently asked the host permission to ring the bell, and when the servant appeared he ordered his carriage. He then with the courtesy of perfect self-command expressed his regret at being obliged to retire, but explained that he was still a Christian. Mark the phrase, for it made a deep impression at the time—"Still a Christian." Perhaps it occurs to you that the guest who was capable of this simple conrage must have been a bishop or at least a clergyman. The party was made up entirely of laymen and the guest in question became the great Prime Minister of the early days of the reign of Queen Victoria—he was the late Sir Robert Peel.

It is the power of God unto salvation. It saves from the power of sin as well as from the punishment of sin. "Have you ever heard the Gospel before?" asked an Englishman at Ningpo of a respectable Chinaman, whom he had not seen in his mission-room before. "No," he replied, "but I have seen it. I know a man who used to be a terror of his neighborhood. If you gave him a hard word he would shout at you, and curse you for two days and nights without ceasing. He was as dangerous as a wild beast, and a bad opium smoker; but when the religion of Jesus took hold of him he became wholly changed. He is gentle, moral, not soon angry, and has left off opium. Truly the teaching is good!"

Ruskin, in his Ethics of the Dust calls our attention to the silent forces of nature, which never appear so grand as when they transmute baser material into higher forms. We see the pool of slime transformed by the action of light and heat, repose and quiet so that the clay hardens into blue sapphire, the sand into burning opal, the soot into flashing diamond. And even Jesus never appears so glorious in loveliness as when we see him transforming the very filth and slime of society into gems.

The just shall live by faith. Spiritual strength is developed by faith. It is at first often very weak and faint, but when it is tried and is found to be justified by results the man who has trusted God for small things and has received them is encouraged to trust him for larger and ever larger blessings until he actually lives by faith. Sir Walter Scott relates, in his autobiography, that when he was a child one of his legs was paralyzed, and when medical skill failed, a kind uncle induced him to exert the muscles of the powerless limb by drawing a pretty toy or something that the child wanted before him on the floor, tempting him to creep after it, and thus keeping up and gradually increasing vital action and muscular force. So God deals with us in our spiritual childhood and the weakness of faith. He holds the blessings before us, so as to tempt us to creep after them. How weak our efforts, how slow our movements. But spiritual vitality is developed, and strengthened by these efforts, slow and weak as they are.

A Nestorian Society.

Mr. Joel W. Abraham's Story of the Earnest and Self denying Work of a Society of Christian Young Men in Persia.

FROM Mr. Abraham, the young Nestorian compositor, who has been assisting Dr. Labaree in the production of the new Syriac Bible, as described in this journal on August 2, we have received a description of an interesting work about which little is known outside the boundaries of Persia. Probably no people at the present day have so many claims on the good - will and sympathy of Christians as these Nestorians. For more than three centuries they have been persecuted by the Mohammedans for clinging to their Christian name and faith. Their enemies took the cruel and effective means of rooting out their beliefs by depriving them of all educational facilities, destroying their schools and laying their theological seminary at Nesibin in ruins. The Mohammedan believed that if a few generations were born and grew up in absolute ignorance, Christianity would surely perish from among them. Thus deprived of the source of knowledge from books and without trained religious teachers, the Nestorians have gradually sunk into a debased and superstitious condition which is the grief and shame of the few enlightened people among them. Beside this mental and spiritual famine, the Nestorians have been leading a harassed life physically, through the depredations of their ancestral enemies the Koords who descending from the mountains burn their crops, steal their savings and remorselessly murder the men and outrage the women in their villages.

MR. JOEL W. ABRAHAM.

"But," says Mr. Abraham, in his quaint English, "the star of the hope now is rising and makes the heart of the Nestorian to overflow with joy and gratitude as well as with an earnest expectation for future. The watchman whispers in the ears of the Syrian a glorious greeting—the morning has dawn. The rays of the old spirit are reappearing shining from among the clouds of despondency. So the gratitude fills my heart to praise the Father, who by his infinite love opened the track from America to Persia. The ship which took the American missionaries about sixty years ago is to be considered, by any Nestorian the next to the floating boat of Noah. Even the high waves of the Atlantic stand as the hills of God's mercies for sailing the vessel of help from west to the east. Hallelujahs and Hosannas to the name of Emmanuel, who through the instrumentality of American missionaries has blessed my people."

One of the fruits of the labors of which Mr. Abraham thus gratefully speaks, is the organization of a society of Christian young men who have banded themselves together for aggressive work. They have taken the name of the Nestorian Reformation Society and are laboring earnestly for the enlightenment and conversion of their fellow-countrymen. The pioneer in the work was a young man named Rabi Oshana, who died in July of last year. After his conversion at the American mission-ary station he commenced missionary work on his own account among his associates. All the young men whom he knew before his conversion, or whom he could afterwards meet, were the objects of his persevering Christian effort. He could not rest until they knew the joy of conversion. He talked with them, read the Bible to them and prayed with them, until one after another he had led more than a score of them to Christ. He had access to homes that the missionary could not reach and his influence was greater than of a foreign preacher.

In the summer of 1890 these young men formed their society. It was a very simple matter. Twice a month they met together at the houses of the members in turn, being too poor to hire a room for the purpose. There they told for the encouragement of each other what God had done for their own souls and for the good of others through them. They arranged plans for future work, fixing on places where they could go with their message and consulting and advising as to the various spheres that were accessible. In several instances the young men undertook journeys on foot to places fifteen miles off, walking there and back after their day's work on the farm or shop, that they might carry the message of salvation to some dark district. Their earnestness in speaking of Christ to their business associates and to men and women whom they met in the streets attracted public notice and brought them much reproach. They were addressed by opprobrious epithets, were called, "the band of dervishes," "the association of crazy men," and at last, as they gained the respect and goodwill of the people, "Desta De Khoodata," that is, "the Reformation Society" which they accepted and adopted. One of the members who has been successful in the extremely difficult work of reaching the Moslems is a young physician. "The Society," Mr. Abraham says, "makes its collection once a year. Its members do their best in liberality of giving notwithstanding faithful in their duties to the churches where they belong and through the contribution of widow's mites the Society has established evangelists and other workers." Two missionary workers named Benjamin and Abshaloom were selected to give all their time to the Society's work. They penetrated to the settlements in the mountains of Khoordistan and into the Mohammedan districts. Another wide field was opened when recently Hakim Israiel, the young physician, previously mentioned, was invited by the Moslem governor to take up his residence in Ardabeel under government patronage with full liberty to preach Christianity. Mirza Ibrahim, whose martyrdom in a Moslem prison was recently described in this journal was also a valued member of the Society. An effort is now being made to secure a building for the Society, but at present it has no available funds.

The Dead Expositor.

The Loss Sustained by Christendom in the Recent Death of the Famous Biblical Scholar and Author, Dr. Samuel Cox.

THE many readers in this country of The Quest of the Chief Good, Salvator Mundi and other works expository of the books of the Bible will regret to hear of the death of their author, Rev. Samuel Cox, D. D. It was his delight to bring to bear the rich treasures of his learning, exploration, and scientific training on the difficult passages of the Bible. No effort was too great and no length of time too much in his opinion to be given to the study of some obscure chapter and he was singularly successful in discovering the real meaning of many passages which had previously puzzled Bible students. In his work on The Quest of the Chief Good he gave to the world for the first time a clear and vivid idea of the philosophy of the book of Ecclesiastes, presenting in connected lines the object and purpose and surroundings of its author and showing the lessons he designed to teach. Every reader of his work turns to the treatise of the old Hebrew philosopher with new interest and with the key in his hand to mysterious expressions which had previously been dark to him. Dr. Cox did similar service as to The Private Letters of Paul and John and to other books of the Bible, opening up their hidden beauties and explaining the force of passages which had not been perceived by readers so widely separated as we are, both by time and circumstance, from the writers.

Beside the service thus rendered by Dr. Cox, as an author, to Bible students, he laid the Christian world under an obligation by extensive editorial work. He established a monthly magazine called the Expositor which had an enormous circulation. During the ten years that he edited it, he sought in every university here and in England and Germany for men who had made a special study of Oriental languages and literature, antiquarians and philologists and any one who could throw light on the idioms of the original languages in which the books of the Bible were written, or accurately describe the lands and times of the Bible writers. From these scholars he obtained contributions of inestimable value to the pages of his magazine. His extreme liberality and his determination to follow truth wherever he found it, were rare qualities in a theologian and they led to many of his friends deserting him. Some who agreed with the views he expressed deplored his stating them publicly. But Dr. Cox was an ardent lover of truth and scorned to pretend to believe anything that he knew to be untrue, or to keep back any portion of the truth from his readers. It was better, he believed, to take the public into his confidence and to let them know that some treasured articles of faith could no longer be defended in the light of modern science, than to allow them to get the information from the enemies of the Bible. Thus his readers learned to look on the Bible in a new light but one quite as valuable as the old aspect and vastly more intelligent. From the position he took no infidel could drive him, because he frankly admitted that the Bible was not given to teach science, but to do a work that science could never do, in leading men to heaven. Young men who had studied in the Universities and who were inclined to abandon Christianity as untenable, found that the old religion, as Dr. Cox taught it, was eternally true and under his guidance renewed their hold upon it with confidence and vigor. Numbers of them, who are serving Christ in the church and in the world, were thus saved by him from infidelity. But the prejudices of the party opposed to him, composed of timid men and bigoted and ignorant men, finally triumphed and the Expositor was wrested from his hands.

THE LATE REV. S. COX, D. D.

Dr. Cox belonged to a family highly respected in the city of London, who were at the head of an extremely lucrative business. The highest place in the firm might have been his; but he deemed the work of Bible exposition infinitely preferable, and he turned his back resolutely on business. His early business training, however, was valuable to him in his ministerial and literary work, giving him a knowledge of the difficulties business men have to meet and the obstacles which prevent their acceptance of religion. When finally he was permitted to prepare for the ministry he devoted himself with so much ardor to his studies that his health was undermined and his first services to the Church, like his last, were rendered with his pen. He was nearly thirty-seven years old when, in 1863, he accepted the pastorate of a Baptist Church in the busy manufacturing city of Nottingham. The value of his preaching was speedily realized, not only by the educated and cultured classes of the community, but by the intelligent working men who admired the honesty of the preacher and his sound common-sense. For twenty-five years he labored there, his powers and popularity increasing from year to year. The fidelity of his people to him never wavered and it became more personal and more affectionate when he was assailed by men among his brethren who were opposed to his progressive spirit. During the last few years of his pastorate, his church provided an assistant for him, but in 1888 his voice completely failed and his resignation was reluctantly accepted. He retired to Hastings, where the asthmatic affection from which he suffered was relieved by the soft southern air and for a time his health so far improved as to permit of active literary work. He issued in quick succession, A Commentary on Job; A Commentary on Ruth, the House and its Builder and other works of rare value. The last named which he called "a book for the doubtful," has been especially useful in leading sceptically inclined thinkers to Christ. He continued his work until the close of last year, when increasing infirmities compelled him to lay down his pen. Since that time he failed rapidly, and during the remaining months of his life deplored his inability to do work which he ardently longed to do. He was in his sixty-seventh year, and while his mind was active and his spirit full of faith and joy, his physical frame was so completely worn out that he welcomed death as a relief.

OCEAN GROVE'S NEW AUDITORIUM.

The last services in the old Auditorium at Ocean Grove were held on Sept. 10. The present structure, which cost 7,500 and seats 4,200, will now be torn down and replaced by a splendid $50,000 auditorium, nearly the whole amount for which has been subscribed. The first auditorium at the Grove cost about $400 and had a seating capacity of 175. Since the organization of the Camp Meeting Association over twenty years ago, the attendance has increased every year.

NEWSPAPER READING.

WE cannot read all nor half that comes to us in the public journals. If our time be limited, take the editorials which are a summation of important events. Take the reports of educational, artistic and religious meetings. Do not sit down to a banquet of arsons, and manslaughter, and divorce cases. What you read in the newspapers finally decides your character. The newspaper is the library of the great masses of the people, and out of it they must make their selection. Read chiefly those parts of the paper which are best calculated to improve you. Read what will make you better, not what will make you worse. We are not worthy of citizenship unless we keep our eyes open to the events which affect the welfare of the country where we live. But gossip, whether on the tongue of the gadabout or printed in newspaper column, will improve neither body, mind, or soul. It takes all kinds of information to make a newspaper; but we are not expected to devour all, any more than when a man sits at the table he is expected to eat everything on it, making no distinction between sugar and salt, sweet oil and vinegar. There are many things that do for spicery that it will not do to take in large quantities. We want more common sense in newspaper perusal. What a mighty advantage it gives us all, twice a day to feel the pulse of all Christendom; the morning papers telling us how the world is at daybreak, the evening papers telling us how the world is at sundown. What opportunities we have of watching the world's progress. We do not have to go out and hang on our neighbor's gate and ask him the news. In a crumpled roll it is flung into our doorway, and we hear, as though it were on the next street, an explosion in Russia, the crack of a revolver in Omaha, the wreck of a rail-train at Ashtabula, the fall of the speaker's gavel at Washington. All the world so near together, we ought to have an all-embracing sympathy. So much intelligence implies a corresponding responsibility. I suppose God is preparing all these newspapers and telegraphic wires and railroads so as to make quick work of the world's final evangelization. The Bible idea of nations born in a day is by most people taken as figurative. I take it as literal. All the oceans cabled, all the continents strung together with telegraphic wire, sometime in one hour all nations may get the Gospel call, and the next morning or evening papers have for head-lines the names of ten or twenty nations born unto God that day. The batteries are all planted, the pulpit, the scientific press, the electric battery. When once at God's command they open their united fire, the fortresses of sin will tumble and the banners of Emmanuel float triumphant.

DEADLY WEAPONS.

IT is a wicked folly that many of our young men are getting so familiar with fire-arms. Hundreds and thousands of our young men carry weapons of death — pistols and sword-canes. Many of our young men think it ineffably smart to throw back the lappel of the coat, as by accident, until you see the glitter of the death weapon, or turn down the head of the cane so that you discover the keen edge underneath the knob of the cane. If a man is going out among Bedouin savages, or is to be on police duty in the Fourth Ward, I say let him have club, knife, derringer; but you have no right, with firearms or the weapons of death, to be moving amid the peaceful society of our American cities. Beside that, it is a mark of a contemptible coward. What a chicken liver instead of a heart you must have that you have to be armed in order to walk through Fulton street or Broadway! There is a certain kind of man who ought never to have a pistol in his pocket, or under his pillow, or anywhere in the house from garret to cellar, and that is the young man or the old man who has a violent temper. To say nothing of a revolver, it seems to me it is dangerous for you to have so much as a percussion cap or a ramrod! You carry a pistol, when suddenly, in a moment of insane fury, you may do something that you will be sorry for through time and through eternity. With such a temper as you have, to carry a weapon of death is as unwise as to put gunpowder and lucifer matches in the same vest pocket.

The ordinary citizen in the next one hundred years, will need no firearms. Ten lives are lost every year through the accidental discharge of firearms where there is one life saved by being armed. Away with your pistols and guns and sword-canes! If you are afraid to go down the street without them, ask your grandmother to go with you! She will conquer all your assailants with scissors and knitting needle. This complete puppyism that cannot live in a respectable neighborhood without being armed with deadly weapons ought to be spanked and sent to bed before sundown. It is an awful thing to take human life. Have nothing about you that in a moment of altercation, may become, under the impulse of sudden temper set on fire of the devil, the means of appalling crime.

A WORD FOR NEWSBOYS.

ALL hail to the newsboys of these cities. I never pass them without wanting to buy out their whole stock of goods, and send them home to rest from their labors. Treat them well, and sometimes do not wait for the change when there are two or three cents over. Open the way for the young governors. That was well done when in the old Sun building in New York, in March, 1854, the first lodging-house for newsboys was opened, furnishing them a good bed for six cents, a supper for four cents, and a free bath; and these lads who had lodged nights under stairways, and in boxes, and hay-barges, and on steam-gratings, were made comfortable through Christian philanthropy, so that the conversation of these boys the first night in the new lodging house was overheard as they said: "It's most as good as steam-gratings!" "What soft beds these is!" "Jim, this is rather better than bumming, eh?" Yea, a night-school was opened for them, and religious songs were taught to them, and the eyes of these lads who had been so kicked and cuffed of the world were blinded with tears, as Christian voices, accompanied by a melodeon, sang:

There's a light in the window for thee, brother!
There's a light in the window for thee!

The New York Boys' Lodging-house in eighteen years, at an expense of $131,888 lodged 91,326 different boys. The boys themselves put in savings banks during that time, $25,141,35. Blessed be the men and women who have these newsboys' lodging-houses of our cities under their care and patronage. This kindness has already furnished for bar and pulpit, and medical profession and high political place able and useful men.

THE most of the capitalists do not think for themselves; the most of the laborers do not think for themselves. There are boss capitalists and boss laborers who want their way. Indeed, the human family is divided into two classes—those who boss and those who get bossed. Capital will never help itself by fighting labor, and labor will never get any advantage from combating capital.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

R. Stracke, Cleveland, O. What countries are yet closed to missionaries and the preaching of the Gospel?

Thibet and a few of the countries of Central Asia, the interior of China, and parts of Central Africa. While vast districts still await the Gospel, probably no country can be said, as a whole, to be closed against it.

D. W. Johnson, Cottesbury. "Can you tell me who is the author of the following and where I can find the whole poem?"

Columbus was a sailor brave,
The first that crossed the Atlantic's wave,
In fourteen hundred and ninety-two;
He came to view the ocean blue
Where ne'er a ship had sailed before,
He found a wild and savage shore,
Where naked men in forests prowled
And bears and panthers roamed and howled.

Reader, Springbrook, N. Y. 1. Who was Confucius? 2. Who was the author of the "Golden Rule?"

1. A Chinese reformer and moralist, born about 500 years before Christ. 2. He was the author of the famous maxim: "What you would not wish done to yourself, that do not to others," which has been modernized into its present form and denominated the "Golden Rule." Our Saviour spiritualized it in his memorable words: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Mark 12: 31. Another and more literal expression of the same idea is found in the sermon on the Mount. (see Matt. 7: 12.)

J. E. Bozeman, Bells Depot, Tenn. 1. Can the discrepancies in the genealogies of Christ given by Matthew and Luke be reconciled? 2. What is the meaning of Matt. 24: 34?

1. Many theories have been advanced by learned men to account for the divergence, but the most probable one is that which is based on a discovery among Jewish records. It is found that Mary was spoken of by the Jews as the daughter of Heli. Thus Heli would be Christ's grandfather. If now you turn to Luke 3: 23 you find Heli mentioned in that relation, but with Joseph as the representative of the intermediate generation. But the phraseology is peculiar. As Luke knew very well, and is at some pains to state, Jesus was not, as was supposed, the son of Joseph. If the verse is read, as the original permits, "Jesus being (the reputed) son of Joseph (but in reality) of Heli," that is descended from Heli, you have the key to the solution. If this rendering is correct, as is now generally believed, Luke is tracing the genealogy of Mary while Matthew traces that of Joseph. 2. "This generation" refers to the generation of which Christ had been speaking. The meaning is that the generation which sees the beginning of the troubles will see the end. Their course would be very rapid.

W. H. McCormack, Leesburg, Fla. Is it an undisputed fact that the Saviour used wine in instituting the Lord's Supper? If so, would it not be wrong to use any other beverage at the Communion now?

The fact so far as we know is undisputed. It was the common drink of the country and the time, so that the probabilities are in its favor. It has also been the universal custom in the Church from the beginning and will doubtless so continue. There would, however, be nothing wrong in substituting another beverage if there was good reason for so doing. The purpose Christ had in view of a meal eaten in [illegible] by his followers as a sign of their common brotherhood in faith and love of him would be fulfilled, whatever elements were used. Nothing was more foreign to the principles he enunciated than the tendency that is prevalent to observe minute details ceremonial and otherwise while neglecting the spirit of which the ceremony is only the visible expression.

Carrie L. Porteus, Sucker Brook, N. Y. Why do not the Jews offer sacrifices now as they did in Bible times?

They have no temple now. They worship in synagogues and sacrifices were not offered in synagogues. Besides this, they have learned, as their later prophets taught them, that God does "not delight in the blood of bullocks or of lambs." (See Isaiah 1: 11—18; Micah 6: 6—8.)

M. I. Kenyon, Hoggansburgh, N. Y. Can you give me the names of Jesus' sisters?

Their names are not given in the Gospels so that we have no reliable authority. That he had sisters, we learn from Matt. 13: 56 and Mark 6: 3. The identity of his natural relationships is, however, of little importance since he regarded spiritual relationship as much closer. "Whoso doeth the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Mark 3: 35.)

John H. Sherrard, Rockville, Ind. When was the present formula of baptism adopted? I find in Acts 2: 38, that the Apostles baptized in the name of Jesus.

We suppose it was adopted from the beginning of Apostolic times. Christ gave the formula now used just before his ascension. (See Matt. 28: 19.) The historian of the Acts probably omitted part of the formula in his narrative as he regarded the acceptance of Jesus by the convert and his own confession of him by baptism as the important fact, just as we now speak of Christian baptism.

Subscriber, Boston, Mass. Would a person be committing sin in being baptized by immersion on making profession of faith if as an infant he had already been baptized by sprinkling?

There would be no sin in so doing. He would be ratifying by his own volition the dedicatory act of his parents. If he prefers to make public profession of faith by baptism by immersion, or if he has arrived at the conclusion that it is his duty to do so, there is nothing in the former ceremony to prevent his being baptized again. The important question is as to his having saving faith in Christ. The time and mode of baptism are of infinitely less importance.

Subscriber, Philadelphia. Please inform me 1.) where the Bank of Ilium existed 2co B. C., and (2.), where in the Bible does it read of regulating interests rates?

1. History leaves no doubt that in Ilium, as in other great cities, banks flourished centuries before the Saviour's birth. Recently discovered monuments of ancient Babylon furnish evidence that banking existed in the cities of Assyria as early as 600 B. C. In the reign of Nabupal-assar there was a national banking firm doing business under the name of Egibi & Son, and they even issued a banking almanac, giving the rates of interest. Equally conclusive evidence of ancient Greek and Roman banking is not wanting. 2. See Exod. 22: 25; Deut. 23: 19, 20; Lev. 25: 36, 37, and other passages.

An Eager Questioner. 1. Has Matthew 24: 14 been fulfilled? If not in what part of the world is it unfulfilled? 2. If a girl, who is over age is a Christian and wishes to join a Christian Church, is forbidden to do so by her parents, what is her duty?

1. The passage you mention does not say that every part of the world is to be Christianized, but that the Gospel is to be preached everywhere as a witness. In Thibet and some other parts of Asia and the interior of Africa the people have not yet heard of the Gospel. 2. She must make public profession of her faith. Her duty to Christ is superior to her duty to her parents. But she should do it affectionately and with deference, not defiantly. She should explain to her parents how her conscience requires her to disobey them and to say frankly how sorry she is to oppose them in the matter. If she is and has been obedient in other matters they are not likely to continue their opposition and she must prove by her conduct that in all else she is a dutiful daughter.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

PEARY IN THE ARCTIC.

DISPATCHES from Lieut. Peary reached New York a few days ago. They were brought to St. John's, Newfoundland, by the Falcon, the vessel that took him out, and thence sent on by telegraph. They report the explorer and his party, safe and well in the quarters where they are to spend the winter. The house which they took with them had been put up in a sheltered place at Falcon Harbor, near the head of Bowdoin Bay, which is about seven hundred miles from the North Pole. An expedition was made, while the ship was there, northward to Whale Sound to obtain walrus and eider ducks for food for men and dogs during the winter. Peary hopes also to capture some reindeer which will serve for food. A large party of Esquimaux have moved near to the explorer's settlement, who will help in the hunting expedition. Lieut. Peary speaks hopefully of his prospects and is sanguine of success in his effort to penetrate farther north than any previous explorer. When the Falcon left him on Aug. 20, he was busily preparing for the long winter night. His party consists of his wife and her maid; Dr. E. Vincent, the surgeon; Mr. W. S. Swain, the secretary; F. W. Stokes, the artist; G. H. Clarke, taxidermist; E. B. Baldwin, meteorologist, and five general helpers. During this month the men and the burros and the eighty-four dogs were to carry a quantity of provisions to an ice camp in the interior for use when the expedition starts northward in the spring. Peary expects to return to Bowdoin Bay to meet the Falcon, which is to go there next summer and bring the party home. On the way north, a call was made at Upernavik, the most northerly Danish settlement but one, to ascertain if anything had been heard of Mr. Verhoeff who was lost on Peary's former expedition and who it was thought might have been found by the Esquimaux. No tidings of him were obtained. Upernavik consists of two houses for the use of the Danish governor and his assistant, and about twenty-five native huts. The inhabitants about a hundred in number, seemed, Peary says, a miserable, poverty-stricken set of people and the water trickling from the melting snow on the adjacent mountains passed through the village making it very muddy and unhealthy. At Cape York and at other points, further inquiries were made for Mr. Verhoeff but without success and there is now no doubt that he must have fallen into some crevasse. His is another of the many lives that have been sacrificed in those Arctic regions in the cause of science. Lieut. Peary and his companions know that their lives are also in danger, but they risk them cheerfully, knowing that if they succeed their names will be famous through all time. Far higher, however, is the reward promised to the Christian who as a missionary risks his life to add new realms to Christ's kingdom for his name will be held in everlasting remembrance. (1. Cor. 9: 25.)

A Business-like Bridegroom.

A large party of guests assembled in the warehouse of a shoe-dealer in Brooklyn, on the evening of August 28, to witness the marriage of a Hungarian girl to one of the shoe-dealer's friends. The party was composed chiefly of Hungarians and both bride and bridegroom were popular among them. The bride and the clergyman were there, but the bridegroom did not come. The guests amused themselves for nearly two hours, expecting the missing man to arrive at any moment. As he did not come, one of the party volunteered to go in search of him. He returned in a short time and reported that he had found him in his working-clothes busy on a pair of shoes. Being asked if he had forgotten his wedding, he replied that he had not, but one of his customers wanted the shoes in a hurry, so he was finishing them. "Business is business," the man had said stolidly, "I am making money now, I can get married at any time." Nothing would induce him to leave his work; but, when he had finished it, he put on his best clothes and took the shoes to his customer. Then he went to his friend's store, where the bride and guests were patiently waiting and was married. It was a pity that a man so devoted to money-making should ever have married. If the bride had been wise, she would have perceived that she did not occupy the place in his heart she ought to hold and would have declined the lower place. Many men treat Christ as this man treated his bride, but none who do so are accepted of him. (Matt. 10: 37, 38.)

In a Swamp All Night.

A four-year-old child had a painful experience in Jersey City, N. J., a few days ago. Some one gave him a few pennies to buy candy and his mother allowed him to go a few blocks away to make his investment. He bought his candy and being interested in something that was going on in the street he lingered around contentedly chewing it. It was getting dusk when he started to return home and a storm was coming on. He hurried, but he was in a thinly settled neighborhood where there are many vacant lots and in crossing one of them he missed his way. Finding that he was getting away from the houses he turned back, but in the darkness could recognize no familiar landmarks. He wandered around for some time and then went down an avenue at the foot of which there is some ground that during the recent high tides has been flooded. The little fellow could not see where he was going and was soon up to his ankles in the soft mud. He struggled to get out, but only sank deeper until he was up to his waist. Then he ceased struggling and began to cry. His hands were kept busy killing the mosquitoes for some time, but when a strong wind blew he was relieved of that plague. He was in the swamp all night, while his parents were searching the city for him. In the morning, some boys passing the swamp heard his cries and rescued him. It is thought the hardy little fellow will escape serious consequences from his adventure. So much cannot be said for those children of God who go after the sweets of worldly pleasure, wander off in the darkness and get lost in the swamps of sin. Although they may be restored, their after life is marred by the bitter recollection of their wandering. Peter, although forgiven by his Lord, could not forget his fall and "when he thought thereon, he wept." (Mark 14: 72.)

UPERNAVIK, THE DANISH SETTLEMENT VISITED BY LIEUT. PEARY.

Women as Life-Savers.

A gallant rescue of a shipwrecked crew in which three ladies rendered valuable assistance is reported from Point Lookout. One of the ladies is the daughter of the captain of the life-saving station and the other two were friends of her's, who, with a boy, the son of one of them, walked out to the station to see the effect of the storm of August 29. While they were watching the great waves beating on the beach, a ship was observed about half a mile off with a sorm-sail set. The gale was still raging and the spray from the gigantic billows filled the air with spray like a fog. It could be seen however that she was being driven in shore farther by every wave that lifted her. The captain, watching her through his glass made out eleven men clinging to the bowsprit and presently announced that her masts had gone and the vessel was breaking up. As the life-saving crew does not go on duty until September 1, it appeared that nothing could be done to help them. The ladies, however, begged the captain to make the attempt and promised to help. The captain of the Long Beach life-saving station came along at that time and the watchman of the station was also on hand. Usually eight strong men are needed to draw the beach-wagon into the surf, but the little party ran it out, the women pulling at the ropes with the others. The tiny cannon was fired and the life-line went zig-zagging into the air and fell right across the bowsprit of the storm-beaten vessel. The men clinging to it understood what was being done and made the line fast. Then the breeches buoy was sent along. A boy was the first to come ashore and then the other members of the crew followed in quick succession, the captain last. The women worked on the returning lines like a well drilled crew, pulling at the ropes until their hands were blistered and bleeding, without a word of complaint. When the last man was saved all three sat down on the beach and cried. They were tears of joy, such tears as many a woman will shed when the last of her children, or the last member of her Sunday School class is saved from sin and Satan. She may be on the heavenly shore then and if so, God himself will wipe her tears away. (Rev. 7: 17.)

Fighting at a Fire.

An incident occurred at a recent fire in New York which is likely to cost two men their positions. When the alarm was sent out the fire had made little headway. A fire engine was promptly on the scene and one of the firemen made his way to a room on the third floor of the building immediately over the room to which the fire, which was in the basement, was eating its way. The tenant, who occupied the room, was away at his work and had locked his door, but it was quickly broken open and the flooring ripped up. The tenant returned and finding two men in his room, one of whom was a fireman and the other a policeman in citizens' clothes, he was angry. Looking around the disordered room, he missed a pocket-book containing ten dollars and charged the two men with stealing it. The fireman said to the policeman with significant emphasis, "You were here first." The policeman answered in kind and in a minute the two men were fighting. The tenant left them and they continued fighting while the fire burned. In a short time the room grew too hot to be safe and both men retreated, the fireman incapacitated for duty and the policeman showing marks of punishment. Eventually the fire was put out, but a great deal more damage was done than would have been done had the fireman been allowed to do his work. After the fire was extinguished, the tenant found the missing pocket-book among the debris. So the fight was useless as well as mischievous; the vindication of their honesty would have come in due time had they been content to go on doing their duty and wait for it. The incident and its lesson may be commended to the notice of the Christian ministers and people who are engaged in fighting with each other, while the fire of scepticism and sin and misery which they ought to be trying to extinguish is gaining ground. (Phil. 1: 15-17).

An Artist Criticising his Work.

Among the passengers on the steamer La Champagne which arrived at New York a few days ago from France was M. Bartholdi, the sculptor, whose gigantic statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World" adorns the harbor of New York. Mr. Bartholdi has come to visit the World's Fair and to take an extensive tour through the country. He has not been here since 1886 and so has not seen his work in its completion with the electric light attachment. On being asked what he thought of it, he confessed his disappointment. It did not look near so imposing as he had expected, nor did it show as well at night as he thought it would have done. The climate, he thought, did not suit it, as it had worn away considerably under the winds and storms of the winters. He said that a high mound should have been built on the island for the base of the statue, to raise it twenty feet. The bronze of the statue did not show well against the dark background of the city, and he regretted that the figure had not been gilded. He suggested that at least it should be varnished to save it from further decay. Some of the work that is done here in our churches may seem similarly disappointing when it is viewed in its place in the light of the last day. Some of it though highly esteemed of men, we are told, will be so unsatisfactory that it will be destroyed. (I Cor. 3: 12, 13.)

BRIEF NOTES.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

The opium-smoking shops in Bombay have been closed, so that opium-smokers can only smoke in private houses.

Rev. E. S. Billings, State evangelist of Nebraska, has returned from the summer school at Chicago Seminary and has begun his campain with the church at Pierce, Neb.

The Bible Society for Russia during the past year has disposed of 56,556 copies of the sacred Scriptures. The colporteurs have traversed the wilds of Siberia in their work.

The Olivet Presbyterian Chutch, on Clybourne Avenue, Chicago, has established a creche or day nursery, as an aid to poor women working out by the day, and a kindergarten is also contemplated.

The Rev. George William Knox, D.D., the famous Presbyterian Missionary in Japan, landed at San Francisco, Saturday, August 12, with his family, for a brief period of rest and recuperation. He has been fifteen years away from his native land.

The Board of Managers of the American Bible Society held their regular monthly meeting on Sept. 7. The report showed that during the preceding month 80,024 volumes had been issued. Grants of Bibles to the value of $8,845 were made. This sum includes $1,000 for colporteurs' expenses.

A Ladies' Settlement on the plan of the College Settlements has been organized in London. Christian ladies desiring to work among the poor, can live there for long or short periods and engage in visiting and philanthropic work on systematic plans. The superintendent is Miss Magee, daughter of the late Archbishop of York.

Rev. B. Fay Mills commences a series of services at Binghampton, N. Y., on October 3. A large hall which will accommodate 3500 persons has been erected for the meetings. The city has been thoroughly canvassed, a choir trained and prayer meetings held preparatory to Mr. Mills' coming. A great blessing is expected.

Mr. D. L. Moody told a reporter of the Chicago Record that the results of his effort during the holding of the World's Fair had thus far exceeded his expectations. "I have never," he said, "seen such eagerness to hear the Gospel. We had over 50,000 persons at our services last Sunday and several thousands more who came could not get in. Men and women of all classes have been converted."

A cable message to the press from London states that Miss Frances E. Willard's health has broken down and that the physician whom she has consulted has ordered complete rest with no public speaking for a year. Miss Willard's temperance word in England has been of a very agitating nature, owing to the division in the Woman's Union, occasioned by the introduction of politics into the programme.

A correspondent in Toronto, writes, "Some time ago the Toronto Street Car Comany agitated for Sunday cars and held some public meetings for this object. They prevailed on the Mayor and City Corporation to take a special vote of the city on the matter, which vote was taken on Saturday, August 26; meetings having been held almost every evening in different parts of the city by the parties, both for and against. Christian ministers and others taking the side against the cars and also preaching sermons on the subject. The churches and Christian Endeavor Societies held prayer-meetings and did all they could against this which would only be the beginning of a worse desecration of the Sabbath. At the close of the voting day, greatly to the consternation of those in power, there was a majority against the cars of about fifteen hundred."

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

SOME INSPIRED "WITHOUTS."

Sermon Preached in the Calvary Baptist Church, New York last Sunday morning, Sept. 17, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

THERE is a distinct gain at times, at least, in the method of pulpit treatment introduced by some popular evangelists and known as Bible Readings. But there is danger in the method often advocated and practiced of following one word through many passages and books of Scripture; nevertheless within proper limitations this method also may be profitably adopted. In this spirit on this occasion the word "without" in several important connections will be discussed. The aim is to present the passages in which the word is found in their logical rather than in their chronological relations. Beginning, then, with the entrance of the soul upon the Christian life we follow the word as it is found in passages of Scripture relating to the development and activity of that life.

Without Blood.

"Without shedding of blood is no remission." (Heb. 9: 22). The writer of this book is here setting forth what is one of his great objects in the book as a whole. The relation of the new dispensation to the old is admirably illustrated in this epistle; indeed, it is impossible to fully understand either without comprehending both. In the passage before us we see that almost all things are by the law purified by blood. This is a truth that is taught constantly on the pages of both Testaments; it is a truth which sets forth in its proper importance the atoning death of Jesus Christ. To set forth this truth the law taught us in various symbols the importance of remission by blood. Some things, however, the apostle here teaches us, and we are also taught elsewhere, are purified by fire, and still others by water. But the remission of sins was universally associated with the shedding of blood. So far as the pardon of human guilt is concerned there is no exception to this great law. It holds in this regard always and everywhere. We have no reason to believe that sin is ever forgiven except as the result of the shedding of blood. No instance can be cited on the authority of Scripture of the forgiveness of human guilt except as the result of the shedding of blood. It would be impossible to name any one of God's relations to men more universal than this. If a man is to be saved his salvation must be secured in harmony with this divine law. If a man rejects that principle there is no other, so far as we know, on which he can base his hope of salvation. To set forth this truth was one of the great objects of the Old Testament dispensation; for it was a truth taught among Jews as truly as among Christians. And it is not difficult for us to discover the reason for this law. Every sinner has virtually forfeited his life by his transgression against God, and because of his transgression the law of God requires his death. Life is the blood, and the blood of the victim is shed as a substitute for the life of the sinner. In harmony with this principle the victims offered in sacrifice typified the great sacrifice of Christ. He gave his life for the life of men; and because of his death all men, if they accept the offers of his mercy, may be saved. This element in our holy religion has been made the subject of satirical comment and of fierce opposition. Many have [illegible] theology." We accept the sneering definition. [illegible] death of Jesus Christ, and we look forward to the time when we shall sing the song of the Lamb that was slain. I ask you now in the presence of this great sacrifice, will you trample on the blood of Jesus Christ as an unholy thing? Do not forget that the Bible attributes the blessings of salvation to the blood of Jesus Christ. If we have redemption it is through his sacrifice; if we are justified it is by his death; if we are washed it is in this fountain of cleansing; if we have victory it is through the blood of the Lamb; and if we are admitted with the white-robed throng into heaven it is because we have been cleansed in the blood of the Lamb. We can sing now:

> Let the water and the blood,
> From thy wounded side that flowed,
> Be of sin the double cure;
> Cleanse me from its guilt and power.

Without Faith

"Without faith it is impossible to please him (God)." Heb. 11: 6. We now advance a step. If we have been admitted into the Christian life our great aim will be to please God, our Father and our Redeemer. We shall recognize this duty as our highest ambition and our most inspiring motive. But without an active faith, one which enables us to walk with God and to become like God, it is impossible that we can please him. In this chapter we have glorious tributes to the heroes and heroines of faith; and right in the midst of these historic examples of faith comes the general truth quoted at the head of this paragraph. We can readily understand that it is impossible to please God except we manifest utter confidence in his promises, his wisdom, and his love. We certainly must believe that he is, before we can please him, or render him any form of service; for if we deny his existence necessarily all relations to him at once cease. We must also, in order to make him rightly guide all our lives, believe that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him. If we do not believe that God answers our prayers or notices our lives we can have no encouragement even to pray or rightly to live. The principle laid down here with reference to God is true in other relations of life as well as in religion. It is quite certain that no child can please his parents except he reposes faith in their word and manifests trust in their wisdom and affection. It is equally true in the marriage relation.

The Basal Principle

of joy in married life is mutual confidence resulting in affection. Those whom we cannot trust we certainly cannot love. Trust precedes and presupposes all love worthy of the name. If a man will not believe the Word of the living God, how can he please God? It is a fearful thing for a man to declare even in the act that he will not believe the promises nor the threatenings of the eternal Jehovah. However much one may be disposed to doubt his fellow men, let no one dare doubt the Word of the Almighty. So doubting him we make him, as the Scripture has taught us, a liar. Surely men who take this position do not stop to realize the responsibility they assume, the infidelity they cherish, and the rebellion of which they are guilty. All the relations of business and friendship would be impossible but for the faith which men repose in each other. The whole world runs on the wheels of faith; destroy this faith and you practically annihilate this world. Every time a merchant sells a bill of goods, or engages in almost any other business transaction he illustrates the power of faith. You cannot insult a man more than to express doubt as to his word. Is not the same thing true of God? And yet men constantly doubt his Word, determinedly refuse to listen to his warnings, and recklessly reject his tender invitations and despise his sacred promises. If men they would forsake their sins and become his dear children. If there be a hearer or reader of these words who is not a true Christian, he is guilty of the enormous crime of disbelieving the Word of the Almighty. Few men realize the enormity, the blackness, the heinousness of this heaven-defying and soul-destroying sin. It is a matter of such seriousness that I cannot avoid presenting it to you in this solemn way. How long are you to continue to doubt and to oppose God? How long will you make the God of all holiness, truth, and love a liar to his very face? I would scarcely use that expression were it not that the loving apostle John sets me the example. Oh, believe now that God is; that the eternal one is from everlasting to everlasting; and believe also that he rewards those who seek him; and that by the laws of eternal justice he must punish those who refuse the offers of his love, who deny his word, and who thus destroy their own souls.

Would but Believe God

Without Works.

"Faith without works is dead." James 2: 26. Having entered upon the Christian life, and having placed before you as an object of attainment the desire to please God, we now see in the Scripture just quoted the relation in which active service stands to the development of the Christian life. It is quite likely that when the apostle James wrote these words there were those who taught that men were saved by a formal faith in the one true God. He therefore shows us that the only faith which avails for salvation is accompanied by good works. He shows that a dead faith is practically no faith; and that wherever there is genuine faith there will be good living as its result. He has said nothing more than the apostle Paul has said in other forms in the second chapter of his epistle to the Romans. The apostle Paul often refutes the same Jewish error that is here opposed by James. Both practically assert that not the hearers but the doers of the law shall be justified. Both show that a knowledge of God's law without a corresponding performance of the same only increases our condemnation. We are in the passage before us taught that there is as much necessity that faith and works be united to constitute true religion as that body and soul be united to form a real man. As the body without the spirit is dead, so we are taught that faith without Christian works is dead also. It is absolutely certain both from the teachings of inspiration and from the nature of the case that where there is true faith there will also be good works. If good works are wanting we are safe in affirming that Faith is also Wanting.

James is not here nor anywhere arguing against genuine faith, but only against the supposition that mere formal and intellectual faith will save the soul. He shows that where there is the root of faith there will be flower and fruit in good works. Except a man believe in Christ he cannot be saved; and except his faith reveals itself in good works we have no reason to believe that he has saving faith. We may affirm that no man can be saved by good works; and we are equally warranted in saying that no man can be saved without good works. I never could see why men are so troubled by the supposed difference on this subject between James and Paul. Many infidels, and especially Voltaire, sneered at the imaginary contradiction between these two writers. At one time in his history Luther considered this difficulty to be insuperable, and so he was disposed to deny the inspiration of James. Later, however, he took a larger view of the subject and corrected his earliest teachings. If we look at the matter fairly we shall see that there is no contradiction between these two writers. Each wrote from his own point of view. Paul looks at the entire subject of faith in relation to an unconverted man; but James speaks of faith in relation to a man who is converted, who has entered upon the Christian life, and who ought to manifest the fruits of the faith which saves. The apostle Paul rightly teaches that a sinner is justified by faith, and the apostle James rightly affirms that the faith which justifies is not a mere speculative belief, not a formal and dead faith, but one which brings forth fruit in the development of character and in the performance of good works. Paul rightly teaches that whatever gifts or graces a man may have, if he have not true faith in Christ he cannot receive forgiveness and justification; James rightly teaches that whatever pretended faith a man may have, if he does not bring forth the fruits of the new life, this faith is without value. There is, therefore, whatever between these two writers. Each looks at the one subject from his own point of view; each could adopt the language of the other when his own view-point and ultimate purpose are admitted by the other. It would be easy to enlarge at considerable length upon this supposed contradiction but real harmony, but perhaps the points already stated sufficiently suggest the principle of reconciliation. Let us no longer cherish the idea of salvation if our faith does not bring forth the fruits of obedience to the Lord Jesus Christ. I can take my stand with the utmost earnestness beside Paul and say "amen" to every word he has written; and I can with equal earnestness and pleasure take my stand beside the apostle James and say "amen" to every word that he has written. The brilliant Frederick W. Robertson has, in his striking way, brought out the relation between faith and works as follows:

"Suppose I say 'A tree cannot be struck without thunder.' That is true; for there is never destructive lightning without thunder. But again, if I say, 'The tree was struck by lightning without thunder;' that is true, too, if I mean that the lightning alone struck it without the thunder striking it. Yet the two assertions seem contradictory. So in the same way Paul says, faith justifies without works; that is faith alone is that which justifies us, not works. There will be works with faith as there is thunder with lightning; but just as it is not the thunder, but the lightning which strikes the tree; so it is not the works which justify. Put it then in one sentence, faith alone justifies, but not the faith which is alone. Lightning alone strikes, but not the lightning which is alone without thunder, for that is only summer lightning and harmless."

Without Chastisement.

Without chastisement—not true sons. (See Heb. 12: 8.) We are now advancing in the Christian life. We have received remission through the shedding of blood, we possess the faith which pleases God and which manifests itself in the performance of good works, and we are now prepared to receive the chastisement which proves our sonship with God. Every true child of God must receive the training which corrects his faults, subdues his temper, rebukes his wanderings and insures his obedience. The father of false sons often refuses to recognize them, and so leaves them to the instruction of others. Such conduct, however, he would not show toward true sons. We ought to receive every affliction from God as tokens of his watchful care and his fatherly love. The word chastisement here suggests wholesome discipline rather than severe punishment; it implies the training at home and the instruction at school of a well-trained child. God takes the tenderest relations of life to set forth his affection toward the children of men. In the one hundred and third psalm and thirteenth verse we read, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him," and in the sixty-sixth chapter and thirteenth verse of Isaiah, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." There are times when it is inexpressibly sweet for the chastised but submissive child to think of God as both father and mother. We have in the presentation of God as inflicting chastisement a strange and strong argument for his fatherly love. We need constant discipline. God may suffer unconverted men to remain in their sins without immediately inflicting chastisement: but he will not permit his dear children thus to remain in sin. Let us receive the chastisement which our Father sends with submissive hearts, with joyous spirits and with obedient lives.

Without Holiness.

Holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." (Heb. 12:14.) Chastisement is conducive to holiness and holiness proves our acceptance with God and assures us of an eternal residence in his presence. Many persons dislike the word holiness. It may be admitted that the word has often been used in such a manner as to justify to some degree the dislike. It has been associated with extravagant and one-sided views of divine truth and of Christian character. Nevertheless, the word appears in Scripture in solemn exhortation, and no refinement of exegesis can remove it from the sacred page. It ought to be the constant endeavor of God's people to realize in their lives the character which this word suggests. Holiness is wholeness in the service of God. Hale, health, whole and holy all stand in close linguistic relations. No man can be morally healthy except he is striving after holiness. It is certain that the Christian Church needs men who have wholeness in God's service; far too many are half-hearted in the Christian life. Whatever views we may hold regarding the higher life, technically understood, it is quite certain that all of us practically might have and ought to have a higher and holier life than most possess. A great and solemn law is laid down in the passage at the head of this paragraph. By the words "See the Lord," we are to understand the enjoyment of his presence, and by the fundamental laws of our nature without likeness to his character we cannot enjoy his presence. There is a sense in which all men will see him, but not in the sense of dwelling with him in felicity. It is impossible that unforgiven and rebellious sinners could be introduced into heaven. Heaven is loving Christ and being like Christ. Men who do not love him cannot have any heaven anywhere; men who love him have heaven always and everywhere in proportion to the reality of that love. To take men to heaven who do not love him would be cruelty to them and to all heavenly beings. Many classes in our communities now are fit for prisons, but not fit to be members of respectable families. If all the guilty inhabitants of hell were brought into heaven this moment, cherishing their present hatred of God, heaven would be no heaven to them. Heaven is a state, a condition, as truly as it is a place and holiness is its distinctive characteristic. What would unholy men do in heaven? Of what could they speak? What songs could they sing? No untamed savage of the woods would be more out of place in a drawing-room than an unconverted man in heaven. The frequenters of saloons and other abodes of sin would be absolutely wretched in a sweet and heavenly prayer-meeting. The more heavenly the meeting the more wretched they would be. They would hastily leave it and return to the haunts of sin. Such men need new hearts, new wills, new loves. If a prayer-meeting would give them misery, heaven would be really hell in their experience. Would that men could see that God is not arbitrary in his allotment of human souls! Would that men could see that there is a law of moral as truly as of physical gravitation, and that all men not in harmony with that universal and eternal law must go to their own place! Holiness here will assuredly bring us to heaven hereafter. May we learn the solemn and blessed truth that without holines no man shall see the Lord!

Without Christ.

Lastly, "Without me ye can do nothing." (John 15: 15.) In the Christian life the blessed Christ is at its beginning, its middle, and its ending. We begin by gazing on him on the cross; we end by sitting with him on the throne. Most gracious is our Lord in this connection in acknowledging believing sinners to be branches of himself, the divine vine. Only as we abide in this vine can we bear fruit. No good works in his sight are possible except we be in vital union with Christ. It is just as possible for the branch separated from the vine to live and bring forth fruit, as for us to do any good thing when separated from Christ. Even the apostles could do nothing for the establishment of the Church apart from Jesus Christ. God can do without us, but we cannot live, move, and have our being, without God. It is not here said that without Christ we cannot do much, but it is affirmed that without him we can do nothing. A little time ago I assisted in trimming the vines in front of this church. We cut off a vine which appeared to be of little importance, but the next day we discovered that great sections of the leaves well up in the front of the church were dying. We had separated them with all their delicate tendrils from vital connection with the living root; and their speedy decay was inevitable. Oh, men and women, who are depending on your own righteousness for salvation, hear these solemn words, "Without me ye can do nothing." You are hoping that in your own unaided strength you can bring forth the fruits of true discipleship, of noble character, and of divine sonship. You are terribly mistaken. As well might a man attempt to quench his thirst by drinking from the salty sea, as to satisfy his spiritual desires by the cup of self-righteousness. As well might a man lean on his own shadow for support as on his own righteousness for help and strength in performing duty and in developing character. Oh, severed branches, you shall be withered, then gathered into bundles, then cast into the fire and burned. This is not my teaching but Christ's. Without vital union with Christ you can accomplish really no good thing. Oh, blessed branches, abide, I beseech you, in Christ. As every leaf in nature is in miniature in shape and veins the tree on which it grows, so every branch that abides in the heavenly vine shall bring forth leaves of conduct and character bearing close resemblance to the divine vine. So abiding in Christ we may claim the blessed promise, "Ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." God help us to possess all the gifts and graces suggested by these inspired "without's," that we may be his true children here and may dwell forever with him in heaven!

THE OXFORD BIBLE PREMIUM.

MANY letters have reached this office inquiring if the Oxford Bible premium offer is still open. The offer will be continued only as long as our supply of these beautiful Bibles lasts. Those desiring to secure the best reference Bible in the world, containing all the Helps, Concordance, Subject-Index, Reference- and colored maps, can do so by sending $2 for a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To every such subscriber we will send the Oxford Teachers' Bible.

THE CROSS AND CROWN.

A Dream.

METHOUGHT I held with both my hands
A sheet of paper large and white,
And One was near to whom I said:
"Thou now canst wish with all thy might.

"Whate'er thou dost desire to see
Shall on this pure white page appear;
But thou must wish with all thy heart
If thou wouldst bring the image here."

"Wilt thou wish first?" was softly said.
I bowed my head in earnest thought,
Then said: "A Cross I wish to see;
A Cross by angel fingers wrought."

"Ah! No!" was cried, in accents quick,
"Oh! never ask a cross to see;
Perchance it might not be removed,
Oh! something brighter let it be."

"We all must bear our cross while here
And shall I fear to ask for mine?
Ah! No! A Cross still let it be.
And trust for help to power Divine."

E'en as I spake a Cross appeared,
Its beauty I shall ne'er forget,
Of purest ivory it was formed,
And wrought as mortals ne'er wrought yet.

Like layer on layer of lace it looked,
Its carving was so fine and rare;
Strange flowers of many kinds I saw,
The rose and lily both were there.

And at its base were three white steps,
Three steps of ivory—creamy white;
And gazing on that lovely cross
My soul was filled with pure delight.

Another ardent wish then came—
I said, "Oh! grant that I may see
E'en but a glimpse of that bright crown—
The crown that has been promised me."

Then lo! above the highest step
There shone a lovely brilliant star;
'Twas set in gold and cast its rays
On all things round, both near and far.

I gazed awhile, then slowly said,
'Tis lovely but 'tis not a crown:"
And as I spake, behold! two stars—
Two other stars, came floating down.

They joined the first, and with it formed
The outline of a crown so bright,
That I could scarce upon it look;
It cast such pure and radiant light.

And then I saw them fade away,
The cross and then the stars of light,
And in my hand I found I held
The sheet of paper—large and white.

THE LAST CRUSADE.

World-wide Missionary Effort to take Place After the Rapture of the Church.

BY J. HUDSON TAYLOR OF CHINA INLAND MISSION.

I CANNOT but fear that there are many who are very near to the Lamb, and very near to those who will form part of his true Bride, but who are not in true heart consecration separated unto him; who are not wholly the Lord's, and who will be terribly disappointed when the Lord comes and takes those whom his spirit has prepared to be with him for ever. I would commend this subject to your very prayerful consideration, whether all those who come to Christ, and perhaps really seek him, perhaps are really united to him, will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, or whether some will be left behind to pass through the Great Tribulation? You remember in our Saviour's Word in the fifteenth of St. John, he speaks of the branches and the Vine, real branches, but alas! fruitless ones. And we are told that a man gathered them and burned them. Might they represent some who have to pass through the Great Tribulation, having lost the privilege of escaping it, which they might have?

The hope of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is a paramount motive given us in the New Testament, for earnest, holy service here and great cheer and encouragement are given us in the trial and persecution that necessarily attend following the Lord Jesus Christ fully. Someone spoke about it as cutting the nerve of missionary effort. I wish to bear personal testimony that it has been the greatest personal spur to me in missionary service. We are to evangelize the world in this dispensation, in order that people may be gathered out for the Lord. This belief that the Lord would have the Gospel preached as a witness in all the world, "and then shall the end come," has been a very great stimulus to me in seeking to carry the Gospel into the districts into which it had not been proclaimed; for the Lord will not come to an incomplete Bride.

There are some who are hindered in the desire to pray for the coming of the Lord, by the idea that his coming will seal the doom of all that are left behind. Now it is a very solemn fact that in connection with the coming of the Lord there are many passages which tell us of great and terrible judgments. And may I point out here that there are two classes of passages speaking of the coming of the Lord? First, those that speak of his coming for his people, like that which is referred to in the fourth chapter of 1. Thess., verses 15-18.

There is another coming, however, that is spoken of in God's Word in many places, that is his coming with his people. You remember we are told in the Epistle of Jude that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of certain wicked men, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all the ungodly among them of their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." There is first necessarily the coming of the Lord for his people, and there is subsequently the coming of the Lord with his people, and in the interval between many prophecies have to be fulfilled and will be fulfilled.

And what will take place in that interval? Very much upon earth. The development and the manifestation of God's great and last enemy, the Antichrist, will take place. What else? I believe you will find, if you study God's Word, that there will be a great outpouring of the Spirit of God, a greater than Pentecost, and the Gospel will be preached throughout the wide world. There will be a glorious gathering, compared with which the Church, caught up to meet the Lord in the air, is as the first fruits compared with the harvest.

Close upon the vision of the rapture is another vision of events which occur while the beast and the false prophet are doing their work of persecution. It is an angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the "everlasting Gospel" to preach to them that dwell on the earth, to every nation and kindred and tongue and people. So that you see there are nations and peoples and tongues. It is the Gospel, but this Gospel has one peculiar feature about it. "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come"—that is not our present message. The hour of his judgment is nigh at hand, but it is not come yet. We are still in the day of grace. But the final message is there preached. Notice to whom. To them that dwell on the earth, to every nation and kindred and tongue and people. And it is a glorious preaching of the Gospel, a very successful one.

"I AM READY."

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 1. Rom. 1: 9-17

READINESS such as Paul professed, ought to characterize every follower of Christ. It proceeds from a strong faith in the Gospel, as "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." If a man has that faith in it, he can never be ashamed of it, for it is the most wonderful power in the world. "I protest," says the greatest of modern agnostics, "that if some great power would agree to make me always think what is true and do what is right, on condition of being turned into some sort of clock and wound up every morning, I should instantly close with the offer." The Gospel makes the offer without the humiliating condition. It supplies the standard of truth and righteousness and enables the man who believes in it to attain it. The reason that it is not accepted by such men as the agnostic quoted above, is that they look upon it as a creed or a ritual and not as a power. Perhaps many of them might accept it, if those who knew it as a power were more ready to preach it. This does not mean pulpit preaching exclusively, or chiefly. The most effective preaching with such men is that of life and conduct. If they saw every professor "thinking what is true and doing what is right," they would not be slow in coming to the conclusion that Christianity is the power it claims to be. But apart from the silent testimony of the life, there should be more readiness than there is to preach the Gospel by word of mouth. The Apostle suggests the reason by his own avowal. "I am not ashamed of the Gospel," he says. Is it then possible that the cause of silence is that men are ashamed of it? Does it ever happen that in a company of intelligent men, who are lamenting the present condition of society, or their own individual shortcomings, or those of other people, that a Christian among them is ashamed to declare that the Gospel of Christ is the only sure remedy for the trouble? It may be that shame often is the cause of unreadiness; but the most frequent cause probably is that the Christian himself does not know the Gospel, as a power unto salvation. We have been so long accustomed to regard the Gospel as a species of soul insurance, a scheme for securing heaven after death, that we have lost sight of the other aspect of it. We look to it to save us from the postmortem consequences of sin and not from sin itself. If a man has ever struggled to be free from the bondage of his lower nature; if he has resisted the craving of sinful lusts and appetites and passions; if he has failed in his effort and has fallen again and again and has begun to despair of ever living a pure life in the flesh; and then someone has told him that he can gain from the Gospel the power he needs and he tries it and obtains the power that saves him from his unwilling bondage, that man cannot be silent. He speaks of it joyfully, he is anxious to tell others who are striving as he was, the road to liberty and conquest. He is ready to preach, and is not ashamed of the Gospel, for he knows by experience that it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes.

ONE CIRCLE'S WORK.

It is pleasant to read among the reports sent in to the Silver Cross, the following, which comes from Mrs. Eustace Gibson of Huntington, W. Va.: We have been enabled to contribute $100 as a starting fund to the Hunt Hospital, and to aid some much distressed persons. A [illegible], a sick man furnished with medicine, and a [illegible] infants. A typhoid fever patient was taken care [illegible] and we assisted in nursing her and paying her expenses to her home in a far-off State. A widow with two children next claimed our attention. We helped to make them comfortable for the winter, and sent them to their friends. We also shared the expenses of another sick and friendless girl to her far distant home. We provided in every respect for a destitute family of three for three weeks, and paid for removing their household goods to another State. During last winter ten children were clothed, twenty-two caps and other presents distributed, and a supper given, at which 52 poor people were fed.

During the Summer we found it necessary to divide our Circle, so we organized a band of Little Helpers, who give their aid in small ways to the Order. Our own Circle numbers 56, several of whom reside at a distance, and many of whom are young girls, whose home and school duties debar them from the active work so much needed. But each one feels that she has done something to relieve the wants of the many who continually cry out to us for help. The future promises a broad field of labor in our rapidly growing town, and "In His Name" we trust to increase our usefulness from year to year.

THE TORONTO Y. W. C. A.

Perhaps the ladies of some of our large cities where the need is great and has not been yet met may be encouraged to organize by the following record of what has been accomplished in the Young Women's Christian Association of Toronto, in Faith and Works: "Twenty years ago, a few earnest Christian women, convinced of the responsibility for the comfort and safety of young women, and whose hearts were filled with compassion for them in the dangers that surrounded their path, and the difficulties they had in finding safe and comfortable boarding-houses, at the price that they could pay, decided to organize a Young Woman's Christian Association, its object being the "temporal, moral and religious welfare of young women who are dependent upon their own exertions for support." The first and greatest need being a well ordered Christian home, a residence was at once established. Other doors of usefulness soon opened, and the work extended.

The twentieth year has been one of their best. Its close found fifty-four in the home, just half the whole number of permanent boarders during the year, to which add 433 transients. As usual, more apply than can be received. $2 to $4 is charged per week. A remark made by one of the girls tells the story of the influence exerted. "I can never tell what a blessing this place has been to me, the religious influence is so great."

Every Thursday evening a Gospel meeting is held; beginning a year ago with but small success it has now an average attendance of 20 to 25. An employment office is open to domestic servants, nurses and other occupations. The classes aim at practical help by instruction in cooking, sewing and dress-making. Concerts, readings, a series of medical lectures; a reception to girls from factories, another for students, and one to Christian Endeavor Societies, form part of their good work. The Reading Room, now open every day is much appreciated.

MR. SANKEY'S GIFT TO NEW CASTLE, PA.

The handsome building a picture of which appears on this page, is the noble gift of Mr. Ira D. Sankey to the Young Men's Christian Association of the town in which he spent his boyhood. An Association was organized in New Castle in 1885, but as the population of the town was under fifteen thousand there was not much prospect of its ever possessing a building such as Associations in larger cities have found so helpful in their work. Mr. Sankey however came to the rescue. He purchased a suitable site and erected on it a building thoroughly well adapted to Association work. This with a well selected library of sixteen hundred volumes he handed over to the Association as a free gift. It was understood that it was Mr. Sankey's intention to make the building a memorial to his parents, believing that in no better way could he keep the memory of Christian people fresh in the hearts of the rising generation. The Association has now 305 members; its literary society has an average attendance of 155 and its Bible class of 200. It has a well-equipped gymnasium, baths, etc., and is in thorough working order in all its branches. By this munificence Mr. Sankey has done noble service to the town and has laid the foundation of benefits that will become more and more valuable as the years roll by.

A UNION OF EPWORTH LEAGUES

We learn from our friend, Miss Addie S. McKnight of New Orleans, that a movement has been inaugurated to unite the Epworth Leagues of that city into an organization for combined effort. Early in August a consultation took place in the Louisiana Avenue M. E. C. S., of five delegates from the several Local Leagues of the city. This delegation met simply to discuss the advisability of going into permanent organization. This discussion having occupied some few moments, resulting in a favorable view by each and every League, an appointed time was settled upon when it would prove expedient to permanently organize. Thereon acting, identical representation, together with such Leaguers as desired a voice in the management, met two weeks later with the view of bringing into existence a City Union League. The offices of Presidency and Vice Presidency were filled by persons who were chosen by ballot. As a result of this movement, Mr. Morris B. DePass was chosen as President of the Union; John T. Crebbin, First Vice President; Col. David Zable, Second Vice President; and Miss Hattie Halley, Third Vice President.

By a unanimous vote Miss McKnight was elected to the offices of Corresponding and Recording Secretary, while Mr. George Brown was appointed to occupy the position of Treasurer, by a like vote. Rev. Robert H. Wynn, of Parker Chapel M. E. C. S., by a vote of acclamation now holds the office of Editor, a column or so in the New Orleans Christian Advocate having been granted by its editor. "We feel very much encouraged," Miss McKnight says, "at this great success, knowing that our corps of officers is all that it should be,—a band of noble, intelligent and energetic Christian workers."

NOTES OF THE ORDERS.

The B. Y. P. U., of Wheatland, Cal., has undertaken as a special work the support of a native preacher, Mr. Kondaty Nenkatiah, in Cumbum, India, pledging forty dollars per year for his support. It has also promised aid in the State mission work.

The twelfth biennial conference of Women's Christian Associations will be held at Buffalo, N. Y., Oct. 24—31. Associations intending to send delegates should communicate with Mrs. George Wadsworth, No. 370 Franklin street, Buffalo, who will give full information.

President J. Frank Carpenter of the Nebraska Union is planning to have a B.Y.P.U. programme this year at each associational meeting in Nebraska. He says that several associations are already asking assistance to prepare such programmes, and that prospects look bright for the B.Y.P.U. in that State.

In several Baptist Young People's Unions a new committee has been organized, called the "C. C. C. Committee." Its purpose is to follow up the pastor's public presentation of the study plans. The business of the committee is to complete at once the canvass for students, and see that all are provided with the tools to work with.

The first Y. M. C. A. ever started in Brazil has just been organised in Rio de Janeiro by Mr. Myrom Clark, who has been sent out for this work by the International Committee. The members so far are almost wholly drawn from the Brazilian churches. The Association, which has every promise of success, has already secured good rooms in the Rua da Assemblea.

The following testimony to the value of the young people's Societies which is now becoming uniform among all churches who have made the experiment, is sent to the Epworth Herald from East Poland, Me.: "One year ago it was impossible to sustain a prayer-meeting at this point. In October last a League was organized, and since then there has been steady improvement in spiritual matters in the church. At the last League service thirty-nine were present. The young people seem to be really interested in this work."

Characteristic Scenes and Native Types in the Dahomean Village—Ex-King Behanzin's Amazons—Strange Architecture.

BEHANZIN, the deposed monarch of Dahomey and the former wearer of the "Triple Crown," conquered and expatriated as he is, might still be proud of his people if he knew how much attention they are receiving at the World's Fair. The Dahomean village divides interest with the picturesque encampment of the Indians, the frigid-looking Lapland village and the unique displays of national life and customs, from China and the South Sea Islands. Our artist has succeeded in capturing with his facile pencil, a few of the characteristic groupings among the sons and daughters of Dahomey. The Amazon, though a portrait from life, does not present so fierce an aspect as one might have expected, from the stories of their desperate resistance during the recent war with France, when startling atrocities are said to have been committed by Behanzin's female body-guard. But the rage of battle can transform the gentlest, and doubtless the Amazon presents a sufficiently terrifying aspect when armed, on her "native heath." Her compatriot, the warrior, is as imposing a figure as any on the Midway Plaisance, tall, splendidly built, and magnificently muscled. With cutlass and seven-foot spear, he stands like an ebony sentinel, with strength and courage carved in every line and sinew. The native tailor, who plies his trade with the most rudimentary tools; the rude palanquin, presenting a most primitive idea of luxurious transputation; the thatched, willow-woven huts, dark and unventilated within, and the inevitable chair of state for the tribal chief or ruler, with its accompanying carpet and umbrella-bearer, all describe social conditions peculiar to countries that are hovering between savageism and a certain degree of civilization.

Whatever the Dahomeans may be at home, they are quiet and well-behaved at Chicago. Some few among them talk a little English. Until recent years Dahomey has had few Gospel advantages. Her monarchs and nobles were engaged in the slave trade and Whydah, the principal city, formerly furnished about 15,000 slaves every year to the Portuguese dealers in the human traffic. Abomey, the royal city, was the scene of nameless barbarities, and countless massacres took place there by kingly permission. Travellers described the walls of the palace as having been decorated with scores of human skulls, as trophies of the power of the monarch, but Portugal, while it fostered slavery, was instrumental in bringing about a cessation of those butcheries. All the conditions were unfavorable for missionary work, yet the Wesleyans succeeded in reaching some of the people and in beginning a work which may yet, under the Divine blessing, become the means of winning Dahomey from its idols and its cruelities to Christ. Under the new order of things, with the impulse to be derived from closer contact with European civilization, and no longer heathen and barbarous, Dahomey may be expected to be abreast of the foremost states in Africa in moral and material progress.

Influence of Music on Childhood.

There never was a child so dull in arithmetic who would not at first be amused, and then aroused by the fact that his piano practice had to do with his numbers, nor one so inert that he would not open his eyes with an answering flash when shown that he could not move lazily and clumsily without being as unmusical as his little friend who made him cringe when he played his violin "piece" out of time. And no boy was ever so obtuse that he would not at least combat the idea, if presented to him properly, that the evenness of his sister's scales and the bounding of his ball that made her so cross while she practised, were both a part of music. Who can tell how many the strange thoughts that come to the young when, in the silent chambers of his heart, his childhood begins to slip away from him, and the glorious future of his manhood begins to dawn upon him? Who can tell how strong a help the wholesomeness of the poetry of music would be, if linked to common sense, instead of to sentimentality?

Don't be too Reticent.

Much is to be gained by contact with the outside world. The influence of the social current has the same effect upon human nature as that produced by the constant friction of the sea upon the pebbles on the beach. Rough corners are polished and sharp angles smoothed down into symmetrical proportions. But it is not enough to be simply in the swim. One must, to be happy, cultivate that society which elevates and ennobles. Seek relaxation for mind and body among a set of people who hold broad views of living. Narrow-minded men and women, and the world is full of them, will only give you distorted ideas of life, ideas that will change the sunniest and most healthful disposition into one morose, churlish, and ill-natured. Be careful, then, whom you choose for your companions.

Victims of Vanity.

It was observed at a recent meeting of Christian Endeavor Societies, that nearly all 1,200,000 little birds are destroyed in the same way and for the same purpose every year; and all the world over a like destruction is being carried on in order to minister to the female love of ornament. It is not too much to say that the woman who wears a dead bird as an ornament, bears a mark of her own heartless or thoughtless inhumanity.

WAITING.

My work is done; take me within the gate
Where enter only those thou wilt;
A city lighted by thy glory great,
The city not by mortals built.
Come quickly, I beseech, and freely give
The guerdon in its full degree,
Which thou hast promised to every one
According as his work shall be.

Yet, Master, not my will, but thine, be done.
On thee I wait; forgive my prayer!
Thou knowest best if here I'm needed still,
Thou knowest if I'm needed there.
The wages are not due till work is done:
Submissive to the end I'll be,
Knowing thy precious promise never fails,
That my reward still rests with thee!

A NOBLE, HELPFUL WOMAN.

THE true woman does not not need to sit and complain of the lack of "a mission" in the world; it comes to her at the right time and if heart and hands be ready for the service of Christ and humanity, the response is immediate. Miss Emily Huntington, the founder of the Kitchen Garden School of Instruction, is in Chicago superintending a kitchen garden exhibit at the World's Fair. As long ago as 1871 Miss Huntington graduated and becoming interested in the slum work fostered by the church to which she belonged, gave up society and a brilliant home to work in a mission. She surrendered the gay garments of fashion for a pilgrim dress of silver gray cashmere, with mull kerchief, cuffs and aprons. It may have been the roses in her cheeks, the sunlight in her hair, or the sympathy in her voice and eyes that charmed the poor stray boys of Tompkins Square, but they were very much interested, and formed themselves into the first "Boys' Club" of New York. Miss Huntington worked for love for all her income was devoted to the cause; but she has already the grateful reward of seeing the result of her labor in the stalwart uprightness of the boys and the pure, devoted lives of the girls she has helped to train. She is the type of an increasing class of glorious women who count the "world well lost" for Jesus.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MISSING PAPERS.

THE house seemed dull after the boys had gone. For when Guy and Monk went up for their final term at Oxford, Fulk took himself off to London, and continued the studies which the summer gaieties had somewhat interrupted; and it was a very reduced party that assembled day by day at the table in the big dining-room, and Yolante began for the first time since her arrival at the Park, to think with regret of London, where there was always plenty going on.

She found, as many do who exchange town for country life, that in the short winter days there is little doing in the neighborhood, and those who have not their own resources within themselves are apt to be woefully dull. Cissy the younger sister was settling down to her life with great contentment for there was a whole library of rare books to dig into, and had not Geoffrey held out hopes of being able to do something to get Humphrey out of the worst of his invalid ways? He was quite certain that with time and patience much could be done for him, and though the lad had acquiesced very patiently in the verdict that he would be tied to his couch more or less for life, yet it was with an intense sense of pleasure that he looked forward to the possibilities of a less helpless existence.

So that the twins were finding life anything but dull or monotonous just now, and Yolante had no sympathy for them in her unspoken grievance, though her mother sometimes remarked how solitary she must feel. She did not easily make girl-friends, and Joyce, though greatly admiring Yolante, was just a little afraid of her. Norman was away shooting in Scotland, and might be absent for several weeks. Then, too, the friendship with Cicely upon which Yolante had reckoned, was not proving quite as satisfactory as she had hoped.

More than once she had spent a whole day in Fordringham, and had a note-book in which many names had been entered of poor people who would be grateful for a visit, and who might even be relieved within reasonable limits, as they were suffering from undeserved troubles. Yolante had been to see them, had supplied some of the most pressing needs of the moment, and had seen sorrowful faces light with pleasure when she had promised to come again. And yet she had felt little satisfaction, or even interest in the work. She did not ask herself too closely what it was that she had expected when she had requested Cicely to help her in her labor of love: but she knew in her heart that there had been a secret wish to win Geoffrey's admiration and approbation. She had hoped that he might come in and find her at work, cheering up some sick man or woman, and drawing down upon herself praises that he would hear.

But so far her charitable errands had not appeared to bring her into any contact with Geoffrey, and she was discontented without exactly knowing why. The spice and flavor of life seemed lacking just now and time hung heavy on her hands.

In a mood of some discontent and depression, she wandered into the library one day, without any special object in view. Her mother's task of sorting papers still occupied her during her spare moments, but the bulk of the work had long since been accomplished, and Mrs. Dangerfield held her head higher, and felt that a load had rolled from off her, for not [illegible] on the old man's part of the existence of an elder Guy, and in that case his wish must have been [illegible] been done Guy from any but a purely technical stand-point.

But on this particular day Mrs. Dangerfield was not in the library, and Yolante sat down idly at the great secretary, recalling the bent figure of her grandfather, as she had so often [illegible] garded by all except Fulk with a sort of dread and dislike, but by him with a good deal of admiration, and some childish good-fellowship and affection.

Fulk had often gone to the library of his own accord, and had sat with the redoubtable grandfather at his work. Yolante recalled to mind the memory of a long-past day — a snowy day in mid-winter, when her grandfather had been shut up in the justicing-room for many hours, and Fulk and she (for the time being banded together on account of some childish quarrel with Monk), had stolen to the library, and he as a proof of his goodwill, and under solemn pledge of secrecy, had shown her the trick of a little secret drawer, which he had seen his grandfather open from time to time, and the spring of which he had mastered for himself, to his great pride and satisfaction, after having watched the process several times.

Sitting idly here, with nothing to do, and no very pleasant thoughts for company, Yolante wondered if she could still remember the trick of that little drawer. It had been empty when they had opened it on a former occasion, and she remembered that Fulk said nothing was kept in it except a little loose money sometimes. She knew that it had opened when they pressed one of a cluster of grapes carved on a panel on the outside, and after a certain amount of fumbling and guessing, a little click rewarded her efforts, and the little drawer started open. But this time it was not empty. There were two papers in it, tied together with a tape, though neither was bulky. Yolante, not dreaming of any important discovery, drew them out, and looked at them, wondering if her mother had found them before her.

"That is Aunt Helen's writing," she said to herself, looking at the superscription on one of the envelopes. Yolante knew her aunt's writing, as she had some of her books in which notes had been written in the margin, and Guy's mother's had been a characteristic hand. "She wrote to grandfather, I see, and he answered her, and the letter was returned to him through the post-office. I wonder what they said to one another. I think I will look—it cannot make any difference now."

Perhaps it was not a very honorable thing to do, but at least the girl meant nothing dishonorable by it. She had always been interested in her Aunt Helen, and it did not seem to her to matter much who read letters so many years old. She opened that of her aunt the first. It was not long, and it was written in a feeble hand. It only told of her husband's sudden death, of the birth of a son whom she had named Guy Monkswold, and concluded by the statement that she wished nothing and asked nothing for herself, but that she considered it right, in justice to her boy, that his grandfather should know of his existence. Enclosed were some certificates, at which Yolante hardly glanced.

With a dawning interest in the situation, she turned to her grandfather's letter, which had been returned from the dead-letter office. She saw at a glance that it was dated some three years after the communication from his daughter-in-law.

"Madam," (it ran) "I owe you an apology for the long interval that I have allowed to elapse before answering the communication addressed to me on the occasion of your husband's death. The fact of the case being that I did not open the letter then (having so lately declined all personal communication with you), and it is only within the last month that I have acquainted myself with its contents. Had you taken the common trouble to announce the death in the Times in the proper manner things would have been different. As it is you may have consoled yourself with another marriage for aught I know to the contrary. In any case I do not see that anything will be gained by a personal interview. If you need an allowance —and have not married—I will make you one, and in any case make provision for the boy: but I do not ask you to this house, as I believe we shall agree better at a distance. If it is any satisfaction for you to know it, I have made your son my heir. I have another grandson who expects to succeed, so you will have to look sharp after your son's interests when I die—but of course you will do that in any case. The certificate of his birth will give him his claim—and the other will have to make way, and as you will be looking out eagerly for the old man's death—as vultures in the desert—I know you all—you daughters-in-law, with children round you—there is no fear but that you and your child will be on the spot, whether or not this letter finds you, of which after this interval there is just a doubt. But you will be on the watch—you will be there to fight it out with Charles's widow—and I almost wish I could be there to see the battle, and to see Guy's son oust Charles's from the place he has always looked upon as his, or his mother for him. At least there is a small satisfaction in thinking that Guy's son will come after me. I loved his father once, till he chose to defy me and leave me alone in my old age. Well, if we meet again on the other side of the river, we may find out that after all we loved each other all the while. Yes, I shall not be sorry to join him there, and he will know perhaps that I have done justice to his child. G. DANGERFIELD."

Yolante had turned deadly pale as she read this letter in a few rapid glances, too much horrified and startled to forego the fascination of knowing all, though she would have given worlds not to have done so. And when the truth penetrated to her brain, she sat for a moment white and crushed, trying to make out what it all meant both to herself and to others.

Guy the heir—Guy the owner of everything —Monk a mere nonentity with his own career to make for himself—with nothing but an ordinary competence to call his own. The house, the land, the Park, and the prestige of ownership all to pass to Guy—O, it was intolerable. Could nothing be done to stop it?

Yolante pressed her hands to her temples and began to think. It was then that the question presented itself—did her mother know? Her heart gave a great throb, and then seemed to stand still, for some instinct told her that her mother did know something —had she not been care-worn and preoccupied very often at times? And did not she go about often as if she had some heavy weight upon her mind?

"If I thought she had never seen these papers, I would burn them—at least I think I would," said the girl slowly. "But if it is she who has hidden them, and she found they were missing, it would be worse than anything. And suppose she has not found them? Suppose she does not know the trick of the drawer? Why then the safest thing is just to shut them up again. They have been hidden there for ten years, and more, why not till the end of the chapter?"

And Yolante suited the action to the words, replaced the papers where she had found them, and shut the drawer upon them.

"O, if they would only stay there always," she murmured. "I wonder if some day I could come here alone at night and break the spring, so that no one could ever open it again. It is like living with a sword over one's head. But I will do nothing to injure Monk —nothing—nothing. It cannot be my duty, and if it is I will not do it."

Yolante was in the nervous state of excitement that prompts all kinds of unwonted actions, and the sound of a footstep down the passage caused the color to ebb from her face, and her heart to beat to suffocation. Hardly knowing what she did she sprang across the room, and concealed herself behind the heavy curtains. She felt she might betray herself if she met anyone in her present mood.

It was only her mother who was approaching the room, and she came in and closed the door, without being aware of her daughter's proximity. She sat down to the secretary and began to write letters, and Yolante behind her curtain, watched her, and began to feel a little foolish at her position. However time was no object, and though too proud to show herself, she had no objection to remaining there in hiding till something called her mother away. She wanted time for quiet thought and here at least she could secure it.

Mrs. Dangerfield wrote three notes, and then unlocked a drawer and took out her cheque book. When the cheque was written she put back the book and closed the drawer. It went rather hard, and she gave it a sharp push. At the same moment there was the sound of a little click, and the secret drawer flew open. Yolante did not know or did not remember that there was a trick in the closing as well as in the opening of it. She had shut it up without [illegible] the spring, and as a natural consequence the jar and shake sent it flying open again.

Mrs. Dangerfield looked up, and seeing what had occurred, put out her hand and took out what papers there were in this hitherto unknown receptacle. Yolante held her breath to watch her, and the moment she saw the change of face which followed the reading of the superscriptions it, alone, told her that these papers had never been in her mother's hands before, and also that she knew enough to be filled with dismay at the discovery.

Yolante clasped her hands closely together. She felt as if the furious beating of her heart must betray her presence. She almost rushed out and entreated her mother to burn the tell-tale papers and let things go on as they had done before: but the consciousness that such a knowledge shared would make life perfectly intolerable deterred her.

But O, those long, long moments in which her mother was skimming the contents of the fatal papers, her color ebbing fast away as she did so. It seemed as if they would never end, and Mrs. Dangerfield's face was one that even her daughter could not read. Was it minutes or was it hours that passed in that deep and breathless stillness? Yolante never knew. She felt as if the scene were burnt in upon her brain till she never could forget it waking or sleeping. What was about to happen? What would be the end?

The end came more quickly then she had expected. Her mother rose. The girl noted her face looked as if hewn out of a piece of marble. She took the papers in her hand—and it did not tremble—and walked steadily across to the fire which was blazing on the hearth. She took her poker and made a hot glowing bed, and upon it she laid the fatal papers and pressed them down until every atom was consumed, and even the ashes had sprung hot and red up the chimney.

With her head held high, as if in a sort of mute defiance of the voice of conscience within, Mrs. Dangerfield walked steadily out of the room: and Yolante, when certain of escaping unseen, slipped like a shadow from her nook, and fled upstairs to the pleasant retreat of her room, sinking down upon the rug breathless and trembling.

And yet she was glad—she knew all the time that she was glad, though the oppression of the guilty secret weighed like lead upon her.

"It is not for us to do it—it is not—it is not," she kept repeating fiercely. "It was a wicked, cruel thing of grandfather to do—deceiving us even on his dying bed and in the will he left behind him."

Had Mrs. Dangerfield been somewhat less preoccupied herself these next days, she might have noted an unusual restlessness in Yolante. The girl could not keep still, could not even keep indoors, though the weather was very inclement. She seemed to have a fit of intense charitable devotion upon her, and was for ever starting off either to Fordringham, or to the tenantry with gifts of food or clothing, to be distributed with almost lavish prodigality. Her ample allowance all melted away in these charitable works, and she was forced to appeal to her mother for funds, which, however, were readily accorded. The poor people wondered and rejoiced at such good times. Cicely and Geoffrey looked at each other and wondered what it all meant. It was kindly meant, but injudiciously carried out, and the wild enthusiasm of the girl's manner perplexed them not a little. Sometimes she would call and ask Cicely to give her a cup of tea before her cold dark drive home, and she would sit and talk incessantly all the while, with a brilliance and a vehemence which the occasion hardly seemed to require. At that time no service seemed too mean for her—no office unwelcome, however distasteful. She puzzled the Northesks not a little, and she puzzled her own family, too. But her temper was fitful and uncertain, and at home, at least, no one dared take her to task.

Geoffrey ventured to do so one day, when he found that the money left for the use of a patient in a critical case, had been used by the wife in buying spirit for herself, which had rendered her incapable of following out the doctor's orders, and from him she had accepted the rebuke in good part. But she did not pay much heed to cautions and warnings, and her help began to be rather dreaded than courted by the more sober-minded Cicely.

"But you need not worry your head over it," said Geoffrey. "The fit will wear itself out. The fire is burning too fast. We shall have a reaction one of these days. She is a magnificent creature in her way, but her vocation is not in our part of the world. She has something on her mind. When that passes away, we shall see little of her here."

EVANGELIZING ASIA.*

HOW much better is a man than a sheep, than the refuse of furnace or mine? But races exist this day, less cared for than this material waste. Continents populous with human beings, but half developed, because men are half developed. Look at the Asiatic Continent. Have you thought much about it? "Well, why should I? What is Asia to me? Give me a rug or two now and then. Keep up my rations of tea and coffee. Give me that India shawl, if you please, and that exquisite piece of bronze, but don't let those dreadful Asiatics come near me." Why? What is the matter with the Asiatics?

The Asiatic Continent! The largest, richest, most populous continent on the face of the earth! In civilization, the oldest! Mother of great religions, of all the religions worth naming! The great forerunners of the Christ and the Christ himself, were Asiatics. Judaism, Buddhism, Brahmanism, Confucianism, Christianity, Mohammedanism—all Asiatic. The Prophets of the Old Testament, the writers of the New, and the Book, the greatest of books—are all Asiatic. The early fathers of the Church whose subtle thought and kindly interpretation of Christianity is so influencing modern movements within the Church, were many of them Asiatic.

Asiatic History—what a story of colossal empires, magnificent cities, world-conquering armies led by great generals; astonishing commerce from India to Tyre, and thence to all the Mediterranean lands. All these great peoples have seen their brilliant eras, their thinkers, artists, poets, builders, warriors. They have not lost, past recovery, their vigor, their old-time possibilities; but what, among the great powers of the world do they stand for to-day, the peoples that once threatened Europe, invaded Africa, reduced Egypt to vassalage and destroyed her Memphis and her Thebes? Why does Asia stand for so little? She lost her Gospel and her Christ, rather than welcome both to dominate her life. The Light of Asia grew dim and the sun of righteousness is not yet welcomed.

The Asiatic Continent evangelized, made Christian, is the wheeling into line with the world's progress the most versatile of powers, the most vigorous of evangelizing agencies. The true Christian type of thought, life, worship, is surely not Occidental, nor Oriental only, but both. Neither is complete without the other.

Keshub Chunder Sen, whom all respect as having drunk deep at the fountains of our Christianity, thus forcefully resents the common prejudice against Asiatics: "If, however, our Christian friends persist in traducing our nationality and national character, and in distrusting and hating Orientalism, let me assure them that I do not in the least feel dishonored by such imputations. On the contrary, I rejoice, yea, I am proud that I am an Asiatic. And was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? Yes, and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the Gospel were Asiatic. In fact Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics, and in Asia. When I reflect on this, my love for Jesus becomes a hundred-fold intensified; I feel him nearer my heart and deeper in my national sympathies. Why should I then feel ashamed to acknowledge that nationality which he acknowledged? Shall I not rather say, He is more congenial and akin to my Oriental nature, more agreeable to my Oriental habits of thought and feeling? And is it not true that an Asiatic can read the imageries and allegories of the Gospel, and its description of natural sceneries, of customs and manners, with greater interest, and a fuller perception of their force and beauty, than Europeans? In Christ we see not only an exaltedness of humanity, but also the grandeur of which Asiatic nature is susceptible. To us Asiatics, therefore, Christ is doubly interesting, and his religion is entitled to our peculiar regard as an altogether Oriental affair. The more this great fact is pondered, the less I hope will be the antipathy and hatred of European Christians against Oriental nationalities, and the greater the interest of the Asiatics in the teachings of Christ. And thus, in Christ, Europe and Asia, the East and West, may learn to find harmony and unity."

I will suppose that I have retired for secret prayer—I have entered into my closet and shut to my door. Am I prepared without a moment's consideration, to pour out my heart before God? Sometimes it may be so; special circumstances may be stirring in my soul the lively emotions of hope or fear, or love, or desire, and I feel unspeakable relief and rest in unbosoming myself to my Father in heaven as I would to a friend. But, frequently, it is far different. Frequently, if I kneel without premeditation—without distinctly realizing what I am about to do—just because it is my duty or my habit to pray—my prayers degenerate into a mere mechanical exercise or a wandering reverie; and I rise from my knees not refreshed, not strengthened, but with the miserable sense of a burden upon my heart, that finds expression in some such sigh as this, "O my God, forgive me the mockery of this prayer!"

As a rule, I conceive no immediate preparation can supersede that of bringing the heart into contact with the spiritual realities of the Word of God. But, alas! to bring the eyes into contact is not necessarily to bring the heart. The regular reading of God's Word is as apt to become listless as prayer itself. What preparation, then, can there be antecedent to this, to stir up the soul to listen to the voice of God as well as to commune with him.

I must firmly grasp the fact that prayer is ordained by God himself as a power in real life. I must put far from me the secret misgiving, "what profit shall I have if I pray unto him?" No thoughts of the unchangeableness of God, or of the reactionary effect of the exercise of prayer upon my own spirit, must be allowed to interfere with my simple belief that prayer prevails with God. Here I must become as a little child, and really believe that prayer does "move the hand which moves the world."

"Shall I pray aloud or inaudibly?" I am disposed to think that the usual practice, which, I presume, is that of praying inaudibly, is not the one most calculated to give reality to prayer. I know there may be external circumstances that may make it neeessary, and there are differences of temperament which must regulate a matter of this kind; yet I am very doubtful whether many would not find the reality of secret prayer greatly increased by adopting the former method, especially if the mind is wearied, as it often is in the evening; and so, apt to wander or to slumber. The effort required to express the thoughts aloud acts as a spur to the indolence of the mind. From my own experience, I can speak strongly of the benefit; it has enabled me to pray when else it would have been a physical impossibility. I would add, as an inducement at least to prove it, that this seems to have been the mode of prayer with holy men of old.

The length consideration appears to me to be a very important point, and to affect more intimately the reality of secret prayer than many may be disposed to think. No doubt to be able to continue in prayer is a very, very blessed thing, and a gift we should all most earnestly covet. The work of most of us would, I believe, be far more than double its present value, if we could spend half our present working time in prayer. All of us know that those who have had most power with men are those who have had most power with God. "I have so much to do," said Luther, in the busiest period of his busy life, "that I cannot go on without three hours a day of praying." Of him, moreover, who came to do the work which only man in union with God could do, it is written, and the occasion was very far from a solitary one, "He continued all night in prayer."

Yet just because this is so, it is more important we should give earnest heed to our Master's words, "They (i. e., the heathen) think they shall be heard for their much speaking; be not ye therefore like unto them." Our God is he "who measures life by love;" and he measures prayer, not by its length, but by its reality. A great deal of unreal secret prayer, especially in an evening, results, I am convinced, from a notion that in order to please God our prayers must be of a certain length.

A most touching anecdote is told of the devout Bengel. He is represented as a man strong in faith and great in prayer. After he became a professor, a countryman, a former parishioner, took a longing to see him once more. Calling on Bengel after evening service, he hid himself to watch the private devotions of one he so revered. Midnight passed, and still Bengel's lamp burned and his pen moved, while turning ever to the open Bible, he bent his head over the holy page. Far on in the time when others sleep, he dug still for others' need into the mine of heavenly gold. At length he shut the book and rose. "At last I hear Bengel pray," thought the peasant, "what words they will be! my long watch repaid!" But Bengel only turned his eyes up to the Master's throne, and said, "O Lord Jesus Christ, things are between us as on the old score." What childlike simplicity! what filial confidence! what reality in that secret breathing! Did it pass unnoticed, think you, because it was so short? Surely not.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE SALOON.*

Does the Christian Church hold the sovereignty of cities? It ought; it might; it does not. If the Christian people of any city should persistently determine, and solidly unite, they would rule. Even if numerically weaker than the criminal classes, they could wield a moral power that would be irresistible. But the opinion prevails that churches and Christians ought to keep aloof even from moral measures that run into politics. The church is counted a thing too sacred to dabble with the world's affairs.

Does the press hold the sovereignty of cities? No. Mighty as the press is, it fails to control the life of the cities. To a great extent the press follows public opinion instead of forming it; yields to popular clamor rather than resist and rebuke it; caters to the taste of the masses while it should purify and uplift them. A great journal simply reflects the opinions of those who read its pages.

What sovereignty then? Why, we find the sovereignty of the saloon in great cities to be almost supreme. It is a great business monopoly that is utterly unscrupulous and conscienceless. Its prime products are poverty, pauperage, discontent, vice and crime. It seizes the great populations and debauches them. It depreciates the values of property wherever it is allowed to exist. It is the occasion of direct or indirect tax on all industries. It is at war with the home, the school and the church. It is a public plunderer that has no mercy on its victims. It breeds idleness, appetite, passion, and crime. It is the hotbed of prostitution, infamy, and disgrace. It tramples down the Sabbath and dishonors God. It is the only monopoly that dares defy the courts, and shake its finger at justice. It holds penal codes in utter contempt. The police dare not treat it as any other scourge is treated. It is a living death constantly preying on the community. It has money to bribe, votes to barter, offices to bestow. It hoodwinks judges and defies the public authorities. It is the parent of perjury, the nurse of knavery, the corrupter of courts, and the source of sorrow. It keeps in full blasts when the flags are flapping at half-mast over some tremendous woe, and uses all fast-days and feast-days, all seasons and Sabbaths to swell its nefarious traffic, regardless of what laws are violated, what principles of right are invaded, what rights of society are sacrificed, what sins against God are committed.

The saloon holds its sovereignty by its ability to coerce the great parties into compliance with its will. The liquor trade is an organized force. It casts its influence on the side of the party that it can best trust. It cares for neither of them, yet it has them both at its feet, its chains are on their necks, and they dare not spurn its mandates. Municipal officers and State officials are nominated by the saloon and in the saloon. Nominating conventions only confirm the dictum of the saloon, and publicly present the candidates of the liquor interests. Public improvements and municipal reforms must wait the will of the saloon. This interest must dominate city and State government, and be fostered at the expense of everything else.

To destroy the sovereignty of the saloon is the most imperative duty of the American people. We can have no hope of good rulers, no just legislation while the saloon dominates our politics. And the sovereignty of the saloon cannot be destroyed while the saloon itself exists. To destroy the sovereignty of the saloon, all the elements of righteousness should combine. The Church should rise from its apathy and exert its tremendous power. The great parties of our land should shake off the thrall of the saloon and repudiate it, else every virtue-loving voter should withdraw from them. Everything good and pure should unite and leave to the saloon the support only of the hopelessly lost and miserably abandoned criminal classes of society.

A Spurgeon Memorial Hall.

THE late Pastor Spurgeon, for many years associated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was possessed of a boundless sympathy for suffering humanity. Among the many institutions he founded, none was dearer to him than the Stockwell Orphanage, England. In it fatherless boys and girls are sheltered and educated. The institution is conducted on the separate home system, each home being presided over by a matron. No uniforms are used, these being regarded as the badge of poverty. The expenses of the Home average about $50,000 a year.

Shortly after Pastor Spurgeon's death, a Fund was started for the purpose of erecting a Memorial Hall for the use of the orphans, and which would prove of great service to the institution on public occasions. The foundation stone of the new Memorial Hall was laid recently, on the occasion of the annual festival held in the orphanage following the birthday of the founder. Among those who made addresses and took part in the ceremony were Revs. J. A. Spurgeon, Charles Spurgeon, Dr. Pierson, W. Stephenson, Dr. Barnardo, and others.

The Memorial Hall is so designed as to be a beautiful and lasting monument to the memory of Pastor Spurgeon and for the preservation of many objects of interest associated with his life and labors. Within the hall there will be erected a monumental design in three panels. In the centre panel there will be a life-size figure of Mr. Spurgeon in the act of preaching; in the right panel, the pastor will be seen in the midst of a group of students; and in the left panel, he will be surrounded by a group of orphans. It will cost about $20,000. The Hall is shown in the illustration on page 613.

AN HISTORIC PARALLEL.

Being challenged as to his reasons for refusing wine on one occasion while in England, Dr. A. T. Pierson related the following incident: "In Paris, during the Reign of Terror, there was a magazine where an immense amount of gunpowder was stored with other kinds of explosives. There was a man there who took out his pipe, filled it with tobacco, and lit it with a taper. His companion said, 'You should not smoke in this magazine; if you are going to smoke go out there.' He replied, 'I am not going to have my liberty interfered with.' Liberty! Has any man a right to exercise liberty when his indulgence is endangering millions of other people? It is quite a mistaken notion of liberty if you claim the right to smoke in a magazine of gunpowder. But the drinking habit is worse than a match lit in such a magazine. There is not only peril in drink, but there is absolute and consummate destruction in it, and I do not know how I could take any other position, knowing the effects of the drink traffic, than to set myself against it tooth and nail, with pen and tongue, with principle and practice, and I ask God to help you all to look at it in the same light."

A LATE ATONEMENT.

The European journals in referring to the death of the Countess Firmian at Salzburg, report that her will conveys all her personal property to trustees who are to hold it for the benefit of Protestant orphan children. As the lady was a Roman Catholic considerable surprise was caused by the bequest. To account for it it is necessary to trace the history of the family back a century and a half. In the year 1730, Count Firmian became Archbishop of Salzburg. He was informed that a great number of his subjects were secretly Protestants. A list of these was written, and, in the severe winter of 1731, 30,000 Protestants were, within a fortnight, expelled by the military from the country. Many of them died on the way, and others found refuge in Germany. The bequest of the recently deceased lady was intended, as she states in her will, as some slight atonement for the wicked wrong committed by her distinguished ancestor a hundred and [illegible]

SINGING WHEN IN TROUBLE

[illegible] a child who lived in the Lake District, Ruskin [illegible] a laboring man in a village near Coniston Water, and he was especially fond of one little boy. One day he came to the house, and, missing the little fellow, said to the mother, "Where is Harry?" With tears in her eyes she told how a short time before the little boy had been taken to his rest. His big brother was mowing in the meadow, and the little boy went to him, but he went very softly and gently to surprise the brother, and the brother did not see him. The scythe swept round and severed the sinews of the poor child's legs, and he fell. His brother hurriedly caught him up, and ran to the house with him. All night Harry lay very still on the little bed; but just as the morning broke he began faintly to sing. "What did he sing?" asked Ruskin. "Oh! just bits of hymns he had learned in his Sunday School." And he sang on, until as the sun was rising he stopped, because he had gone where the angels always sing.

HEATHENISM IN BRAZIL

In a letter from a Christian business man who has gone to Brazil on an extended visit is the following vivid description of the spiritual darkness prevailing there: "When I arrived in Pernambuco, I was much struck with the beauty of the place; everything is so clean, white and bright. I was also astonished at the open godlessness of the people. There is scarcely any Sunday here; everything goes on the same as on week-days. The Sunday I arrived was the opening of a carnival, which lasted three days. It was a sickening sight to see these superstitious souls parading the streets. There must have been hundreds of processions made up from all kinds of people, from the very white to ebony black. They were dressed in all sorts of diabolical and curious costumes, and were singing, shouting, dancing and playing all kinds of instruments, from a tin whistle to a tin pan. This religious scene lasted three days, and now all are quiet, as it is the holy season. It would make your heart ache to know the sins of this city. The immorality is beyond estimate. Truly the god of this world has blinded their minds, and the priests seem to blindfold these poor people more still. I heard of a young man to-day, who said, when he went to the chapel, that it was like taking a box in a theatre, to hear the music and see the fireworks, for they sent up prayers in fireworks! Oh! how I do long to tell them of Jesus the mighty to save. The beauties and wonders of this tropical land are very great. Large mangoe trees, bread-fruit, orange and cocoa-nut trees, and palms, bananas, lemons growing everywhere. Fireflies at night would surprise you. Ants, mosquitoes, and lizards are all over the house."

MARTYRS IN AFRICA.

The Congo Balolo Mission, under the care of Dr. and Mrs. Guinness' Institute, has been seriously afflicted in recent months by the death, one after another, of its missionaries in Balololand, victims of the hæmaturic fever, for which as yet there has been discovered no successful mode of treatment. The mission force is still crippled, but those who have fallen die bravely, calling upon others to come and fill the places which will be made vacant by their death. Volunteers are offering themselves to go. An English missionary, while passing in toward the gold fields of southeastern Africa, says that he counted sixty graves of white men who had preceded him but a few months before in the search for earthly riches. And yet men were coming in companies in search of the coveted gold-dust, and no surprise was expressed that they should come. It is only when men are attracted by the hope of winning souls, more precious than gold, that there is surprise at their not being warned by the fate of their predecessors.

A CHILD-WIDOW'S LAMENT

The bitter need of the people of India for the elevating influences of Christianity is seen nowhere so conspicuous as in the home where there is a child widow. There are more than a million child widows in India, who are betrothed, when infants, to boys and become widows owing to the early death of the boys to whom they were betrothed, and thenceforth are looked upon as disgraced. The following sad complaint of a young child widow of India carries with it its own story of cruelty and injustice: "Every visitor to the house speaks of me ironically and treats me with disdain. From every word I speak, offence is taken. My heart has become sore from the piercing of these bitter words. I am deprived of every pleasure. In the house one woman will be engaged in adorning herself in fine robes, another will be busy combing her hair, blacking her eyes and teeth, another will be making the house ring with the tinkling of her foot jewels and ankle ornaments, while I am condemned to sit in a corner and weep alone with a broken heart. But if anyone should happen to see me weeping, he would consider it a bad omen and curse me for it. The will of my persecutors is that I should neither scream nor weep, but die quietly in my misery. While the whole family enjoys delicious food, I am served with coarse bread. I am strictly forbidden the comfort of sleeping upon a bedstead, but a mat upon the floor and a coarse piece of carpet is my bedding. The barber's wife shaves my head daily. On every festive occasion, and at weddings, every one is present but me. The women whose husbands are alive take the lead in all ceremonies. One sings, one plays on the musical instruments, another puts on the holiday costume, another primps with pride before the looking-glass, while I am shut up in my room to prevent the ill omen which would be the result of my face being seen. Who can be more wretched than I? I look upon all sides, but find no comforter. There is no one to enquire into my condition, and no one to wipe away my tears. The Lord Jesus Christ gave life to the dead, but His followers do not attempt to relieve us from our sufferings."

FATAL IRRESOLUTION.

Five men were clinging to the mast of a vessel, which in a terrible storm was drifting swiftly, helplessly, against a stone pier. On shore willing helpers had thrown a rope, which reached them, and the words rang out, "Hold fast the rope, and leave the mast at the word 'Now.'" Suddenly they heard it, and with trusting hearts let go the mast, and were drawn safely to shore. All but one. With straining eyes they saw one still on the wreck he had hesitated to leave. Many times they threw the rope again, but it missed him, and soon the vessel was dashed in pieces against the pier and the man was lost. How many souls have been lost in the same way! They could not bring themselves to let go of the world and trust to Christ when they heard the warning cry, "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

AT THE DOOR

"I STAND at the door and knock."
"Who art Thou, Lord?"
"One whom the proud priests mock,
Deaf to my Word.
But loving thee, thus late
With thee I plead and wait
For kiss and rest."
"Enter, O Guest."

"Lovest Me more than these?"
"But who art Thou?"
"A King to whom all knees
Shall one day bow:
But once a robe of scorn
And crown of twisted thorn
For thee I wore."
"Lord, I adore."

"Arise, and follow Me."
"But who art Thou?"
"A Guide and Staff for thee,
Yea here, and now;
An arm for aid alway,
A Light upon the way,
Before thine eyes."
"I will arise."

"Be watchful! Pray."
"But wherefore, Lord? for whom?"
"Light is passing away,
Soon through the gloom
Cometh Bridegroom apace
In the closing hour of grace;
And for his dear sake—"
"I shall awake." —JAMES MOFFAT.

A MURDERER'S CONFESSION.

During her recent tour in Australia, Mrs. Bayertz was the means of the conversion of a murderer. She says: "I noticed among my hearers several men of the criminal type with with such faces as you see nowhere in such numbers as in prisons and convict settlements. I longed to reach some of them and I exclaimed, 'However guilty you may be, I am authorized to offer you salvation. If there be a murderer here I can say to him, The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, the blood of Jesus will cleanse you from the stain of blood. Among the audience, unknown to me was a man who had committed murder. He told me afterwards he had committed murder when a very young man, and had been condemned to be hung, but on account of his youth the sentence was commuted to a long term of imprisonment, which he had served. He had looked upon himself as an outcast before both God and man, as one for whom there was no mercy neither here nor hereafter, but my words brought new life to him, and he repeated to himself, 'If there be a murderer here I can say to him the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin!' At the after meeting one of the workers spoke to him, and heard his sorrowful story, and when he left the meeting he was rejoicing in the fact that 'The blood of Jesus Christ had cleansed from all sin.'"

AN OUTSIDE LISTENER.

In a recent address on her work in some of the darkest regions of southern Europe, Mrs. Bayertz said: "One of the most remarkable instances of conversion that has ever come under my notice was that of a man, an infidel, who when invited to come to the meetings, refused because the speaker was a woman, and he did not believe in women as public speakers. However, curiosity got the better of his scruples, and one evening he stationed himself outside the building, under an open window where he could hear all that was said inside. He listened, and God's word convicted him of sin. Next Sunday he was in the church and when I spoke to him he said, 'Mistress Bayertz, I fear I have committed the unpardonable sin, but I have a praying mother.' He seemed to think that her prayers might prevail to give him amother chance of the kingdom.

"I assured him that his very fear lest he had committed the unpardonable sin might convince him that he had not; but when he told me that the Spirit had not striven with him for six years, I urged him with even greater earnestness than before to come to Christ there and then, lest the Holy Spirit was giving this final knock at the door of his heart before leaving him to his doom. It brought joy to my heart when he decided to renounce his old ways and come out and out for Christ, surrendering to him, and giving to his service all that was left of his life."

PREACHING TO DIAMOND SEEKERS.

At Kimberley, in South Africa, the "compounds" are large enclosures extending over several acres each, and surrounded with rough corrugated iron sheds, where the natives live who work in the diamond mines. When they are admitted they become voluntary prisoners for at least three months. Many of them remain in longer, or after a holiday return for a second period of service. The high wages earned attract natives from nearly every tribe south of the Zambesi. In these compounds there are opportunities of giving the Gospel to strangers from afar, and most remarkable and cheering are the instances one comes across in which men have accepted Christ while in the compounds, learned to read, and returned to their own home and friends to tell them the wonderful story of the Cross. Sunday is the day to see the compounds at their busiest, for during the week half the men are working in the mines on the day shift, and the other half on the night shift. Some two or three thousand Africans, clothed in the most motley rags one could imagine, throng the enclosure. At one end a war dance is in full swing, while many are driving a busy trade in gambling with dice. They stake their hard-earned money with the utmost nonchalance. There is a good hospital for sickness or accident. No intoxicating liquor is allowed within the gates. When the missionary rings a large handbell and plays a hymn, this attracts a considerable number, who gather round, and right in the midst of all the bustle and din a service is carried on.

One can distinguish the Christians, for as they come up they bend a moment in silent prayer, and sit down with Bible and hymn-book in hand. The address is delivered in one dialect and translated into another by one of the natives, so that most can understand.

THE WORLD'S GOLD.

Mr. Preston, Acting Director of the United States Mint is authority for these figures: Total stock of gold in the world, $5,582,605,000; of silver, $4,042,700,000. Of the gold France has $800,000,000; the United States $604,000,000 Germany, $600,000,000; Great Britain, $550,000,000; Russia, $250,000,000. Of the silver, France, $700,000,000; United States, $615,000,000; Germany, $211,000,000; Great Britain, $100,000,000; Russia, $60,000,000.

THE LABORERS ARE FEW.

When the total statistics of missions are submitted to hearers, one gets the notion that the laborers are many rather than few. But let the number be placed side by side with the population to whom they are sent, and the impression is very different. China has one to 733,000 population, Siam one to 600,000, Corea one to 500,000, India one to 350,000, Africa one to 300,000.

In Central Africa and the Soudan the proportion is one to each 5,000,000. What are these among so many? Like the five barley loaves, they must be multiplied to supply the needs of the hungry multitude.

REUNION IN HEAVEN.

WHERE the faded flower shall freshen,
Freshen, never more to fade;
Where the shaded sky shall brighten,
Brighten nevermore to shade;
Where the sun-blaze never scorches;
Where the star-beams cease to chill;
Where no tempest stirs the echoes
Of the wood or wave or hill;
Where the morn shall wake in gladness,
And the moon the joy prolong;
Where the daylight dies in fragrance
'Mid the burst of holy song—
Brother, we shall meet and rest
'Mid the holy and the blest.

Where no shadow shall bewilder;
Where life's vain parade is o'er;
Where the sleep of sin is broken,
And the dreamer dreams no more.
Where the bond is never severed—
Partings, claspings, sob, and moan;
Midnight waking, twilight weeping,
Heavy noontide—all are done;
Where the child has found its mother;
Where the mother finds the child;
Where dear families are gathered
That were scattered on the wild—
Brother, we shall meet and rest
'Mid the holy and the blest. —BONAR.

AN ESTIMATE OF TIME.

Describing a journey of scientific interest, the famous banker, Sir John Lubbock says: Some time ago I paid a visit to the principal lake village of Switzerland, in company with a distinguished archæologist, M. Morlot. To my surprise I found that his whole income was $500 a year, part of which, moreover, he spent in making a small museum. I asked him whether he contemplated accepting any post or office, but he said certainly not. He valued his leisure and opportunities as priceless possessions, and would not waste any of his time in making money.

A CHILD'S GLORIOUS DEATH-BED.

A very touching and beautiful story is related by a little girl who lay very ill. The physicians had done all they could for the sufferer and at last the day came when Ellen must leave her mamma. She stood by her bedside and papa and Aunt Mary were there, but they could not ease her pain, or go with her through the valley of the shadow of death. "Mamma, Papa," she said, "what are you crying for? I am not afraid. 'He shall carry the lambs in his bosom.' I am one of his lambs and I want to go to him, won't you let me?" They could not answer her, and she went on, "Sing for me, dear mamma, sing, 'Bright glory!'" Her poor mamma tried, but sobs choked her voice, and she could not, "Papa, will you sing? Aunt will you? Nurse will you sing 'Joyful' for me?" All tried but all failed; so little Ellen raised herself and sung:

Little children will be there,
Who have sought the Lord by prayer,
And trusted in his grace;
O that will be joyful, joyful, joyful, joyful,
O that will be joyful,
When we meet ——.

The little head fell back upon the pillow, and the song begun on earth was finished in 'Bright glory,' for Ellen was dead!

Christianity in Russia.

The "Holy Synod," established by Peter the Great, which Administers the Religious Affairs of a Vast Empire—Peculiar Types.

RUSSIA is almost as complex in its government as it is cosmopolitan in its population. With nearly 124,000,000 subjects, representing over fifty distinct nationalities, and occupying one seventh of the entire land surface of the globe, from pole to equator, it can readily be understood that the task of administering the affairs of so vast a constituency is attended with the greatest difficulties. The administration is entrusted to four great boards or councils, each possessing separate functions. They are: 1. The Council of State, whose members are appointed by the Emperor, and which controls the departments of Legislation, Civil and Church Administration and Finance. 2. The "Pravitelstvuvuschiy Senat," or Ruling Senate, which Peter I. established nearly two centuries ago, and which is a high court of justice, and the promulgator of all laws. It has nine subordinate courts, all of which sit at the Capital. 3. The "Holy Synod," also established by Peter, and which administers the religious affairs of the Empire. 4. The Ministerial Committee, which is equivalent to the Cabinets of other nations. The Emperor, besides the above, has two private Cabinets, one dealing with charities and the other with the public instruction of girls and the administration of philanthropic institutions. There are other minor bodies, and, in addition, the Empire is divided into general governments, vice-royalties and districts, the whole system representing a total of nearly nine hundred administrative bodies, of which nearly eight hundred are district governments. There are besides 107,493 communes, each with its own "starosta" (or elder), tax collector and superintendent, who are elected at the communal assemblies. All are amenable to imperial control, the Czar being absolutely over all.

The illustrations on this page (from a photograph brought from Russia by the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), show the palatial building occupied jointly by the Senate and Synod, and three familiar types frequently met in Russia: the priest, the religious mendicant, and the peasant laborer. The building is near the Admiralty on the banks of the "Great Neva," and is a remarkably handsome and imposing structure, erected about fifty years ago. In one part of the building are the offices of the nine senatorial departments, two of which are Courts of Cassation. The Senators are usually persons of high rank, but a lawyer of distinction, who represents the Emperor, presides. The "Holy Synod," which also meets in the building, is composed of three Metropolitans and a number of bishops of the Orthodox Greek Church, the President being the Metropolitan of Novgorod and St. Petersburg. All the decisions of the Synod, like those of the Senate, are couched in the name of the Czar, and have no force until they receive his approval. A number of the Greek Church officials reside in the building.

THE "SENATE AND SYNOD" BUILDING, ST. PETERSBURG, RUSSIA.

With illustrations of the typical Russian Priest, Mendicant and Peasant, from life photographs made specially for "The Christian Herald."

Christianity was introduced into Russia in the Ninth Century. There is a tradition that the Apostle Andrew had planted the first cross at Kiev, but this cannot be authenticated. The patriarch Ignatius, of Constantinople, sent missionaries to Russia over a thousand years ago. The first prominent convert was Princess Olga, Regent of Russia during the minority of her son. She was baptized, and although her son did not become a Christian, her grandson, "Vladimir, the Apostle-like," (980 to 1014) not only embraced Christianity, but through his influence all Russia adopted the religion of Jesus. The people cast the images of Peroun and other heathen gods into the rivers, and came to be baptized by thousands. Metropolitans of the new faith were established at five principal cities and the Church grew in strength and influence. In the seventeenth century, the Russian Church was declared an independent organization, although its patriarchs were still confirmed at Constantinople. It was left to Peter the Great to accomplish the most

The Tabernacle Pulpit

NINETEEN HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY;

A Proposition Concerning it. Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Isa. 9: 6, "To us a child is born."

WHAT is a tremendous hour in the history of any family when an immortal spirit is incarnated. Out of a very dark cloud there descends a very bright morning. One life spared and another given. All the bells of gladness ring over the cradle. I know not why anyone should doubt that of old a star pointed down to the Saviour's birthplace, for a star of joy points down to every honorable nativity. A new eternity dates from that hour, that minute. Beautiful and appropriate is the custom of celebrating the anniversary of such an event, and clear on into the eighties and the nineties, the recurrence of that day of the year in an old man's life causes recognition and more or less congratulation. So, also, nations are accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of their birth and the anniversary of the birth of their great heroes or deliverers or benefactors. The 22d of February and the 4th of July are never allowed to pass in our land without banquet and oration and bell ringing and cannonade. But all other birthday anniversaries are tame compared with the Christmas festivity, which celebrates the birthday described in my text. Protestant and Catholic and Greek churches, with all the power of music and garland and procession and doxology, put the words of my text into national and continental and hemispheric chorus: "To us a child is born." On the 25th of December each year that is the theme in St. Paul's and St. Peter's and St. Mark's and St. Isaac's and all the dedicated cathedrals, chapels, meeting-houses and churches clear round the world. We shall soon reach the nineteen hundredth anniversary of that happiest event of all time. This century is dying. Only seven more pulsations and its heart will cease to beat. The fingers of many of you will write at the head of your letters and the foot of your important documents, "1900." It will be a physical and moral sensation unlike anything else you have before experienced. Not one hand that wrote "1801" at the induction of this century will have cunning left to write "1901" at the induction of another. The death of one century and the birth of another century will be sublime and impressive and stupendous beyond all [illegible] date. To stand by the grave of one century and by the cradle of another will be an opportunity such as whole generations of the world's inhabitants never [illegible] be no sickness or casualty to hinder your arrival at that goal, or to hinder your taking part in the valedictory of the [illegible] the new. But as that season will be the nineteen hundredth anniversary of a Saviour's birth, I now nominate that a great International Jubilee or Exposition be opened in this cluster of cities by the seacoast on Christmas Day, the 25th of December, 1900, to be continued for at least one month into the year 1901. This century closing December 31st, 1900, and the new century beginning January 1st, 1901, will it not be time for all nations to turn aside for a few weeks or months from everything else and emphasize the birth of the greatest Being who ever touched our planet, and could there be a more appropriate time for such commemoration than this culmination of the centuries which are dated from his nativity. You know that all history dates either from before Christ or after Christ, from B. C. or A. D. It will be the year of our Lord 1900, passing into the year 1901. We have had the Centennial at Philadelphia, celebrative of the one hundredth anniversary of our nation's birth. We have had the magnificent Expositions at New Orleans, and Atlanta, and Augusta and St. Louis. We have the present World's Exposition at Chicago, celebrative of the four hundredth anniversary of this continent's emergence, and there are at least two other great celebrations promised for this country, and other countries will have their historic events to commemorate, but the one event that has most to do with the welfare of all nations is the arrival of Jesus Christ on this planet, and all the enthusiasm ever witnessed at London or Vienna or Paris or any of our American cities would be eclipsed by the enthusiasm that would celebrate the ransom of all nations, the first step towards the accomplishing of it being taken by an infantile foot one winter's night, about five miles from Jerusalem, when the clouds dropped the angelic cantata: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good-will to men."

The three or four questions that would be asked me concerning this nomination of time and place, I proceed to answer. What practical use would come of such international celebration? Answer: the biggest stride the world ever took toward the evangelization of all nations. That is a grand and wonderful convocation, the Religious Congress at Chicago. It will put intelligently before the world the nature of false religions which have been brutalizing the nations, trampling womanhood into the dust, enacting the horrors of infanticide, kindling funeral pyres for shrieking victims, and rolling juggernauts across the mangled bodies of their worshippers. But no one supposes that anyone will be converted to Christ by hearing Confucianism or Buddhism or any form of heathenism eulogized. That is to be done afterward. And how can it so well be done as by a celebration of many weeks of the birth and character and achievements of the wondrous and unprecedented Christ? To such an exposition the kings and queens of the earth would not send their representatives: they would come themselves. The story of a Saviour's advent could not be told without telling the story of his mission. All the world would say, Why this ado, this universal demonstration? What a vivid presentation it would be, when, at such a convocation, the physicians of the world should tell what Christ had done for hospitals and the assuagement of human pain, and when Christian lawyers declare what Christ has done for the establishment of good laws, and Christian conquerors should tell what Christ had done in the conquest of nations, and Christian rulers of the earth would tell what Christ had done in the government of earthly dominions. Thirty days of such celebration would do more to tell the world who Christ is than any thirty years. Not a land on earth but would hear of it and discuss it. Not an eye so dimmed by the superstition of ages but would see the illumination. The difference of Christ's religion from all others is that its one way of dissemination is by a simple "telling," not argument, not skilful exegesis, polemics or the science of theological fisticuffs, but "telling." "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh." "Go quickly and tell his disciples that he has risen from the dead." "Go home to thy friends and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." "When he is come, he will tell us all things." A religion of "telling." And in what way could all nations so well be told that Christ had come as by such an international emphasizing of his nativity? All India would cry out about such an affair, for you know they have their railroads and telegraphs; "What is going on in America?" All China would cry out: "What is that great excitement in America?" All the islands of the sea would come down to the gang planks of the arriving ships, and ask: "What is it that they are celebrating in America?" It would be the mightiest missionary movement the world has ever seen. It would be the turning point in the world's destiny. It would waken the slumbering nations with one touch.

Question the second: How would you have such an international jubilee conducted? Answer: all arts should be marshalled, and art in its most attractive and impressive shape. First: architecture. While all Academies of Music and all churches and all great halls would be needed, there should be one great auditorium erected to hold such an audience as has never been seen on any sacred occasion in America. If Scribonius Curio at the cost of a kingdom could build the first two vast amphitheatres, placing them back to back, holding great audiences for dramatic representation, and then by wonderful machinery could turn them round with all their audiences in them, making the two auditoriums one amphitheatre, to witness a gladiatorial contest, and Vespasian could construct the Colosseum, with its eighty columns and its triumphs in three orders of Greek architecture and a capacity to hold eighty-seven thousand people seated and fifteen thousand standing, and all for purposes of cruelty and sin, cannot our glorious Christianity rear in honor of our glorious Christ a structure large enough to hold fifty thousand of its worshippers? If we go groping now among the ruined amphitheatres of Verona, and Pompeii, and Capua, and Puzzuoli, and Tarraco, and then stand transfixed with amazement at their immense sweep that held from fifty to a hundred thousand spectators gathered for carousal and moral degradation, could not Christianity afford one architectural achievement that would hold and enthrall its fifty thousand Christian disciples? Do you say no human voice could be heard throughout such a building? Ah! then you were not present when at the Boston Peace Jubilee Parepa easily with her voice enchanted fifty thousand auditors. And the time is near at hand when in Theological Seminaries, where our young men are being trained for the ministry, the voice will be developed, and instead of the mumbling ministers, who speak with so low a tone you cannot hear unless you lean forward, and hold your hand behind your ear, and then are able to guess the general drift of the subject, and decide quite well whether it is about Moses or Paul or some one else—instead of that you will have coming from the Theological Seminaries all over the land young ministers with voice enough to command the attention of an audience of fifty thousand people. That is the reason that the Lord gives us two lungs instead of one. It is the Divine way of saying physiologically, "Be heard!" That is the reason that the New Testament in beginning the account of Christ's sermon on the mount, describes our Lord's plain articulation, and resound of utterance by saying, "He opened his mouth." In that mighty concert hall and preaching place which I suggest for this Ninteen Hundredth Anniversary, let music crown our Lord. Bring all the orchestras, all the oratorios, all the Philharmonic and Handel and Haydn Societies. Then give us Haydn's oratorio of the Creation, for our Lord took part in universe-building and "without him," says John, "was not anything made that was made," and Handel's "Messiah," and Beethoven's "Symphonies" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the prophet that typified our Christ, and the grandest compositions of German and English and American masters, living or dead. All instruments that can hum or roll or whisper or harp or flute or clap or trumpet or thunder the praises of the Lord, joined to all voices that can chant or warble or precentor multitudinous worshippers. What an arousing when fifty thousand join in Antioch or Coronation or Ariel, rising into Hallelujah, or subsiding into an almost supernatural Amen!

Yea, let Sculpture stand on pedestals all around that building, the forms of apostles and martyrs, men and women, who spoke or wrought, or suffered by headsman's axe or fire. Where is my favorite of all arts, this art of sculpture that it is not busier for Christ or that its work is not better appreciated? Let it come forth at that World's Jubilee of the Nativity. We want a second Phidias to do for that new Temple what the first Phidias did for the Parthenon. Let the marble of Carrara come to resurrection to celebrate our Lord's Resurrection. Let sculptors set up in that Auditorium of Christ's celebration bas-relief and intaglio descriptive of the battles won for our holy religion. Where are the Canovas of the nineteenth century? Where are the American Thorwaldsens and Chantreys? Hidden somewhere I warrant you. Let sculpture turn that place into another Acropolis, but more glorious by as much as our Christ is stronger than their Hercules, and has more to do with the sea than their Neptune, and raises greater harvests than their Ceres and rouses more music in the heart of the world than their Apollo. "The gods of the heathen are nothing but dumb idols, but our Lord made the heavens." In marble pure as snow celebrate Him, who came to make us "whiter than snow." Let the chisel as well as pencil and pen be put down at the feet of Jesus.

Yea, let Painting do its best. The foreign galleries will loan for such a jubilee their Madonnas, their Angelos, their Reubens, their Raphaels, their "Christ at the Jordan," or "Christ at the Last Supper," or "Christ coming to Judgment," or "Christ on the Throne of Universal Dominion," and our own Morans will put their pencils into the Nineteen hundredth anniversary, and our Bierstadts from sketching "The domes of the Yosemite" will come to present the domes of the world conquered for Emmanuel.

Added to all this I would have a floral decoration on a scale never equalled. The fields and open gardens could not furnish it, for it will be winter, and that season appropriately chosen, for it was into the frosts and desolations of winter that Christ immigrated when he came to our world. But while the fields will be bare, the conservatories and hot houses within two hundred miles would gladly keep the sacred Colosseum radiant and aromatic during all the convocations.

Added to all, let there be banquets, not like the drunken bout at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, celebrating the Centennial of Washington's Inauguration where the rivers of wine drowned the sobriety of so many senators and governors and generals, but a banquet for the poor, the feeding of scores of thousands of people of a world in which the majority of the inhabitants have never yet had enough to eat: not a banquet at which a few favored men and women of social or political fortune shall sit, but such a banquet as Christ ordered when he told his servants to "go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in." Let the Mayors of cities and the Governors of States and the President of the United States proclaim a whole week of legal holiday, at least from Christmas Day to New Year's Day.

Added to this let there be at that international moral and religious Exposition a mammoth distribution of sacred literature. Let the leading ministers of religion from England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, and the world, take the pulpits of all these cities, and tell what they know of Him whose birth we celebrate. At those convocations let vast sums of money be raised for churches, for asylums, for schools, for colleges, all of which institutions were born in the heart of Christ. On that day and in that season when Christ gave himself to the world, let the world give itself to Him.

Why do I propose America as the country for this convocation? Because most other lands have a State religion, and while all forms of religion may be tolerated in many lands, America is the only country on earth where all evangelical denominations stand on an even footing and all would have equal hearing in such an international exposition. Why do I select this cluster of seacoast cities? Answer: By that time December 25th, 1900, these four cities of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City and Hoboken, by bridges and tunnels, will be practically one, and with an aggregate population of about four millions. Consequently no other part of America will have such immensity of population.

Why do I now make this nomination of time and place? Answer: Because such a stupendous movement cannot be extemporized. It will take seven years to get ready for such an overtowering celebration, and the work ought to begin speedily in churches, in colleges, in legislatures, in congresses, in parliaments, in all styles of national assemblages, and we have no time to lose. It would take three years to make a programme worthy of such a coming together.

Why do I take it upon myself to make such a nomination of time and place? Answer: Because it so happens that, in the mysterious providence of God, born in a farmhouse and of no royal or princely descent, the doors of communication are open to me every week by the secular and religious printing-presses, and have been open to me every week for many years, with all the cities and towns and neighborhoods of Christendom, and indeed in lands outside of Christendom, where printing-presses have been established, and I feel that if there is anything worthy in this proposition, it will be heeded and adopted. On the other hand, if it be too sanguine, or too hopeful, or too impractical, I am sure it will do no harm that I have expressed my wish for such an International Jubilee, celebrative of the birth of our Immanuel. My friends, such a birthday celebration at the close of one century and reaching into a new century would be something in which heaven and earth could join. It would not only be international, but inter-planetary, inter-stellar, inter-constellation. If you remember what occurred on the first Christmas night, you know that it was not a joy confined to our world. The choir above Bethlehem was imported from another world, and when the Star left its usual sphere to designate the birthplace, all astronomy felt the thrill. If there be anything true about our religion, it is that other worlds are sympathetic with this world and in communication with it. The glorified of heaven would join in such a celebration. The generations that toiled to have the world for Christ would take part in such jubilation and prolonged assemblage. The upper galleries of God's universe would applaud the scene, whether we heard the clap of their wings and the shout of their voices, or did not hear them. Prophets who predicted the Messiah, and Apostles who talked with him, and martyrs who died for him, would take part in the scene, though to our poor eyesight they might be invisible. The old missionaries who died in the malarial swamps of Africa, or were struck down by Egyptian typhus, or were butchered at Lucknow, or were slain by Bornesian cannibals, would come down from their thrones to rejoice that at last Christ had been heard of, and so speedily in all nations. At the first roll of the first overture of the first day of that meeting all heaven would cry: "Hear! Hear!"

Aye! Aye! I bethink myself such a vast procedure as that might hasten our Lord's coming, and that the expectation of many millions of Christians, who believe in the Second Advent, might be realized then at that conjunction of the Nineteenth and Twentieth centuries. I do not say it would be, yet who knows but that our blessed and adored Master, pleased with such a plan of world-wide observance, might say, concerning this wandering and rebellious planet: "That world, at last, shows a disposition to appreciate what I have done for it, and with one wave of my scarred hand, I will bless and reclaim and save it." That such a celebration of our Lord's birth, kept up for days and months, would please all the good of earth, and mightily speed on the Gospel chariot, and please all the heavens, saintly, cherubic, seraphic, archangelic, and Divine, is beyond question. Oh, get ready for the world's greatest festivity! Tune your voices for the world's greatest anthem. Lift the arches for the world's mightiest procession. Let the advancing standard of the Army of Years, which has inscribed on one side of it "1900" and on the other side "1901," have also inscribed on it the most charming name of all the universe—the name of Jesus.

Whether this suggestion of a World's celebration of the Nativity be taken or not, it has allowed me an opportunity in a somewhat unusual way of expressing my love for the great Central Character of all time and all eternity. He is the Infinite None-such. The armies of heaven drop on their knees before him. After Bourdaloue, before overwhelmed audiences, has preached him, and Milton in immortal blank-verse has sung him, and Michael Angelo has glorified the ceiling of the Vatican with his Second Coming, and martyrs while girdled and canopied with the flames of the stake have with burning lips, kissed his memory, and in the "hundred and forty and four thousand" of heaven with feet on seas of glass intershot with sunrise, have with uplifted and down-swung baton, and sounding cornets, and waving banners, and heaven-capturing Doxologies celebrated him, the story of his loveliness, and his might and his beauty, and his grandeur, and his grace, and his intercession, and his sacrifice, and of his birth and his death will remain untold. Be his name on our lips while we live, and when we die after we have spoken farewell to father and mother, and wife, and child, let us speak that name which is the lullaby of earth and the transport of heaven

Before the crossing of time on the midnight between December 31, 1900, and the first of January, 1901, many of us will be gone. Some of you will hear the clock strike twelve of one century and an hour after it hear it strike one of another century, but many of you will not that midnight hear either the stroke of the city clock, or of the old timepiece in the hallway of the homestead. Seven years cut a wide swath through churches and communities and nations. But those who cross from world to world before Old Time in this world crosses that midnight from century to century will talk among the Thrones of the coming earthly jubilee, and on the River bank and in the House of Many Mansions, until all heaven will know of the coming of that celebration, that will fill the earthly nations with joy and help augment the nations of heaven. But, whether here or there, we will take part in the music and the banqueting, if we have made the Lord our portion. Oh, how I would like to stand at my front door some morning or noon or night and see the sky part and the Blessed Lord descend in person, not as he will come in the last Judgment, with fire and hail and earthquake, but in sweet tenderness, to pardon all sin, and heal all wounds, and wipe away all tears, and feed all hunger, and right all wrongs, and illumine all darkness, and break all bondage, and harmonize all discords. Some think he will thus come, but about that coming I make no prophecy, for I am not enough learned in the Scriptures, as some of my friends are, to announce a very positive opinion. But this I do know, that it would be well for us to have an International and an Inter-world celebration of the anniversary of his birthday about the time of the birth of the new century, and that it will be wise beyond all other wisdom for us to take him as our present and everlasting coadjutor, and if that Darling of earth and heaven will only accept you and me, after all our lifetime of unworthiness and sin, we can never pay him what we owe, though, through all the eternity to come, we had every hour a new song and every moment a new ascription of homage and praise. For you see we were far out among the lost sheep that the Gospel hymn so pathetically describes:

Out in the desert he heard its cry,
Sick and helpless and ready to die;
But all through the mountains, thunder-riven,
And up from the rocky steep,
There rises a cry to the gate of Heaven;
"Rejoice, I have found my sheep!"
And the angels echo round the throne:
"Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own!"

A REMARKABLE MOVEMENT.

Reports have been received recently by the Missionary Societies of the turning of some whole villages in India toward the Christian faith. One of these is at the village of Jamadivipeta, near Vizagapatam. The origin of the movement was over thirty years ago, when a native preacher met a Sepoy and told him the story of the Gospel. This Sepoy, after service in the army, took his pension and returned to Jamadevipeta, his native village, and began to talk about Christ. One young man was much influenced. Two years ago when a catechist was preaching in a neighboring town, this man bought a new Testament and with others came to the mission premises at Vizagapatam to learn mote of Christianity. Returning to their village they were visited by the missionary, Mr. Thomas. The movement had evidently taken great hold upon the people, and a short time ago a service was held at which fifteen adults were baptized. The people of the village crowded to the Christian assemblies to join in singing hymns. While there are some forms of opposition to the movement, it seems to have taken a deep hold upon the whole community.

Christianity in Russia.

important change in the Russian Church. He abolished the patriarchate and substituted the permanent Synod of prelates presided over by the Emperor or his secretary, thus applying the monarchical principle to church as well as state affairs. With certain modifications, the church government of Russia has remained so to this day. It has been a church of great missionary zeal, despite this lack of free voluntary action, and it has done much toward the conversion to Christianity of the Mohammedan and pagan subjects of the Czar's vast empire. The Russian Church and the Orthodox Eastern Church have their doctrine in common, holding that Constantinople has priority in church government over Rome, and rejecting absolutely the Romish doctrine of Papal infallibility. Nor do they worship the virgin as the Catholics do. In many other details of creed and organization, they differ from Rome.

In striking contrast to the splendid architecture of the Senate and Synod building, are the three portraits given on the first page, drawn from photographs taken from life. Here are three distinct types that are found almost everywhere in Russia. The stern soldierly-bearded face on the right, whose firm lips and heavy features indicate the possession of courage combined with stolidity, is that of a peasant in the agricultural districts—wretchedly poor, miserably housed, ill-fed and half starved they are, as a rule. In the centre is a religious fakir or peddler-mendicant, of the type one encounters in the market-places, at fairs and on the public highways, ostensibly selling amulets and cheap trinkets, but in reality soliciting alms. The third portrait—on the left—is that of a well-nourished rural priest of the orthodox Greek Church, whose jovial, rubicund face and merry eye show that he is on good terms with himself and all the world. Many of the priests in the Russian church performed effective service in distributing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Fund supplies among the starving peasants of that country, a year ago.

A BRAHMAN SAMUEL

In a letter to the American Board from Tirumangalam, India, Mr. Wright relates the following incident: "On Sunday last, after the lesson, I was asking the boys what they expected to do when they came to be men. One of them said he hoped to be a minister. When I asked him how long he had been thinking of this, he replied: 'I am dedicated to the Lord from my birth. That is why my name is Samuel.' This is a Brahman boy. His parents are Christians. The boy is a member of our Endeavor Society. I am glad there are many Christian boys in India, but few are Brahmans, and still fewer dedicated to the ministry.

"When I see the great temples here that have stood for scores, and some of them for hundreds of years; when I see the people flocking by thousands and tens of thousands yearly, and in some cases monthly, to the great feasts of these temples; when I learn how they are endowed and what large sums of money are spent for the maintenance of these temples, and how the people are wedded to their Hindoo faiths, I feel like saying, with Paul, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' But when I see a Brahman boy, sitting among his fellows and saying with true Christian grace, 'I am dedicated to the Lord from my birth,' it does my heart good and I take courage."

In India, as in other lands, it is rapidly being demonstrated that the secret of missionary success lies in educating native evangelists to work in the field heretofore occupied almost exclusively by white Christian teachers. The young disciples of to-day will be the Gospel teachers of the next generation.

REDEMPTION IN CHRIST.

S S. Lesson for Oct. 8 Rom 3 : 19-26. Golden Text, Rom. 3 : 24 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"THE redemption that is in Christ Jesus!" Who can understand all it means for lost sinners and for the saved of the Lord, called to be saints, and to be conformed to the image of his Son? For the church, and for the world. O! how much is included in redemption! It is the beginning of all things for the children of God; it stands between them and their past; it is their present security and power; it is their hope for the future. Can we ever forget that we were redeemed not with corruptible things, with silver and gold, from our vain manner of life handed down from our fathers, but with precious blood as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ? (1. Pet. 1: 18, 19, R.V.) There is no way into a life at peace with God but through the redeeming blood of Christ; "he that climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." (John 10: 1.)

All attempts to come near to God without redemption are utterly futile. The only recommendation we have to God is that we are redeemed; we are paid for us, because of the blood shed for us. By nature there is none righteous, no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable, there is none that doeth good, no, not one . . . The way of peace have they not known, there is no fear of God before their eyes." And this is but the negative side; the positive is still more terrible; the mouth which, when redeemed and cleansed, is God's instrument to praise him, and to make known the way of life, is by nature, "full of cursing and bitterness," the throat an open sepulchre, containing the poison of asps and a tongue full of deceit! "Their feet are swift to shed blood, distruction and misery are in their ways." Is it indeed such who are redeemed and at such a cost? Is it such utter ruin, such utter worthlessness which is redeemed at such a price? Even so. Valueless in ourselves the redemption price has given God's redeemed ones a priceless value, a value beyond the angels who never fell!

But how shall ignorant, lost, unspiritual man come to the knowledge of redemption? "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ that we might be justified by faith" (Gal. 3: 24.) But what things soever the law saith it speaketh to them that are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped and all the world may be brought under the judgment of God because by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight." What does the law say? "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" it is the ministration of death. (II.Cor.3: 7.) By the law also is the knowledge of sin and so shews up the evil of our hearts and lives by nature. But knowing we are wrong does not make us right, and efforts to do better cannot undo what has been wrong in the past, nor yet does it change the tendency of our nature to repeat what is wrong. If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." [illegible] be. There must be a radical [illegible] must be new, there must be [illegible] tives of obedience. "The carnal mind is enmity [illegible] of such a nature, bringing forth [illegible] spirit, "cannot please God." They that are in the flesh cannot please God. The law is holy and just and good, but it does not meet with that in a natural heart which can [illegible] redemption. The law breaks down for want of hearts prepared for it; "it was weak through the flesh." There was but one thing it could do with such hearts as ours are by natue, it could give a knowledge of sin, it could unsettle and disturb, and this was all! The law of God makes even the natural man but it cannot deliver him from sin. But while by the works of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight, yet God does not leave his sintul fallen ones to perish: there is a "justification by faith in Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe." But no man can take the credit to himself; he can be justified, not so as to lay God under an obligation to him, but only "freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a Propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past; through the forbearance of God."

Does then the redemption do what the law cannot do? Yes; the law could not give life, could not even revoke the sentence of death which is on every sinner, could not change the motives and the will. But redemption does all this; it declares God's righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, but at the same time it redeems us from all which made the past what it was, redeems . . . from your vain manner of life handed down by tradition from your fathers. If through a righteousness of our own we could have atoned for the past, we could have taken a position of independance, so to speak, and been quits with our God. But we had become an utter ruin; helpless, hopeless in ourselves; all help must come from without. We might do things very right in our own eyes, but we could not make these things please God, and, like angry Cain, we might stand beside our unaccepted altar indignant, but rejected! Redemption puts us on another footing: Another has espoused our cause, Another has stepped into our place; not what we are, but what he is avails. He has gone down into condemnation, disgrace, death, burial, for us; identifying himself with our cause as though it were his own. Thus he reckons his death as though it were our death, and we take the same place as those who have died for their sins, aud died unto sin. As long as we look at our past in relation to ourselves, to what we have been, what we have done, what we are or what we do, there is nothing but condemnation for us; but as identified with Christ, who identified himself with us, we are crucified in him, dead with him, abjuring all credit which can accrue to us, we pass on all to him; and he takes the blame which is our portion too. We are redeemed from our very nature as we enter into the fulness of his redemption, for Christ is made unto us of God both wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. It is not what he has done alone, but what he is which is redemption to us. He separates us from our past by what he is, and what he is in us. His presence in us is a redemption from our past, from all we are, from our circumstances, from our will, from our affections, and also from the overwhelming power of physical infirmity as we trust him.

Until our beloved Lord shall have succeeded in accomplishing the fulness of redemption which was in his purpose, and shall have overcome the last enemy "death," by taking away at his coming those who shall not sleep, but be changed "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," the creation will go on groaning. What hinders his coming? What hinders the accomplishment of the fulness of his redemption? Surely it is that His Called Ones are not Ready.

Many were called to the marriage feast but "they which were bidden were not worthy." (Matt. 22: 8). Ten virgins went forth to meet the Bridegroom, but five of them had no oil in their lamps. The last picture of the Church in the seven epistles of Rev. 2: 3, is a condition of lukewarmness. But it is while the church is in just such a condition that the call comes to individual members: "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore and repent. If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him and he with me. To him that overcometh with I give to sit with me in my throne even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." The Church as a whole gets more and more lukewarm; but in the midst of her growing coldness, the very overcomers are developed who will overcome as Christ overcame; and so will come about "the manifestation of the sons of God" which the creation is waiting for, before the fulness of redemption, "the redemption of our body" from the cause of death which sin brought upon it, can be accomplished. While the creation waits for the manifestation of the sons of God, for the full development of the Christ life in us, his life who is the firstborn among many brethren who are conformed to his image,—we who have the first fruits of the Spirit also groan "waiting for the adoption."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

CHRISTianity in its objective aspect is the subject of the lesson. Paul appears to regard his work as resembling the problem of restoring to society a criminal, who is not only under sentence of death, but is suffering from a loathsome disease. The man needs pardon and healing. That was, according to Paul's idea, the condition of the human race. Farther on, in the same epistle, he shows the way of healing; in the paasage selected for this lesson, he shows the way of pardon. He approaches his subject by showing that the whole race is concerned in it, both Jew and Gentile being sinners against God. In declaring an offer of pardon he considers first the character of God. How can God be a just Ruler and yet pardon sinners? Our civil relations help us to understand this difficulty; for we should have no respect for the Governor of a State if he pardoned notorious criminals and did not enforce the law. Paul deals with the question from his Jewish standpoint. The way of escape under the old dispensation, was by sacrifice, and he conceives that it is to be so under the new. But the old system of the sacrifice of animals is abolished, and in its stead is a sacrifice so precious, so inconceivably costly, that it shall avail for all men and all ages. He sees that sacrifice in Christ. Accordingly the life and teaching of Christ become to him matters of small moment, compared with his death and resurrection. It is Christ the sacrifice, Christ crucified, that he preaches. Paul thinks of him as the representative in heaven of the human race. This idea of a representative was also drawn from Jewish theology. God had already recognized the principle of representation when he treated the human race as having all fallen in Adam. Here was another representative, a second Adam, infinitely greater than the first, but as fully representative. What the race lost by its first representative it was to gain by its second. The sin of the one with all its vast train of disastrous consequences was to be atoned for by the sacrifice of the other. Thus Christianity became in Paul's mind the development and culmination of Judaism; and God was dealing with the whole race, under higher forms, on the same principles as he had dealt with the Jews. By virtue of the sacrifice of the Divine Representative, he could forgive sinners while remaining just.

Them that are under the law. The Apostle perceived what every man's experience confirms, that the law cannot change mind or disposition. It needs the power of God to do that. Peloubet tells the following: One gentleman said to another in an argument, "How would you like to live in a place where no one drank any liquor, or ever smoked a cigar?" "Very much," was the reply, "it would be excellent." "And where every one went to church every Sunday?" "What a delightful place!" "And where no one steals or forges or cheats?" "Yes, yes; where is there such a place? But there can be none!" "Oh yes there is; you can find it in every well regulated State prison."

The sinner can find no comfort in the law. If he has broken it he cannot look to it for a remedy. He must pay the penalty or obtain forgiveness from the law. The existence of tenderest love, at the same time with the administration of law, is illustrated by a recent court scene in Alabama. A judge was called upon to pronounce sentence upon one of the dearest friends of his life. The evidence had shown the prisoner guilty of a violation of the law, and the judge had to pronounce sentence accordingly. When he did so his feelings were so moved he could scarcly proceed. He wept like a child, saying it was the most painful duty of his life.

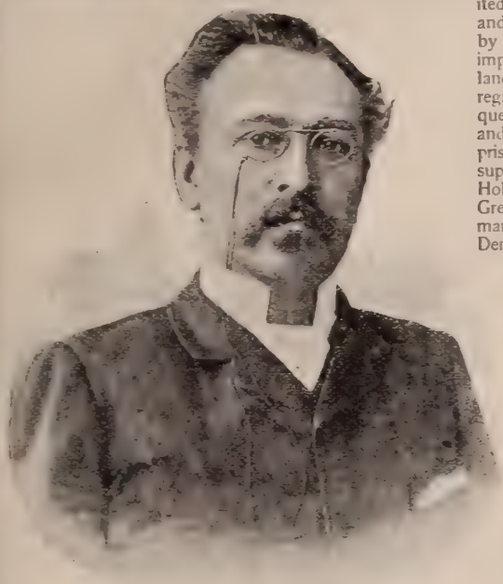
Every mouth stopped. Nothing can be done toward saving a person who does not know that he needs salvation. So long as any one justifies himself there is no use in pardon. We see that in children. Not until the child says, "I have done wrong; I am sorry," can the wise parent forgive. Carlyle says that "the greatest of faults is to be conscious of none." A German prince, travelling through France, came to Toulon, where the galleys are kept. The commandant, as a eompliment to him, offered to set any one slave at liberty. The prince, on inquiry from the slaves found that they were all innocent and ill-treated. At last he came to one who said, "My Lord, I have no reason to complain. I have been a very wicked and desperate wretch. I have oft deserved to be broken on the wheel." The prince looked at him, and said, "You wicked wretch, by your own confession you are bad enough to corrupt all these honest men; you shall not stay with them another day." Then, turning to the officer, he added, "This is the man, whom I wish released."

A propitiation. To propitiate any person is to make an offering to atone for some wrongdoing. In this sense Paul represents the death of Christ on the cross as an atonement for the violation of the law by sinners. The late John Angell James used the following vivid but partial illustration of the doctrine: Zeleucus king of the Locri enacted a law against a heinous offence which was becoming common in his dominions. To deter his people from committing it he decreed that the punishment should be that whoever committed it should have his eyes put out. The first offender found guilty of the crime was the king's own son. The king shrank from making blind the son whom he so dearly loved, yet having enacted the law, he could make no exception in his son's favor. Finally the king determined that he would give one of his own eyes for his son's sake. The king lost an eye and his son lost an eye, that the majesty of the law might be upheld.

The remission of sins that are past. Will Carleton relates an incident, illustrating the meaning of the word remit. A certain deacon owned a house in a town some miles away from the place in which he lived. A friend used to collect the rent from the tenant and send it to him. The tenant was a widow with a large family and she was very poor. On one occasion, when the month's rent was due, the deacon received a letter from his friend, in which he incidentally mentioned how needy the widow was and that her rent was not ready. The deacon was not a liberal man and he considered himself entitled to his rent, so in replying to the letter he made no allusion to the indirect appeal, but simply wrote, "Please remit Widow ——'s rent for November." To his amazement he received a letter in reply, praising him for his generosity and heartily thanking him in the widow's behalf. "What does the man mean?" the deacon exclaimed, "I meant him to send me a remittance of the money." He was in no mood to lose the month's rent, so he set out to look up his friend and ascertain what was wrong. When he arrived, he learned that his friend was out of town, so he went to the widow to undeceive her. The widow no sooner saw him than, without waiting for him to speak, she poured out her thanks. Pointing to the meal on the table, she told him they would have had only dry bread but for his generosity. She told him of the sickness of one of her children and other troubles and how timely his help had been at the worst crisis. As he listened to her story, he could not bear to tell her his errand. He made up his mind to let the mistake stand and lose the month's rent. After leaving the widow's house, he went to that of his fiend, who by that time had returned. "How about that rent of Widow ——'s that I asked you to remit?" he asked abruptly. "Oh, I told her, and she was very thankful" "May I ask," said the deacon, "what you take to be the meaning of the word remit?" "To relinquish, to forgive, to resign, that is what Webster says." "Well here is a five dollar bill which you may remit to the widow." "I will do so with pleasure." "Did it ever occur to you before," the deacon asked, "that there's two ways of remitting?"

A Prison Evangelist.

Charles Cook, the Modern Howard, and his Life-Work — Preacher, Lecturer, Philanthropist and Missionary — An Eventful Christian Career in Many Lands.



CHARLES COOK, EVANGELIST.

A REMARKABLE illustration of the mysterious and beneficent workings of God's providence is furnished in the career of Charles Cook, the English evangelist, who is now visiting the United States. Mr. Cook, who was born in London in 1846, was an orphan at fifteen, with an ample income, which he proceeded to spend in dissipation. For a time he lived in a whirl of sinful pleasures, his principal amusements being gambling, horse-racing, casinos, theatres and dancing-gardens. Day and night were alike to the young sybarite, and he continued his course unchecked till 1867 when he happened to hear a powerful sermon preached on the text: "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." That sermon haunted him; it came like a message from heaven, calling a halt in the young man's downward career; and soon, under full conviction of sin, he yielded himself to Christ, and inspired with divine strength and courage, resolutely began a new life.

Soon the secret of his joy was so great that he felt impelled to impart it to others, and to the astonishment of his friends, the former young prodigal became an ardent evangelist, publicly telling the Gospel message wherever he found an opportunity. In the parks, on street corners and in the common lodging-houses he became a familiar speaker. In many other English cities too, besides London, he prosecuted the work and addressed great audiences. On one occasion, while preaching at Lowestoft in 1879, there was a cry that a boy had fallen overboard and was drowning. Mr. Cook, although a poor swimmer, immediately responded to the call by stripping off his hat and coat and leaping into the sea, where he upheld the lad till both were rescued. A similar heroic incident occurred a few months ago, when Miss Lydia Cook, the nineteen-year-old daughter of the evangelist, was rescued from drowning in the Thames near Shepperton Locks. She had slipped off a launch into the water and was being swept away by the rapid current, when her father plunged in, encumbered as he was by his clothing, and managed to sustain her until the arrival of a boat. On a third occasion also, Mr. Cook was instrumental in saving a human life. These instances show the brave, generous, impulsive nature of the man, who, upheld by high Christian purpose and conviction, does not hesitate for a moment to place his own life in jeopardy for the sake of another.

Almost at the outset of his spiritual career, Mr. Cook displayed a warm interest in the welfare of the criminal classes, and during the years that have passed since then, his efforts have been blessed in being the means of reforming many hundreds of convicts in different parts of the world. Eleven years ago, he visited the prisons of the United States and supplemented this experience by visiting those of nearly every important city in Europe. In England he had already begun to be regarded as an authority on all questions affecting the morality and humanitarianism of the British prisons, and the system of convict supervision. In Belgium, France, Holland, Italy, Egypt, Bavaria, Greece, Austria, Hungary, Germany, Morocco, Spain, Russia, Denmark, Finland and Sweden, he studied prison life, being accorded special facilities by the various governments for that purpose. In ancient as well as modern prisons, in the gloomy old dungeons of the Tower of London, and the rugged Bass Rock, in picturesque Chillon Castle on Lake Geneva, the Kasbah of Tangier in Morocco, and in the Mamertine Prison in Rome where Paul the Apostle was confined as well as Newgate, Millbank, Dartmoor, and Portsmouth in England, the Tombs and Sing Sing in America, he has closely studied prison life and its methods. He has recorded these experiences and observations in a most interesting volume entitled: The Prisons of the World.

During those years it has been Mr. Cook's endeavor to provide the Word to such prisoners as were not already supplied with Bibles and Testaments, and to alleviate their sorrows wherever possible, by talking with and advising them. In numerous instances this "bread cast upon the waters" has returned, after many days, in the conversion of convicts. In many places the evangelist interceded for prisoners whom he found penned in foul, unwholesome jails, and secured an improvement in their surroundings, and in some instances he was successful in abating prison abuses. A protest which he made to the Khedive of Egypt against the inhuman detention of hundreds of prisoners without a trial resulted in the release of 150 of them, three days later. Some of the pictures he draws of the brutal treatment of prisoners by jailers and wardens, of their slow starvation, and horrible agony as they lie loaded with chains, of the indignities to which they are subjected, and the terrible hopelessness of their situation, are touching in the extreme. His powerful and unsparing exposures of these crying abuses and his manly Christian acts and attitude on the whole question of the prisoners have won for him the love and admiration of thousands in England and elsewhere. The late Pastor Spurgeon in 1889 called him "the Howard of our day" and truly the spirituality and consecrated energy of John Howard of Bedford seem to have been inherited in no small degree by Charles Cook, who has given a large part of his life to the cause of the unfortunate. He has performed a work whose beneficent influence will be felt for many years, and has been instrumental in securing needed reforms in the prison systems in different parts of the globe.

But Mr. Cook's efforts in the Gospel field have by no means been confined to the occupants of prison cells. He has conducted a grand and successful work in open-air missions and mission halls. In London these services are invariably attended by very large audiences.

As a proof of the cosmopolitan character of his work it may be stated that his converts represent sixteen nationalities. A few days ago he met in the streets of New York a young man from Hyde Park, London, a convert, and in the afternoon of the same day he met at services in the Academy of Music, another convert of Hyde Park Hall. In the evening, Charles Minor, a converted comedian, who had also been brought to Christ through the London work, called upon him.

Mr. Cook has recently visited anew Germany, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, and Russia, and held services in many churches in these different countries. This season he has completed twenty-two years of open-air services at Hyde Park, London, the meetings being known as the largest regular open-air meetings in the world. When in England, in September, of last year, Rev. Dr. Talmage, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, preached for Mr. Cook to an audience of 20,000 people at Hyde Park, on which occasion a way was made for the preacher through the crowd with the aid of six policemen.

During his recent visit to Russia, Mr. Cook was permitted by the authorities to visit the prisons, preach to the prisoners and to distribute as many Scriptures as he wished. After two days' work in distributing Testaments in one prison in Moscow, there were still 1,500 men unsupplied. At a subsequent visit to the same prison, he found that 40,000 men pass annually into Siberia. Having inspected most of the European and Asiatic prisons, the evangelist is now here to go through American prisons, hoping to preach in those of the different States. He will also lecture in the cities through which he passes. When in England he has usually worked in connection with the churches, and will be glad to hear from any of the ministers of the different churches in the United States who desire to invite him to lecture. Mr. Cook is open to preach in the churches on Sundays, while in America. He has a large church and a congregation of over 2,000 in London.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

THE KASBAH PRISON, TANGIER, VISITED BY CHARLES COOK—A DESPONDENT CONVICT.

"Luke Nineteen."

How the Title of a Text Became Words of Life to a Soldier

THE following story, which appears in the report of the English Evangelisation Society, will be read with interest: Mr. John de Burgh Rochfort, of the Evangelisation Society, conducted in 1891 a fortnight's mission at the Soldiers' Home at Chatham. He had nearly come to his last afternoon, and was considering what should be the subject of his evening address. One subject after another presented itself to his mind, and each in turn was reejcted. The afternoon had come to an end, and he was still undecided. He left the house about half an hour before the time of service, and went out to the Chatham Lines—the garrison parade ground—and there, walking up and down, he lifted up his heart to God for guidance. Suddenly the words seemed almost to sound in his ears, "Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house," and he at once felt that he had received his subject from God in answer to his prayer. It was long since he had spoken on these words, and, returning to his room, he took a sheet of note-paper, and spent the few minutes that remained before the meeting in jotting down one or two points that he would dwell on in his address. Then he went down to the meeting, and when the time came for him to speak he gave out his subject thus: "Luke Nineteen, Verse Five. Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house." With this as the basis of his address, he preached the Gospel as plainly, as earnestly, and as solemnly as he could, and prayed God to give his blessing.

Nearly a year passed. Again he was at Chatham, and again going to speak in the Soldiers' Home. "There's a man here very anxious to see you," said the lady in charge that evening, as he sat at tea. "He was converted during your last visit to us, and he wants to tell you about it. There is no questioning as to the greatness of the change that has taken place in him." Gladly Mr. Rochfort sought the man, and the next day he heard the account of his conversion from his own lips. He said, "I had been ill a long time, and had been an in-patient of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. They put me in the Luke ward, and my bed was number nineteen. So I was always called in the hospital 'Luke Nineteen.' I think they hardly knew my proper name, for when the sister had written to me, she had begun her letter, 'Dear Luke Nineteen.' So you see sir, when you stood up and began by saying, 'Luke Nineteen,' I knew it was for me, and listened to all you said." Yes, and thank God, he not only listened, but he received by faith what he heard, and in his case it was clearly seen that the Gospel is as still as ever most truly the power of God unto salvation. From that night he gave evidence of being indeed a new creature in Christ Jesus.

PUBLICATION OF SERMONS.

NOT long ago a group of clergymen by resolution denounced the publication of their sermons by the secular press. They say that the Monday synopses of their discourses do them injustice; that the pastors are represented as saying things they never said, and that isolated sentences are taken out of their connection, and that, upon the whole, sermonic reporting in the secular press is damaging to the pulpit and to Christianity. So far from being the cause of complaint it ought to be a matter of thanksgiving to God that in this country the secular press has become the means of Gospel proclamation. In England all this work is left to the religious weeklies, and the London Times and the lesser lights rarely make mention of sermons or Christian exhortation. Suppose all the sermons reported in our secular papers were dull and useless, the text would be there, and who can tell what the publication of twenty scriptural passages per week among the millions accosted by the American printing press may do for the world's evangelization? Ministers must not be nervous about occasional reportorial mistakes. There is no perfection in this world—not even in the pulpit. The general rule is that if a sermon has anything useful in it, community comes to get that fact, though the phraseology in it may be a little twisted. The simple fact is that some people are as afraid as of death of a reporter. They do not realize that the men who write in front of the pulpit have their mission to fill as certainly as the man who stands in the pulpit.

A pastor ought not to say anything on Sabbath that he should be ashamed to see in print next morning. If the Gospel you preach is not fit for the fifty thousand readers, then it is not fit for the five hundred auditors. Beside, you have no right to put upon journalists the errors of type-setters. Remember that most of the newspapers are set up in the night, and that it is almost miraculous that there should be so few typographical errors. The utmost caligrapical care cannot hinder mistakes. The Eclectic Review was, by mistake, advertised as the [illegible] of Sully, Prime Minister to Henry the Great, as the Memoirs by Solly, Prime Minister to Henry the Great! Daniel S. Dickinson, Senator of the United States, told me that he thought the type-setters had cut off ten years of his lifetime, and a French author died of chagrin at three hundred typographical errors in his book, and Rev. Dr. Todd, having written something on the lives of saints, found it printed the lies of saints, and by the change of one letter, an enthusiastic reception of a political orator read "the air was rent with the snouts of ten thousand people." I once chased a typographical error all around the world, and failed to catch it; since which time I never correct anything. I put the gun to my shoulder and shoot, letting other people pick up the game. But you are to remember that those whose opinion is worth anything will understand what are mistakes. You are not to let little things hinder your appreciation of the fact that the Gospel of reform for this life and happiness for the next life is carried every week on the wings of the secular press to unconverted millions who would never otherwise see or hear the message. This is the telephone set up by the Lord which makes all the church and all the world one audience. The cylinder of the printing-press is the front wheel of the Lord's chariot. Let it roll on. Let the compositor set up ten thousand "ems" a day. Let the stereotyper hasten with his work, and our perfecting presses strike off the fifty thousand impressions per hour. Place them all in line, the religious and secular presses of Christendom, and at the command of God's providence rush these battering rams against the walls of ignorance and sin until they fall flat as the walls of Jericho at the blast of the rams' horns.

UNFIT FOOD.

MY attention has been recently called to the adulteration of articles of food. It is hard to get anything in our cities not touched by commercial fraud. Many things, once a deception, have ceased to be such. Once when you bought milk off the average milkman you supposed it to be milk; but now you buy it for water and chalk, and so there is no deception. But who can estimate the outrage practised on the community by sugars mixed with ground glass, and baking powders with alum instead of cream of tartar. Well did the late Dr. Crane call the attention of Boards of Health to this last evil. Let the official authorities put on sharper spectacle and spy out and expose this dreadful despoliation of the people's food. Let pepper be pepper and not brick-dust. Let coffee be coffee and not chickory and dried horse-liver. Let the bread that comes in from the bakery be the staff of life instead of the sickle of death. It is generally supposed that the upper rooms of a house control the lower, the sitting-room managing the kitchen, so persons denounce dietary discussions as belittling, as as the poet puts it,

Fat ox and goose itself oppose
And blaspheme custards through the nose.

There never was a graver mistake. The skill of the kitchen decides the health, the disposition, and, to some extent, the morals of the whole establishment. Many a battle has been lost through the dyspeptic twinge of the commanding officer. We masculines have yet to learn that the kitchen is the most important end of the household. If that go wrong, the whole establishment is wrong. Heavy bread, too great frequency of plum puddings, mingling lemonade and pudding, unmasticable beef, have decided the fate of sermons, store-houses, legislative halls and the destiny of empires. The kitchen knife has often cut off the brightest prospects. The kitchen gridiron has often consumed a commercial enterprise. The kitchen kettle has kept many a good man in hot water. It will never be fully known how much of the history of the world was affected by good or bad cooking. In the discussion among Boards of Health, about the adulteration of the food, every household of the nation ought to be interested.

The things we do understand are in small minority. The things we do not understand are in vast majority. We do right in wading out into the mysteries of Providence so far as we can keep our footing, but when we find ourselves getting beyond our depth, we had better come back to the shore and cry out with the psalmist: "Thy judgments, O Lord, are a great deep."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Covington, Pa. If a person wishes to publish a book under the name of a "compilation," what are the rules governing the using of matter as published in books, periodicals, etc.?

The compiler must first secure the written permission of the author or publisher of any copyrighted matter, before he can legally reproduce it in such a "compilation."

S. Hetrick, Harper, Kas. Why did Christ enjoin (Matt. 5: 48) his people to be perfect? Is it possible?

He set them a standard which they were to strive to attain. Every man is conscious when he commits sin that he is not compelled to do it. It is within his power to abstain from sin. Unhappily, when we look within and around, we are apt to think perfection is beyond our reach, but those who strive after it are the better for the struggle and will, at any rate, be kept humble.

J. B. B., Mastine, Ga. Is there more than one true, visible church? If not, which is the right one? Why do Baptists practice close communion?

It is like an army composed of many regiments and each finds some work for Christ which it is specially adapted to perform. The Baptists who practice close communion consider that those who have not been baptized by immersion have been disobedient to the Lord's command, or rather have not obeyed it literally and therefore think that joining them at the Lord's table would be condoning their offence.

Reader, Kingland, Tex. Please tell me, through your correspondence columns, something about the science "Hypnotism." Is it a science?

It is not accorded a place among the sciences. Hypnotism is a development of animal magnetism or mesmerism, and while it has undoubtedly a true scientific, psychologic basis, its nature and phenomena have been so grossly exaggerated and misrepresented by charlatans that it has come to be regarded with discredit by honest investigators. Its present condition is that of a pseudo-science.

Old Subscriber, N. Y. City. Who was the founder of the Christadelphians, and where do they differ from other Christian bodies?

John Thomas, a physician founded the sect called Christadelphians about 1860. They were an offshoot from the sect known as the "Disciples of Christ." They reject the Trinity and hold that Jesus is the manifestation of the eternal spirit of God, that there is only immortality in Christ, that immersion is essential to salvation, that all who are in Christ are his brethren and that only those holding this creed will be resurrected, all others being annihilated.

G. W. S. In our prayer-meeting, a few weeks ago, our leader, in speaking of growing in grace, said we could grow "outward, inward, downward, and upward." I thought "upward" was the only way to grow in grace. The apostle Paul exhorts us to grow "in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and if I understand the teaching of Christ, it was upward, and no other way.

Your leader doubtless intended to convey that growth in grace affected every part of one's life, character, and conduct, and that, in exterior life, even to the smallest action, as well as inwardly, the change is perceptible. Such a remark is to be taken figuratively, rather than literally.

Sydney D. Bate, Corydon, Ky. 1. When and where was the first Union Sunday School formed and by whom? 2. When was the American Sunday School Union organized and by whom? 3. Have its principles in law are the literature and [illegible] been changed? Does any denominations [illegible] and who are they?

1. In Philadelphia in 1824. 2. The Philadelphia Sunday and Adult School Union was founded in 1817 and this, with similar societies started later, was changed to the American Sunday School Union in 1824. 3. By voluntary contributors. A Committee of Publication consisting of twelve members representing the Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Friends, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian and Reformed churches, decides on all questions as to the literature to be published and arranges for its preparation and production. 4. Part of the last answer applies to this question. Every Christian Protestant denomination is represented in the Union, which is not a union of churches but of individual Christians connected with the different denominations.

W. S. Forsey, South Finch, Ont. Will you kindly give me your opinion of "clairvoyance:" is it from an evil source or otherwise? I have met two or three in my lifetime and must admit they have made some remarkable predictions which came true.

It is to be ranked with kindred legerdemain or occult trickery, such as mind-reading, spirit-rapping, fortune-telling, etc. These mystical accomplishments are uniformly acquired by persons who are not calculated to produce confidence in honest minds. Professors who claim to be able to see what ordinary mortals cannot see, and to read your thoughts, had better be set down as arrant humbugs. They are simply shrewd, unscrupulous students of human nature skilled and practised in deceiving the uninitiated. There is nothing supernatural about it.

Miss S. M. Clarke, Ozone Park, Long Island, N. Y. I recall an anniversary hymn, sung by the members of the Macdougal Street Baptist Church, Rev. Duncan Dunbar, Pastor, and Samuel W. Seton, Superintendent of the Sunday School, of which I was a member more than fifty years ago. My mother was a member of the church and many a time going to Sunday School at 9 o'clock in the morning I have seen Mr. Seton walking up and down the street in front of the Church, picking up all the little ragged, barefooted children, and taking them by the hand into the school. Will you please ask through your valuable paper if any of your readers can send me the other verses?

There is a friend we ought to love
More than all friends beside:
His name is Jesus and his love
Forever shall abide.
Come, children, then, for now he lives,
And praise from little ones receives,
With lip and life we'll praise His name
And not forget he loves again

Laura Moore, Barnet, Vt. Is the "Golden Rule" broad enough to be applied to woman and governmental affairs? Will it ever be substituted for the barbaric law, "Might makes right," by the so-called civilized nations?

True philosophy, both ancient and modern, regards the essential principle of the "Golden Rule," as the key to the world's temporal and spiritual happiness and well-being, but not even the most sanguine indulges the expectation that it will ever prevail, until the ushering in of the millennium. It is broad enough to be applied to all the affairs of human life upon this planet, both sexes and all matters of government included. Yet, with twenty millions of armed men in Europe at the present moment—probably the greatest aggregated host the world has yet seen—it does not seem that the law of love has yet substantially superseded the law of might, even among the highly civilized peoples.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

WAR IMPENDING IN AFRICA.

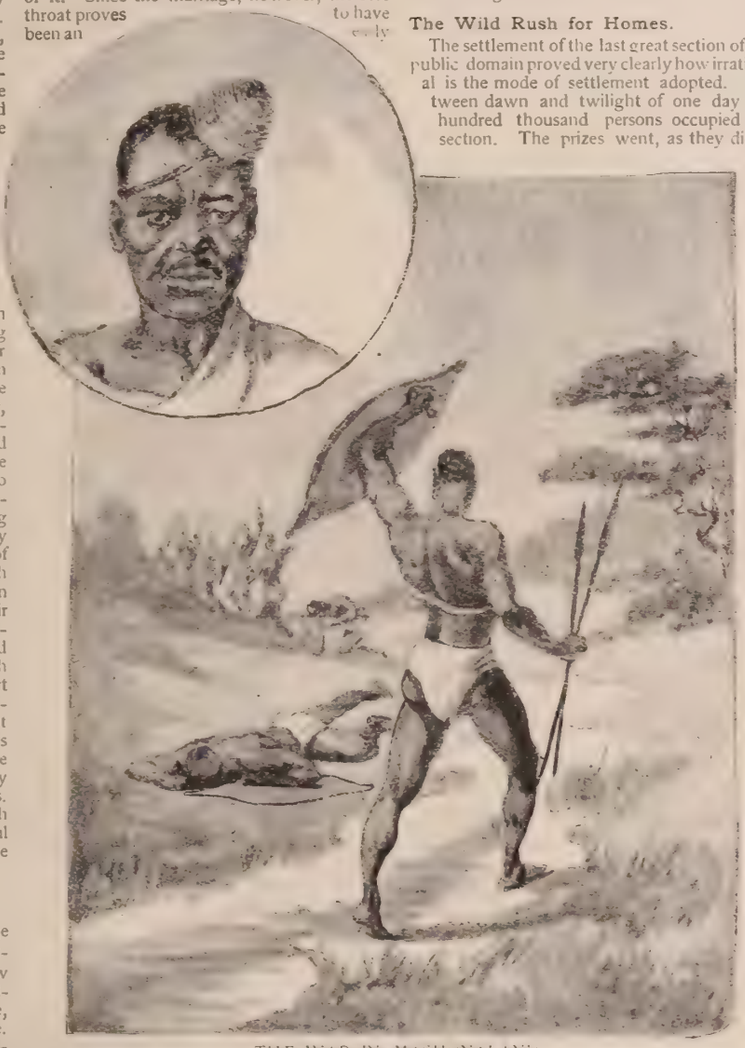
OMINOUS dispatches from Mashonaland in South Africa, have been received. They report that the Matabele nation, under King Lobengula, was about to invade Mashonaland, which is under British protection. Fort Victoria appeared, at the time the dispatches left, to be the objective point of the Matabele invasion. The Mashona men, women and children in large numbers have taken refuge there and the white garrison has promised them to fight to the death rather than surrender them to their ruthless foes. The Matabeles have been the scourge of Mashonaland and its neighbors for more than half a century. In the year 1828 Moselekatze, the great Zulu general, rebelled against the king of Zululand and with twenty thousand warriors quitted the country. They went northward to find a settlement, crossed the Limpopo River and invaded the district occupied by the Mashonas and Makolakas. Both tribes were easily subdued by the fierce Zulu warriors; many were killed and the survivors were enslaved. That was the origin of the Matabele nation. The Zulu conquerors had no industries and lived by the labors of the subject races and the spoils of their annual wars. Mashonaland became impoverished under their sway and Lobengula, the successor of Moselekatze, willingly sold it to the British three years ago and retired to the Makolaka country. England prudently bargained that the payment should be partly in money down and partly in a monthly subsidy of $500, payable during good behavior. Mashonaland revived after the departure of the Matabele Zulus and soon became a tempting field for the raids of the young Zulu warriors. Lobengula, however, remembering the terms of his monthly pension, restrained them. But he is getting old now and appears to have lost his grip on the people. A few of them made a raid into Mashonaland, about three months ago, ostensibly to punish the Mashonas for stealing Matabele cattle. As the charge was clearly false, the Mashonas being too much afraid of the Matabeles to provoke a quarrel, the British forces drove the Matabeles back into their own land. Then the Matabeles mustered all their forces for war and the result is greatly dreaded. They are stalwart men and well trained warriors and are superior in numbers, though probably not in equipment, to the forces at Fort Victoria. It may be hoped that in the providence of God a massacre may be averted, but the situation as described in the dispatches is evidently very critical. There would be more hope of a peaceful solution if more missionary work had been done among the Matabeles. Although they may be beaten in battle such natures as theirs can never be made peaceful by any influence less powerful than the grace of God in Christ. (Ezek. 21: 14.)

An Heroic Feat.

An act of heroism demanding rare courage was performed on Sept. 14, by three workmen on a steam drill on the Sound, near New York. They were awakened soon after midnight by a man who told them that the dredge, to which the drill was attached, was on fire. Instantly, the three men whose names are Edward Hudsons, James Higgins and Michael Fullerton, realized that an awful danger was impending. On the deck of the drill, toward which the wind was carrying the flames from the burning dredge, were a number of large cartridges containing three hundred pounds of forcite powder, an explosive more dangerous than dynamite. If once the flames touched them, the dredge, drill and tug-boat and all they contained would be blown to atoms. Already the flames were so near that the men could not reach the cartridges without being scorched. But they determined to make the attempt. Taking their lives in their hands, they went to the pile of cartridges and began throwing them overboard. The flames crept nearer and the men knew that one spark on the burdens in their arms meant a horrible death; but they worked on until the last cartridge fell into the black water at the side of the craft and the danger was past. They knew that while a cartridge remained on board, their lives were in danger and they braved death to get rid of them. It would be well if men who are in spiritual peril through some habit or lust in their nature would show similar heroism. Christ, who knew all things, said it was better to make the struggle even if it entailed as much suffering as the loss of a right hand or a right eye. (Matt. 5: 29-30.)

Deadly Embraces.

An epidemic which has a remarkable origin is reported from a village near Jamestown, N. Y. A wedding took place there about a month ago which was numerously attended. Both the bride and bridegroom had a large circle of friends, who came to witness the ceremony. The custom of saluting the bride, who was very popular in the neighborhood, was generally observed. She was suffering at the time from a sore throat, but as it occasioned her very little pain, she made no complaint of it. Since the marriage, however, the sore throat proves to have been an early stage of diphtheria and she has had a very severe attack of the disease. More than twenty persons who kissed her on the evening of the marriage, when offering their good wishes, have since been prostrated by the dangerous malady and three of them have died. Doubtless the bride feels poignant sorrow that her friends, in expressing their love and good-will to her, should have contracted the disease from which she was unconsciously suffering. So it has sometimes been with spiritual maladies. Many who have become Christians late in life, have shed bitter tears as they thought of the mischief they wrought in former years on their associates. (Rom. 14: 7.)



THE WAR IN MASHONALAND
Head of a Typical Matabele Warrior—A Matabele Attack.

Gave Her Blood for Her Friend.

A remarkable proof of affection was given a few days ago in a Boston hospital by a lady of that city. She went to the hospital to visit a friend who had been accidentally asphyxiated by gas. She was told by the physicians that there was little hope of her friend's recovery, as she had been all night in a room with the gas-burner turned on. The physician had been unable to restore her to consciousness and she seemed to be dying. Could nothing be done to save her? the visitor asked. She was told that in such cases patients had sometimes been saved by pumping good blood from the veins of a healthy person into those of the sufferer, but it was always regarded as a last resource. The lady at once freely offered herself for the service. An incision was made in her arm and a glass tube inserted which conveyed the warm blood into the chill shoulder of the unconscious patient. The experiment was repeated at two other parts of the patient's body and then the incisions were closed. The lady never quailed, but bore the operation with wonderful courage. She was cheered by the assurance of the doctors that her friend's recovery had been rendered probable by her service. If their predictions are verified and the patient recovers, she will doubtless be more careful about the gas in future. If she were to deliberately turn it on, unlighted, she would do a grievous wrong to her friend and herself. Yet how many are there for whom Christ gave his blood to rescue them from the consequences of sin who are still living in sin and making his sacrifice void. (Heb. 10:26-29.)

The Wild Rush for Homes.

The settlement of the last great section of the public domain proved very clearly how irrational is the mode of settlement adopted. Between dawn and twilight of one day one hundred thousand persons occupied the section. The prizes went, as they did in the other cases, to the people who could by physical force or trickery get an advantage over their competitors. Speculators and the agents of speculators won the prizes which should have gone to needy people and people whose record showed their capacity for building up the section. Thousands had been waiting on the border of the Cherokee Strip for days for the chance to secure a share of the six million acres, when the booming cannon at noon on September 16 gave the signal for the rush. Then the race on horseback, in wagon and on foot commenced and ten thousand persons fought to get on board a train that would hold only one thousand. All decency, self-respect, manhood and consideration for the weak was cast to the winds. Women had their clothes torn off their backs and many were thrown down and trampled upon. When the best sites were reached, the struggle was even worse. Disputes were numerous. The first reports show that over a score of persons were then known to have been murdered and hundreds had been severely injured. If some wealthy man, desiring to give his property to the poor, turned it all into money and announced that on a certain day he would throw it out of an upper window for a crowd to scramble for, he would not have done a more reprehensible thing than the Department of the Interior has done in this and previous openings. It was a direct incitement to the worst passions of our people and especially to the selfishness which is as inimical to the public spirit, that makes a nation strong, as it is to the principles of Christianity. The struggle itself shows how much more responsive human nature is to an opportunity of material gain than it is to an opportunity of spiritual advantage. If the offer of an eternal inheritance "which fadeth not away," aroused as much earnestness to secure it, as the offer of homes on the Cherokee Strip did, nations would be born in a day. (I Peter 1:4.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mrs. Bishop, the famous traveler in farther Asia, is proposing a journey through inland China, to learn about missionary work.

Five hundred Mohammedan missionaries go out from Cairo every year, and travel through Eastern lands, teaching everywhere the religion of the Koran.

An eminent clergyman who was much maligned in his day was asked why he did not contradict the false stories circulated about him. He replied: "Any man who would believe the stories, would not believe my denial."

The Prison Association of New York has decided to hold monthly conferences at its rooms, 135 East Fifteenth Street, for the discussion of problems connected with the reclamation of criminals, when all suggestions will receive respectful attention. The first conference will take place Oct. 19.

The eighty-fourth annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions will be held at Worcester, Mass., in Mechanics' Hall, commencing Tuesday, Oct. 10th and closing Friday. An effort will be made to make the Prudential Committee more representative of the churches.

The programme of the meeting to be held by the Evangelical Alliance at Chicago Oct. 8-15, has been issued. The list of subjects includes the following: Christian Liberty; The Religious Condition of Protestant Christendom; Christian Union and Co-operation; The Church and Social Problems. Germany, Italy, France, England and the Netherlands are sending able representatives.

Rev. C. P. Hard, the famous missionary, whose labors in India have been much blessed, delivered a lecture on Theosophy, at Hornellsville, N. Y., on Sept. 8. He said that Theosophy was dying out in India, its birthplace, and that during the past two years forty thousand persons in India had renounced their native religions and had been baptized by Christian missionaries.

Mr. H. P. Gibbud of the Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y., of which a description appeared in this journal on Aug. 2, writes us that no less than twenty-five thousand persons have heard the Gospel from the platform of the wagon sent out from the Mission during the past season. The number of persons who have made profession of faith at the meetings was 353.

Dr. Robert H. Nassau writes us from on board the steamer Cameroon the good news of his safe arrival at Las Palmas, on the West Coast of Africa. He expected by Sept. 20 to reach the sphere of his future labors at Gaboon, on the equator. The eminent and devoted missionary shows in his letter how glad he is after his brief visit to his native land, to be again in the field.

Evangelist E. P. Telford has reluctantly cancelled his engagements for the fall and winter and returned to England. This change in his plans was due to Mrs. Telford's health. She has been suffering from a throat trouble which, in the opinion of her physician, would become dangerous if she remained in this country. Mr. Telford expects to resume his work at Nottingham after a short season in London.

Secretary of State Gresham has received a dispatch from our embassy in Turkey stating that seven men who were concerned in the attacks on Miss Melton, the American missionary, have been arrested and sent to Mosne for trial. Rev. E. W. McDowell writes to the Presbyterian Board: "Such a thing as punishing a Turk for doing something to a Christian has never been heard of before and the arrest of the chief men is beyond their comprehension. They boasted that they would fix the matter with the Vali and return in a few days to put us out and punish all who helped us. More soldiers will reach here to-morrow to help us."

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE EVIDENCES OF CONVERSION.

Sermon Preached in the Calvary Baptist Church, New York last Sunday morning, Sept. 24, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

MANY earnest Christians are often in doubt as to the reality of their conversion. At times they ask with an earnestness bordering on agony, "Have we ever truly experienced the regenerating grace of God?" The language of the hymn formerly often sung, "Am I his or am I not?" has frequently been the question of many a devout, but doubting Christian. It is certainly deeply interesting and equally profitable to be able to give an inspired answer to so important a question; and it is still more interesting to give this answer in the words of so competent a judge as the apostle John. I shall, at this time, confine my replies to the question to the words of the beloved disciple, and I shall arrange his answers in their logical order. He loved to speak of the new birth. This and related forms of expression were familiar phrases on his lips and pen. He learned this language from the lips of the heavenly Teacher; and especially from the definite instructions on this point given him, perhaps by Jesus himself when reporting the nocturnal interview with Nicodemus. We have then for our subject Divine Proofs of Conversion, as given by the beloved disciple. He sets forth most clearly in a series of statements in his first Epistle, the distinguishing characteristics of true believers. He teaches us that in our Lord Jesus Christ—"Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God." (1. John 5 : 1.) We must not suppose that the apostle means to say that mere intellectual assent to the bare proposition that Jesus is the Messiah, the anointed of God, is evidence of regeneration. We suppose that he means to affirm that this truth must be so believed as to produce its legitimate effect on the life. We have no evidence that a man has believed truly in Christ except he live a Christly life. The apostle means to teach that we are to accept Christ as the Messiah of prophecy in the Old Testament and of history in the New Testament.

True faith in Jesus Christ is not merely assent of the head; it includes also the consent of the heart. We know that those who have never been born again may give an intellectual assent to the proposition that Jesus is the Christ. When he was upon the earth many demons believed in him in some sense as their master. Devils are represented in Scripture as doing so now, and as trembling before his power. But true faith implies a consciousness of sin, a deserving of wrath, and a believing wish the heart in Christ as the only Saviour. True faith is a looking to and trusting in the righteousness of Christ for justification, true faith lays hold of his atoning sacrifice for the pardon of sin and for peace with God true faith is the acceptance of Christ as the only hope for salvation for time and for eternity. Such faith works by love; it is not a dead but a living, active, and joyous trust in Jesus. It shows itself in acts of obedience, in a cheerful submission to his ordinances, and in a complete willingness to [illegible] in all things. A dead faith is not faith; an inoperative faith is a contradiction in terms. What is it to be a Christian? To obey Jesus Christ with the whole heart. If you have this spirit of obedience you do not lack true faith; you show that you have been born of God, that you are a partaker of the divine nature, and that you are an heir of everlasting life and glory.

Does Not Live in Sin.

[illegible] "born of God doth not commit sin." 1. John 3: 9. This is a striking passage of Scripture. [illegible] verse and the sixth of this same chapter there have been many differences of opinion; and doubtless such differences of opinion will continue in the future of the church Does this statement teach the doctrine of Christian perfection? Does it affirm that the believer is a man sinless in act and thought? So some excellent Christian men and women have said; but does the apostle so teach? There are insuperable objections to this interpretation of his words. If this passage teaches the doctrine of Christian perfection then it teaches that all Christians are perfect. There is no limitation in this form of statement to one class of Christians rather than another. The word "whosoever" must include all believers of every grade of attainment in the Christian life, and we must affirm of all that they do not and cannot commit sin. But the question arises at once, is this statement true? And the denial must immediately follow the question. No man can affirm that such of faith in God as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were sinless. No man dare say with the Scripture history before him that Moses, Job and Daniel were sinless. No man can truthfully affirm that Peter, John and Paul were absolutely perfect, even when they reached their highest Christian attainment. Nothing is more certain than that they did not themselves so believe; nothing is more certain than that the Work of God does not so affirm regarding these eminent saints. Are we then to suppose that they were not believers? But if all believers are perfect, and these distinguished saints were not perfect then we are driven to the conclusion that they were not believers. This is surely a painful conclusion, but it is one to which we are inevitably driven if we adopt the idea that this Scripture teaches the doctrine of absolute perfection. But I do not believe that this Scripture so teaches. Such an interpretation is not a fair exposition of the passage. The writer uses language which any of us writing in our day might employ, when we simply wish to say of a friend or neighbor, that he does not commit wilful, habitual and conscious sin. This thought finds constant expression in the Bible when its writers wish to set forth the idea that a man is truly serving God, and is determinedly avoiding known sin. The apostle John makes the affirmation very strong, but not stronger than an earnest believer of the doctrine now stated might make it. The passage surely teaches solemn and blessed truths regarding every true believer in Jesus Christ. It certainly sets forth the idea that one who is born of God will not commit habitual sin, against his own soul, his neighbor and his God. The man who intentionally, deliberately and repeatedly so sins declares that he is a child of Satan rather than a son of God. A true believer may indeed momentarily, under the influence of strong passion, provocation or temptation, yield to sin; but such a man cannot continuously commit sin and retain the hope that he is a regenerate soul. The noblest Christians see much corruption in their own hearts, and over it they constantly mourn. They will not indeed sin willingly; they will not sin finally. They are restrained by the grace of God in their hearts, so that they shall not wholly fall, so that they shall not finally perish. A true Christian may wander far, but he certainly will penitently return. He will not make sin his normal condition; he will not walk in it and give himself up to its power; he will not be its slave. Sin may be in him, but he will not long be in it. If you know that you hate sin and desire to master it, that you constantly strive against its presence and power, that you desire to gain the victory over every form of evil, rest assured that you are born from above, and that you are truly a child of God. Evil thoughts may sweep through the soul, but if you do not welcome their approach and cherish their presence you are not their slave. Quaintly has it been said, "I cannot help having the birds fly over my head, but if I have the use of my hands, I can prevent them from making nests in my hair." So if you give evil thoughts no welcome, no quarter, you need not let them rob you of your Christian hope and the joy of divine sonship. But guard, oh, prayerfully guard, your soul in the light of this Scripture against indulging in known sin against God, your Creator and Redeemer.

Will Not Deliberately Sin

A Religious Life.

A true Christian doeth righteousness—"Every one that doeth righteousness is born of him," (1. John 2: 29.) This verse stands in close relations to an interesting train of reasoning. The thought is that all who have a true knowledge of God know that he is righteous; and the apostle means to say that any one who claims to be born of God must be, at least in his purpose and endeavor, righteous also. No man may claim this relationship except he bear this character. It is said that Alexander the Great said to a cowardly soldier, who bore his own name, "you must either change your character or your name." So every man who bears the name of Jesus Christ must possess a Christly character, or he ought immediately to drop the Christly name. This important truth deserves to be constantly emphasized; it is a truth worthy of all acceptation. Christ stands out conspicuously before the church and the world as the righteous One. The man who claims to be born of God must possess the character belonging to the true children of God's family. Righteousness is both imputed and imparted. We have no reason to believe that we have received the forgiving grace of God in our souls except we live the life of God in our relations with men. It is a severe criticism to make of a man, who professes to be a Christian, that he is very pious godward, and very "shaky" manward. The true believer doeth righteousness, not to win the favor of God, not to merit salvation; but, having received salvation as God's free gift, he doeth righteousness from the promptings of love and gratitude. No man can be saved simply by his good works; but no man can be saved without good works. We have no proof of inward life in God except by outward acts of Christian service As a matter of fact, if we are dishonest, unjust, untruthful in our relations with men we have no evidence for ourselves, and can give no evidence to others, that we are the children of God. We may at times be exalted to the third heavens with seraphic visions and ecstatic raptures, but if we be impure in life, untruthful in speech and unholy in act, our raptures and visions are worse than worthless. Our rightness of life will show God's righteousness in us by faith. If, as the fruit of our faith in Christ, we are living rightly toward our neighbors, our families, ourselves and our God we may rest assured that we are born of God.

A Life of Love.

A true Christian will love his brethren—"Every one that loveth is born of God." (1. John 4 : 7.) A glance at the context shows that this verse introduces a new topic of discussion, which continues to the end of the chapter. We all know that the apostle John was the apostle of love, and that this heavenly topic was his chosen theme. All his natural instincts, as well as his special relations to his Lord, peculiarly fitted him for the discussion of this heavenly theme. In the earlier part of this chapter he concluded what he wished to say concerning the trying of spirits, and with this verse he returns to his former exhortation to brotherly love. Men of the world love and seek their own; so Christians should love and seek the things of the new life and love. There is a law of moral gravitation in the Christian life and character, as truly as of physical gravitation in the physical universe. Love is of God. He is its blessed fountain. Christians show that they love him whom they have not seen by loving their brethren whom they see. From the lips of Jesus John learned the truth taught in this verse when Christ said, "A new commandment I give unto you that ye love one another." John never forgot the time when he pillowed his head on the bosom of his divine and loving Lord; and years after he has learned the lesson, when he said, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." A man who is born of God must love those who also have been born of God. Differences in social condition, in intellectual attainments, and in spiritual growth will exist among true Christians; but they will love one another fervently, notwithstanding these differences. They may not love all equally. Christ did not. He loved Peter, James, and John with a special affection; he loved Mary, and Martha, and their brother Lazarus with a peculiar tenderness. We also shall have our preferences, but no true believer can hate his brother. We must of course, understand that the love here spoken of is love toward God and love to men of which God is the author. The term is limited necessarily to the subject under discussion; it cannot mean every kind of love, whatever be its source or object. There may be love to one's wife, children, and friends, whose existence would not prove necessarily that he who cherishes it as a true believer. There may be much benevolence toward the poor and much consideration toward all men on the part of many who are not thereby true believers. The love here spoken of is love to God, love to Jesus Christ, love to the children and cause of God, and not love in a general and promiscuous sense. Do you possess and manifest this heavenly love? Can you say at this moment, in the presence of God, that with all your conscious weakness, and sinfulness, you do earnestly and sincerely love him? Do you know that you love the society and companionship of Christians? Can you affirm that by the tests which you apply to your love for parents, for wife, for children, you love the Lord Jesus Christ? Then know without doubt or fear that you are truly a child of God and a candidate for heaven. If we love God aright there is no other place but heaven to which God could send us. O seek and and possess this heavenly love now, and then rejoice in the assurance which it gives that its possessors are born of God.

He Echoed the Truth

Protected from Assault.

A true Christian keeps himself and Satan touches him not—"He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not." (1. John 5 : 18.) This is a remarkable affirmation. We, of course, understand that no man can keep himself by his own power. If men could so keep themselves there would be no appropriateness in the prayer of Christ, that God should keep them from the evil. God alone is the keeper of his saints; only he whom God keeps is truly kept. We are expressly taught that we are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. If there is a mansion and crown reserved in heaven for us we are preserved for that crown and mansion. A Christian will use all his endeavors to keep himself from sin, and by God's grace he will finally win the victory. It is most inspiring to know that the wicked one toucheth not the true believer. Did not Satan touch Christ? Are we not conscious that he now touches us? The statement means that Christ has so repelled all his assaults that he cannot really harm the weakest of God's true saints; that he cannot wound the believer to the heart; and that he cannot destroy the divine principle of life in the soul. Satan may indeed tempt, sift, buffet and grieve a true Christian, but he cannot finally overcome, or destroy him. Blessed be Christ he overcame sin both for himself and for us! The believer is yet to bruise Satan under his heel. If the old serpent wounded the heel of the promised deliverer, he had to put his head under the deliverer's heel in order to inflict the wound. Satan assumes a terrible risk when he puts his head under the heel of the Lord's Christ. There are some Christians who live constantly on the mountain tops of faith and in the unclouded sunshine of God's presence. Satan cannot disturb their peace, cannot dampen their joy or lessen their comfort. They can turn against him so that he cannot wound them with his darts. They can each say as did Christ, "get thee behind me, Satan." Blessed be the Lord Jesus, who said to his chosen people, "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any . . . pluck them out of my hand." The train of thought here is climacteric. No one is specified. The word man in our common version is added; the original is unspeakably strong. The Lord said, that no one, man, devil, or any creature whatsoever, should be able to pluck his children out of his hand; and in the next verse it is affirmed that no one shall be able to pluck them out of his Father's hand. The idea is that as they lie safely and lovingly in Christ's hand, the Father places his hand over that of Jesus and between the hands of Father and Son believers are absolutely and eternally safe. Here the doctrine of the preservation of the saints is emphatically and sublimely taught. Should a true believer ever perish the declaration of Christ would be falsified and the honor of God imperilled.

The Shield of Faith,

Victor Over the World.

A true Christian gains the victory over the world. "For whosoever is born of God overcometh the world" (1. John 5: 4.) I love the victorious side of the Christian life. Such a passage as this is to me stirring as martial music. This passage is a glorious climax to the progress of our thought in developing the evidences of conversion. If we overcome this world we have also overcome the god of this world. Our course of thought has led up to the crown and the throne. Such exaltation is the Christian's privilege and glory. The world is not a friend of Christ; its precepts and principles, its maxims and morals are often opposed to Jesus Christ. There is a conflict between the Christian and the world; and we are here taught that the true Christian has secured the victory. John repeats for us the words of Jesus, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer I have overcome the world." We may not expect to escape the tribulations, but we may hope to win the victory. The white-robed throng seen in apocalyptic vision by this same John "came out of great tribulation." But they overcame through the blood of the Lamb. Because Christ overcame the world we may also be victorious. We are to regard the world as a vanquished foe, for "greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world." We are to be in the world but not of it. It has been well said that a ship is not in danger because it is in the water; it is in danger only when the water comes freely into it. Our danger is not in our being in the world, but only when the world comes into us. Can we claim in the light of this last test to be Christians? Are we truly overcoming the world? Does it lie vanquished at our feet? If so, our victory is transcendently glorious. Let us then endure as seeing him who is invisible. This sight of the invisible God is a mighty inspiration in the struggle of life. Faith in the invisible enables us to do the impossible. Only such faith can overcome the world. Such faith made Abraham, Moses and Joshua triumphant amid every form of opposition. Such faith gave us the Latimers and Ridleys, the Luthers and Calvins, the Bunyans and Baxters, the Whitefields and Wesleys, and the Judsons and Careys, the Spurgeons and Moodys, and such faith to-day is upholding millions of God's saints who are bearing the burdens and sorrows of life and who amid the shouts of angels and of just men made perfect will receive their reward. O for such faith to-day, faith which overcomes the world, which destroys death, which vanquishes hell, and which utterly defeats Satan; a faith which comes from the home and heart of God, and which leads its possessor up to that home and heart as an eternal dwelling place.

A NOBLE REVENGE.

Demetrius I., who was king of Macedonia after Alexander the Great, was devoted to Greek science, and inspired with an eager ambition to rival the ancient heroes of his race. On one occasion, while he was engaged in war, he left his wife and children to the protection of the Athenians, whom he considered his friends. He lost the battle, and being obliged to flee for his life, felt sure that he could find shelter with his friends at Athens; but they refused him and went so far as to send to him his wife and children, under the pretext that it was probably unsafe for them in that city. This ungrateful conduct pierced the heart of Demetrius, for he loved the people of Athens and had done them great service.

As time passed, he recovered his affairs and came with a large army to besiege Athens. The guilty populace, knowing that they could not expect pardon from him, were determined to die with sword in hand. Their rulers issued a decree to the effect that all those who proposed surrender should be condemned to death. A short time passed, when they found that their food was almost exhausted, and the most reasonable among them said: "It would be better that Demetrius kill us at once, than that we should die a lingering death by famine. Perhaps he will have mercy on our wives and children."

After Demetrius had taken possession, he gave orders that all the married men should assemble in a large open square, and that his soldiers, sword in hand, should surround them. Then there were cries and lamentations heard all over the city; women began embracing their husbands and taking an eternal farewell. Demetrius, who had been observing all that was going on, began to reproach them for their ingratitude to him when he was so much in need of help. He spoke in such a feeling manner that he could not refrain from shedding tears. He then remained silent for some time, and the people were expecting to hear him give orders to his soldiers to massacre them. Demetrius, looking on them with compassion and love, said at last:

"I wish to convince you how ungenerously you have treated me; for it was not to an enemy you have refused assistance, but to one who has loved you, and still loves you, and who wishes to revenge himself only by granting your pardon, and by being still your friend. Return to your homes; while you have been here, my soldiers have been filling your houses with provisions."

THE BLESSED REFUGE

JESUS, my Lord, to thee I come.
To thy blest arms if there is room
For weak ones such as I;
To thy bright robe, O, let me cling
To hide beneath thy sheltering wing,
For safety I would fly

I cast myself beneath thy Cross—
O, cleanse me from all sin and dross
And fill my heart with peace;
O, take me by thy loving hand
And lead me to that blissful land
Where pleasures never cease.

Come, quicken now my power to love,
Bind fast my hopes to joys above
And help me love thee true,
Help me adore thy holy name,
Spread o'er the earth thy matchless fame
And yield thee all thy due

To him who sent thee from on high,
To save the lost, to bleed and die,
Be praise forever given.
May I with all thy ransomed host,
To Father, Son and Holy Ghost,
Join in the acclaim of heaven

THE END OF THE DISPENSATION.

The Events which will Accompany the Closing Scenes of the Christian Dispensation.

BY SIR A. BLACKWOOD.*

AND the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." This is the end of the dispensation. For "in the days of the seventh angel, when he shall begin (or be about) to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared (or announced as good news) to his servants the prophets." It is the winding up of the great drama of the present age. Many notable things will occur then; let us consider a few of them:

1. The omnipotence of our Lord and of his Christ is manifested and exercised, and in the way of execution of judgment. This has occasionally and partially taken place, e. g., in such cases as the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the extermination of the Canaanites, the overthrow of Babylon, of Jerusalem, etc. But these have been exceptions to the general tenor of Divine procedure. God has "kept silence." There has been "the hiding of his power." "Sentence against an evil work has not been executed speedily." He has been slow to anger, long suffering, and men have said, "God hath forgotten; he hideth his face; he will never see it." For six thousand years he has most chiefly declared his Almighty power by showing mercy and pity. When the last trumpet sounds he will exert it in judgment.

2. The Kingdom of Christ is manifestly set up. Now are fulfilled all the prophecies concerning the Kingdom of God. The promise of the Father to the Son, "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession," is realized. The triumphant anticipations of inspired Psalmists come to pass. "The whole earth shall be filled with his glory—and—the prayers of David the son of Jesse (shall be) ended." The visions of Daniel have their accomplishment. The four world empires have come to nought, for the stone cut out of the mountain without hands has broken them in pieces, and filled the whole earth. "The Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and there were given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people and nations and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom shall not be destroyed." "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." He must reign. "King of the Jews," "King of Ages." (Rev. 15: 3, R. V.) "King of kings," "Blessed and only Potentate." He who wore the crown of thorns now comes in glory, and "on his head are many crowns."

3. There are great voices in heaven, and the four-and-twenty elders, representing the Church of God in her completeness, peal forth their jubilant anthems. They rejoice with joy, no longer unspeakable but full of glory. Their beloved Lord and Saviour is glorified; the whole universe trembles with gladness. Sin and pain, and death and crying all come to an end. All things that offend and they that do iniquity are gathered out of his Kingdom. Satan is bound; wrongs are righted; mysteries are cleared up; God's ways are vindicated. It is the time of "the restitution of all things." The Day of the Lord has dawned, Christ reigns in glory.

4. The nations were angry." The long warfare of men against their Creator has culminated in universal rejection of his sway. There is "upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." The nations are angry. Their impotent fury dashes itself in vain against the calm omnipotence of God.

5. "Thy wrath is come." Oh! unspeakably solemn word. It is no longer "the wrath to come." It has come. The wrath of God, like a tornado, sweeps across the scene where long suffering and grace have for millenniums pleaded with men.

6. "And that thou shouldst give reward to thy servants the prophets, to thy saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great." Then will take place that unerring discrimination of the deeds done in the body which will display in all its wonderful perfection the omniscience of the living God. The parables of the talents and of the pounds will have their fulfilment. Oh, how blessed will they be to whom he shall say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

WHAT IS FAITH?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 8. Rom. 3: 22; Eph. 3 17 21.

NO more important question can any man ask, for, by some mysterious principle, faith is made the condition of every blessing. Without faith a man stands among the choicest gifts of God, as destitute as a man without money stands in a market. The disciples, puzzled by their failure to relieve the demoniac, asked in sorrow, "Why could not we cast him out?" and were told that they could have done so, if they possessed more faith. We read too of a district which Christ visited, that received no blessing even from the Master's presence, because he could not do any mighty works where he found no faith. It would seem as if even Christ's power was restricted by unresponsive surroundings. It is only to as many as receive him, or have faith in him, that he gives the power to become the sons of God. Looking closely at these and similar passages, we begin to realize that faith is more than a condition; it is the channel of blessing. Spiritual life comes that way and so do peace, and hope, and love, and power, and all graces. Wherever any one of them is mentioned, we notice that it comes by faith. So there is no question so important as that of "What is faith?"

We have beclouded our minds on the subject by our own refinements. We have represented it as a creed and have found the creed powerless in the life. We have conceived of it as obedience, only to lapse into formalism and bondage; and we have regarded it as love and have become emotional and ecstatic. Yet we find no difficulty about faith in the affairs of life. We know in our social relations what it is to believe in a man and we discover that it is the same kind of faith as we are required to exercise in Christ, however much it may differ in degree. No man can help us if we do not believe in him. Our heart is closed against him unless we can trust him. The most eloquent orator on earth cannot move me if I know him to be ignorant of his subject, or false in his profession. I may admire his eloquence, but if I do not believe in him, he is powerless to help me. We may love a person and yet not believe in him; we may obey an authority and yet not believe in it. It is so in our relations with a business man or with a political or military leader, or in intrusting a case to a physician or a lawyer. When we say, "I believe in such a man," those who hear us expect that in an emergency we shall commit ourselves and our interests to his keeping. It is more than confidence in another's ability; it is faith in his character. If a man in dying is concerned about his orphan children, it is not the mere skilful man that he chooses as the trustee, to whom he commits the care of them. He chooses a tried friend, in whom he believes. All these things we fully realize in our worldly affairs. We find no mystery about faith there. It is the same faith, but greater, that Christ expects. Faith in him is the channel of every blessing. It is the entrance to spiritual life and the support of spiritual life all through. If we can truly say, "I believe in him," all things are possible to him that believeth.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

The Chicago Unions held their quarterly Convention in the Fourth Baptist Church recently. President Chapman and Secretary Wilkins of the B. Y. P. U. A. were present and took part in the proceedings. After the business session at which Raymond K. Maynard of the Oak Park Church was elected Vice-President of the Union, Miss Dora Daver of Wheaton read a paper on "Advancements in the Local Society." Another paper was read by Miss Ida B. Steere of Aurora, on the subject of "The Conquest Meeting." Dr. Wilkins then made an address on "The Three C's." Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman gave a stirring greeting to the Unions and urged them to continue their good work. He belonged to another communion but knew so well the value of Christian Endeavor that he could join with the members of the kindred society in celebrating its success.——The annual Convention of the Illinois Unions will be held at Jerseyville on Oct. 16.——A vigorous Union exists in connection with the Yates Association which held its first Convention at Milo, N. Y., a few days ago. Among the speakers were G. A. Beers of South Pultenay; Rev. A. J. Wabrath of Penn Yan; Henry C. Vedder of New York; Rev. E. E Chivers of Buffalo; Mr. E. C. Gillett of Penn Yan and Mr. D. E. Sprague of Milo. The President of the Union is Rev. J. N. Lattimer of Milo.——The first Colored State Union is that organized recently for Florida. The Convention which organized it was held at Gainesville. The President is J. H. Brown of Tampa.——The Union of the Maritime Provinces held its annual Convention at St. Martin's, N. B. The International banner which was won by the Union at Indianapolis was placed in the custody of Amherst, which had the best record for study. ——Reports from Kansas indicate progress in the Young People's movement there of a phenomenal order. It is spreading throughout the State and finding friends everywhere.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

It is estimated that fully seven thousand Epworth Leaguers attended the annual Convention at Burlington Junction, Mo.—The St. Louis Christian Advocate urges that at every Conference an afternoon or evening be given to an Epworth League Mass-meeting; and adds, "There is no more important interest of our church, and ministers as well as laymen need to be informed regarding it. It is young and brave, with its hands full of promise and its head crowned with the laurels of victory. As a church we have hardly yet begun to appreciate the vast possibilities of the League or what it means to our young people. Let us have enthusiastic meetings at all our Conferences, where the work of the League can be brought before the church."—A great Convention was that held at Russell, Kans., recently by the Ellsworth District League. The sessions occupied four days beginning with sunrise praise services followed by morning meetings for literary work and the Question drawer, closing in the evenings with preaching and evangelistic addresses. Mr. E. W. Voorhis, was elected President for the ensuing year; Mr. F. C. Griffiths, of Kanopolis, Secretary, and Mr. John Machin, Treasurer.—A day was appropriated to the League at the great camp-meeting at Watseka, Ill. The exercises began at 8:30 A. M., and continued with short intervals until ten ot night. Among the speakers were Rev. W. J. Minnim, Drs. Williamson and Cummings, Rev. J. H. Scott, and Rev. John Small. The officers for the ensuing year are W. G. Landes, President; Minnie McGill, and Lelia DeHart; Secretaries, and Mrs. Flora Calkins, Treasurer.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF WATERBURY, CONN.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Waterbury, Conn., is about to celebrate its tenth anniversary by taking possession of its new building, a picture of which appears on this page. It is located in the best part of the city, facing the public park and in the neighborhood of the principal churches. The building and site cost $75,000. It has a well-furnished reading-room, a parlor, gymnasium, swimming baths, a dark room for the use of amateur photographers, a large, tastfeully decorated auditorium capable of accommodating an audience of several hundred persons, besides convenient rooms for the use of officers. The upper floor is divided up into dormitories which furnish comfortable accommodation for twenty-four young men. The Association has a thriving boys' auxiliary and has set apart two large rooms for its use. The total number of members in the Association proper is 387, but as a large number of these are on the active list the roll will probably largely increase when the Association occupies its new building and makes use of the faculties it affords.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF CAIRO, EGYPT.

In Cairo, the Egyptian capital, there is a Young Men's Christian Association which has increased in numbers so much as to need larger rooms. These were formally opened on Sept. 3. They are situated at 3 Sharia-el-Manakh. In declaring the rooms open Rev. W. Harvey, D.D., gave a brief history of the work done by the Association since its inauguration in 1892 as the result of the efforts of Mr. George Holmes, one of the foreign agents of the English National Council. The Cairo Association supplies in addition to its religious meetings, a well furnished reading-room (which is open every evening), a good circulating and reference library, a literary and debating society and various other advantages.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

"Bitolcko-to Muzhsko Druzhectoo na Christianski Trood" is the name of the Christian Endeavor Society in Bulgaria.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of Binghampton, N. Y., are taking an active part in the preparations for the approaching visit of Rev. B. Fay Mills.

A Congregational Church at Ashton-under-Lyne, England, has issued a card to its members in the Acrostic style, thus:

You are wanted at every Meeting.
Persuade a friend to come with you.
Strive to be punctual.
Come in a prayerful spirit.
Expect a blessing.

A summer school for Young Women's Christian Association workers has been held at Eastnor Castle, England, Lady Henry Somerset's residence. The object was to train secretaries and other workers in Bible teaching and Y. W. C. A. methods, among other classes being one conducted by Dr. Flavell Cook on "The Evidences of Religion." Classes were often held in the open air under a cedar-tree. The afternoon was given up to tennis and other forms of recreation. In the evening conferences were held on subjects affecting the intellectual and devotional life of the workers themselves.

Weekly evangelistic services are to be held at the Brooklyn Navy Yard during the Fall by the Hanson Place Baptist Young People's Union. "We hope," says one of the members, "by attractive singing, spiritual testimonies, and the presence of God's Spirit, to start some of these brave men of the sea on a voyage to heaven

An illustration of the union of the denominations, which the Christian Endeavor Society aims to extend, is furnished by the report of a visitor at a prayer-meeting at Poona, India. He says that the meeting was conducted by a minister of the American M. E. Church and there were seventy persons present. The following analysis will show the thoroughly representative character of the gathering: there were missionaries from the Church of England Society; Wesleyan, Methodist Episcopal, Free Church of Scotland, Established Church of Scotland, Irish Presbyterian, Canadian Presbyterian, Congregational, Brethren Churches also Young Men's Christian, Zenana and Medical Missionaries.

Christian Endeavor is gaining ground in New Zealand, where there are forty societies with 1,000 members. The Auckland Union, containing fourteen societies and 580 members, has recently held a united Convention in the Tabernacle. In Wellington there are only four societies. After much prayer a union was formed, and at the first annual consecration meeting an abundant answer to prayers was realized. There was not sufficient time for all who desired to give their testimonies.

During the summer the social meetings of the Associations have chiefly been occupied with the lighter order of Topics. At the Harlem branch of the Young Women's Christian Association of New York, one evening lately the subject for discussion was "the kind of young man it is undesirable to marry." There were about a hundred young women present. They concluded that the character of a man who would be a desirable husband must possess the following requirements: The man must be temperate, have a good disposition, be unselfish, able and willing to support the family, must keep good hours and company. He must be a Christian man. It was considered unnecessary for him to be handsome.

The Family and Home Circle

Arctic Visitors at the Fair.

The Eskimos Quite at Home Amid their Reindeer, Kayaks, Igloos and Dog Sledges —A Strange Contrast of Races.

BEAUTIFUL architecture, sculpture and painting, wonders in mechanics and amazing variety in industrial products of every kind, crowd the mind of the visitor to the World's Fair so much that he feels he cannot remember more than a mere fraction of what he has seen. But there are sights at this grandest of all Expositions which are so unique and so individualized that they will hardly ever be forgotten. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S artist, with skillful brush, has pictured to our readers the quaint scenes in the Cairo street, the German Village and the Dahomean encampment, to-day we give on this page his pictorial view of a visit to the Eskimo village—another delightful little study of good-natured dwellers of the Far Arctic zone, by the singular ordering of events, have been made almost next door neighbors to their antipodean friends, the South Sea Islanders, the Arabs, and the merry, jovial, singing and dancing Japanese.

The Eskimos, as a whole, are fairly civilized, those who live in East and West Greenland probably being the most advanced in this respect. The North Greenlanders—the "Arctic highlanders," as they have been called, are still semi-savage, while the Asiatic Eskimos or Tuski, are in pretty much the same benighted condition. Their style of dress gives them a squat, dwarfish appearance, but they are nearly all athletic and exceedingly muscular, with pleasing, brown, frank features that are liable at any moment to break into a grin or relax into a hearty laugh. Despite the hardships and disadvantages of their peculiar climate, they find that life contains much to be thankful for, and in this respect furnish an excellent example to many who are more favored, yet less contented.

Equally at home on land or water, the Eskimo may be said to live in a "kayak" or skin-covered canoe during a great portion of the year. A skilful "kayaker" can capsize his canoe, turn a somersault in the water and come up smiling and dry on the other side, not a drop having penetrated beneath his water-tight garment. Some of these canoes called "boidars," are double-manned and can hold two or more fishermen or hunters. Still another form of boat is called a "umiak." The men are experts with bow-and-arrow, spear, and harpoon. The native huts, except in some of the larger and more civilized villages, are known as "igloos," and are built of stone, turf, earth and bones, and entered by a low, tunnel-like passage, to pass through which one must get down on all-fours. Our artist has shown one of those rude dwellings, which a native is entering. Men and women dress almost alike, in skins of the seal, reindeer, bear, dog and fox. They wear jackets which have hoods to protect the head in cold or rough weather, and both sexes wear trousers which are loosely tucked into seal-skin boots. The only distinctive point in the dress of the women is the ornamentation of the garments with down from the eider-duck or possibly white leather, or leather of various colors, on the long leggings. It is quite usual, in winter, to wear two such suits of cloaks, and the result, as may be imagined, is to make the figure bulky and ungraceful; but these are secondary considerations at a season when warmth is the principal object in life. The clothing is remarkably well made, and, being sewed with "sinew-thread" and bone needles, is not liable to come apart, like the garments of European and American civilization. Eskimo housewives are their own seamstresses, and their work is designed to last until the garment is worn out. Clothing worn under the seal coat or jacket is frequently made of birdskins, or of delicately prepared skins of the dog or reindeer.

Pomuk, chief of the Kikkertaksoaks, a prince in his own country in Labrador, West Greenland, is the head of the little colony of Eskimos at Jackson Park. He is only sixteen years old and less than forty inches tall. He is accompanied by his sister, Kamialini, an uncle and a stepmother. The whole colony numbers less than sixty persons. They are located on a park of three acres near the Nebraska and North Dakota buildings. About a dozen queer-shaped dwellings, of as many different styles of architecture, constitute the village, and besides these there are skin tents and huts of logs, sod and moss, built like their own native igloos. Much of the time during the summer has been spent by the men in ivory carving, and by the women in grass-knitting and plaiting and making dolls. Ethnologists say the language spoken by these simple people from the frozen North as well as their dress and many of their customs have undergone no material change either in the way of improvement or deterioration in the last thousand years.

A Lesson from Childish Generosity.

In one of his writings, Bonar has this beautiful passage: "Like the child with the stalk of grapes, who picked one grape after another from the cluster, and held it out to the father, till, as affection waxed warm, and self faded, she gayly flung the whole into her father's bosom, and smiled in his face with triumphant delight, so let us do, until, loosening from every comfort, and independent of the hel; of broken cisterns, we can say, 'I am not my own.' Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee."

Surely, here is a lesson worth heeding, to those who cling too closely to the world and its riches. What, after all, is the wealth of earth, compared to the "unsearchable riches?"

MOTHER'S HYMNS.

HUSHED are those lips, their earthly song is ended:
The singer sleeps at last.
While I sit gazing at her arm chair vacant.
And think of days long past.

The room still echoes with the old-time music
As, singing soft and low
Those grand, sweet hymns, the Christian's consolation,
She rocks her to and fro.

Some that can stir the heart like shouts of triumph
Of loud-toned trumpet's call,
Bidding the people fall prostrate before him,
"And crown him—Lord of All."

Safe hidden in the wondrous "Rock of Ages,"
She bade farewell to fear;
Sure that her Lord would always gently lead
She "Read her title clear."

Dear saint! in heavenly mansions long since folded.
Safe in God's fostering love,
She joins with rapture in the blissful chorus
Of those bright choirs above,

There, where no tears are known, no pain nor sorrow,
Safe beyond Jordan's roll,
She lives forever with her blessed Jesus,
The "Lover of her soul."

THE QUEEN AND HER DOLLS.

VICTORIA was very much devoted to dolls and indeed played with them till she was nearly fourteen years old. Her favorites were small wooden dolls, which she could occupy herself with dressing, and she had a house in which they could be placed, says The Strand Magazine. Of the 132 dolls preserved, the queen herself dressed no fewer than thirty-two, in a few of which she was helped by Baroness Lehzen; and they deserve to be handed down to posterity as an example of the patience and ingenuity and exquisite handiwork of a twelve-year-old princess.

The dolls dressed by her majesty are for the most part theatrical personages and court ladies, and a few little babies—tiny creatures made of rag, with painted muslin faces. The workmanship in the frocks is simply exquisite; tiny ruffles are sown with fairy stitches, wee pockets on aprons (it must be borne in mind for dolls of five or six inches), are delicately finished off with minute bows; little handkerchiefs, not more than half an inch square, are embroidered with red silk initials, and have drawn borders; and there are chatelaines of white and gold beads so small that they almost slip out of one's fingers; and one is struck afresh by the deftness of finger and the unwearied patience that made them.

CHAPTER IX.

A CHRISTMAS GATHERING.

THE approach of Christmas brought news from Oxford. Monk had passed his examination with ease, and Guy had come off with flying colors in the honor schools of the University having taken a first in classics, and a second in mathematics.

"He would have got a double first," wrote Monk, "if he hadn't been seedy. He's been grinding too hard, and has had a horrid cold and cough upon him, which he can't get rid of, and which has pulled him down a good bit. It was a horrid sell he was so handicapped just at this time of all others. He ought to have been in his bed instead of in the Schools. However, it's all over now, and he can get nursed up at home. He laughs at me when I talk of nursing, but the doctor told me he wanted a good deal of care for a bit. He asked if there was any tendency to pulmonary disease in the family, and I said I had never heard of it. He thinks there is something rather shaky about Guy's lungs, I can see. I thought I'd better just name it to you before getting home, to show you that he will have to be careful."

Mrs. Dangerfield was reading this letter aloud to Yolante. It had come by the afternoon's mail, and Monk's letters were always common property between mother and daughter.

Yolante looked up quickly.

"Did not Aunt Helen die of consumption?" asked the girl.

"Yes, and she told me that many of her family had gone in the same way. I used to fear that we should detect symptoms of the disease in Guy: but so far he has always appeared remarkably strong and healthy. This is the very first intimation I have ever had that there was anything amiss—and perhaps it hardly amounts to that yet."

Yolante sat silent. She was half afraid of the thought that had come into her mind, which was no other thought than this "I don't wish any harm to him: but if he were to die, how much more comfortable I should feel."

But she would have been much more surprised, and not a little startled could she have seen that exactly the same idea had presented itself, all unacknowledged to the mind of her mother.

"We must let Geoffrey see him," said Mrs. Dangerfield in so quiet a tone that no one would guess the tumult of thought rising within her. "If there is the least danger of his following his mother's family, it may be advisable for him to winter abroad. Certainly we must think what can be done to check the tendency at its outset."

Yolante drew a long breath. "I think I should be rather glad for Guy to go away. I do not care for him so very much, and he does so engross Monk, I can never get a bit of his company when Guy is there. It seems rather silly for men to be so fond of one another, I think. If Guy went abroad we should have much more good of Monk."

"Yes, I have thought myself sometimes that it is really time they learnt to do without one another—or rather that Monk learnt to do without Guy—for it is he who is the more dependent of the two."

"Only if Guy goes away, Monk will be certain to wish to go with him. He will be seized with a longing to see the world—though so far he has always voted traveling a bore."

"Monk's place is here—I shall point that out to him very clearly. It is patent to me that the property wants the master's eye over it. I think I can prevent Monk following Guy now. He must see that the time has come when they can no longer be inseparables—and Guy who has plenty of sense will see it too. Luckily, too, there is another attraction here. If Lant had not very much [illegible] Monk would think twice about leaving the neighborhood that holds Joyce Conway."

"O—do you think he cares for her?" Yolante asked. "Well, that is better than his infatuation for Guy. We shall see: but I think I should not be sorry for Guy to learn that this house is not his home as it is ours. He is not really one of ourselves—and—and—"

Yolante hardly knew how to finish, and a hot wave of color flooded her face. Dangerfield Park not Guy's home! The thought of what she knew on that subject, and of what her mother knew, checked her words, and covered her with confusion: but she had sufficient self-control to keep her emotion to herself, and Mrs. Dangerfield, who had her own countenance to command, did not heed her daughter's sudden pause."

"Exactly, it is time Guy learned self-dependence, and began to think seriously of his career in life. As long as this house is Monk's, it is probable he will always be welcome to call it home: but at least he cannot live here as though he were an actual brother. I think a winter abroad might be as a good a break as anything else."

It was some time after dark on a cold frosty evening that the travelers arrived, and all the household flocked out into the hall to meet and greet them. Monk looked just as of old, stalwart, beaming, all aglow with satisfaction at seeing the familiar faces once again But there was something very fragile in Guy's appearance, and though his color was bright, his eyes aglow, and his smile as frequent and as sunny as ever, one glance at his face brought back to Mrs. Dangerfield's mind the remembrance of his mother, as she had so often looked during those weeks when she had seemed to be gaining strength although she and others knew but too well that the improvement was but one of the insidious lulls so characteristic of the fatal malady. But Guy was even more affectionate and gentle than of old. He seemed to value his place as brother and son of the house almost more than ever, and towards his aunt he was more loving and attentive than even in the old days, when he had been famed for the filial reverence he always paid to her.

As a matter of fact Guy was feeling the inevitable influx of love and tenderness which cannot but follow upon a generous sacrifice. He was giving up for these relatives of his the birthright which he now knew to be his, and contenting himself with the lower place which by right should be Monk's. And in doing this out of love for those who shared his name, and out of gratitude for all they had done to him, he could not but love them all the more, and although he was not demonstrative in his affection, it was too real and too spontaneous not to betray itself in a hundred little unconscious ways.

As for the bond which existed between him and Monk, it seemed to be closer than ever. And those who had wronged Guy, and who knew that they had done so, and were suffering from that inevitable shrinking from and dislike for the object so wronged, could not look calmly on this new state of things, but suffered considerable irritation at an affection which could only cause them self-reproach and discomfort.

But nevertheless there was no open manifestation of these feelings and the first evening passed off very pleasantly. The two young men were in the centre of the group about the fire, and told stories one against the other till bed-time, and then could hardly be persuaded to move—"It was so good to be at home again," they said. And when they got upstairs, they sat over Monk's fire till midnight, and wondered if the ice would bear tomorrow, as Yolante had prophesied it would.

When the morrow came, however, and the frost had only increased in intensity, and the ice was pronounced to be in prime condition, it was only Monk and Fulk who went down with the girls to the water, for Guy was fit for nothing but to lie on the sofa in Humphrey's room, and try to make up for the sleepless night he had passed.

He had not seemed at all ill overnight, and had hardly coughed once but he made up for it now, by doing little else, and looked wan and weary, though quite ready to laugh and joke when able to talk, and did not even regret the skating, of which generally he had been so fond.

"Horrid cold work," he muttered shivering, when Monk came in at lunch time to pity him for having been kept away. "We're much better off here, aren't we, Humphrey. I say, have you seen Humphrey's new accomplishments? He can do ever so many things he used never to attempt. It seems that Geoffrey is going to make a man of him one of these days."

"Well I wish he'd take you in hand too—I hate to see you look like that—let alone missing all the fun. There are such a lot of jolly people on the ice—Joyce of course, and she asked after you, and was awfully sorry you were so seedy. She'll come and see you one of these days. I told her I was sure you'd like it. Norman is there, too—he skates awfully well. Yolante is making all the running with him. I wish you could see her ladyship. She is going the pace in great style. I do think she gets handsomer every month. But she is changed since we were here last. Have you noticed anything? You generally have sharper eyes than mine."

"I think I know what you mean—but I call her very fascinating. I can't help watching her whenever she is in the room. She moves so gracefully, and there is such a look about her—I can't describe it. Humphrey, you look as if you did not appreciate your sister properly, young man."

"Don't I? O, I assure you I mean no harm, only Yolante has been very odd and capricious of late. There is no pleasing her anyhow, and she snubs Cissy unmercifully, so naturally I get rather wild. But I know she's handsome enough for two. O here is Geoffrey. I wonder if he has come to see Guy."

No, Geoffrey had come to see Humphrey, as he did generally once or twice in a week; but he looked at Guy from time to time, and in the end turned to him and asked what was the matter.

"Only a cold—you know Oxford is a horribly cold place in the winter, and going in and out of lecture gives one no chance of throwing a cold off. I shall be as right as a trivet in a few days now that I am at home again. How is your sister? And how are you getting along at Fordingham? I want to come over and see you some day soon."

"Well, mind and get rid of that cough before you attempt to go out in this cold. It's the kind of cough that won't bear trifling with. You must look after that fellow, Monk, and keep him indoors tight for some days to come yet. He ought to have come home before to be nursed, but I suppose it was practically impossible."

Geoffrey did not often allow himself the relaxation of an afternoon's skating, but the temptation to-day overcame his self-denial, and he was not too busy that day to spare himself a couple of hours. So with a pair of skates of Monk's slung over his shoulder, he tramped down to the ice with his companion, to see when he got there the conspicuous figure of Yolante, in her crimson cloth and silver fur, gliding about hither and thither in the throng, hand in hand with Norman Conway, who was also conspicuous in his way by his very excellent and finished skating.

Geoffrey was not expected on the ice, and Yolante did not see him. It was a misty afternoon, such as often follows a bright sunny morning, and there were so many persons on the ice, that the dark figures of the men were not easily distinguished one from another. Geoffrey glided in and out of the shifting throng, keeping his eyes about him, and generally following in the wake of Yolante, interested in watching her as he always had been, and seeing something new in her to-day, which was something of a revelation to him.

Often as he had seen Yolante in society, he had never chanced to see her when she was not aware of his proximity, and the girl when under the influence of his eye, comported herself somewhat differently than she did at other times. The sort of magnetic attraction which Geoffrey possessed for her has been noted before. When he was in the company, Yolante restrained her natural inclination for flirtation, and reserved for him and him alone those wonderfully soft glances, which were so telling, and which seemed to reveal the very depth of her heart. She gave to him the impression (not altogether false) that she thought more of his opinion than of all the world beside, and he did not know that in his absence, she impressed upon certain others just the same feeling and just the same sense of fascination.

And to-day she was a little more in earnest than usual: for Norman Conway was there, and Yolante always liked him next best to Geoffrey and, moreover, she was rapidly reaching the conclusion that it would be a very desirable thing to secure her own future before any possible blow had fallen. She had a much better chance of making a brilliant wedding now, than she would have if any turn of fortune's wheel brought Guy to his own, and turned them adrift to seek their home elsewhere. Yolante would have liked to keep her liberty longer, to have waited to see if a London season did not bring even more eligible suitors to her feet: but she knew the value of the bird in the hand, and resolved that if Norman did speak she would not repulse him.

So Geoffrey saw bestowed upon the young baronet the glances he had believed were reserved for himself. He saw Norman and others treated to the blandishments and witcheries which he had once thought were brought out by his efforts alone. He smiled to himself as he watched, and mused and wondered at his own blindness, and then he found out little shy Cissy, diligently practising figures with Fulk in a secluded corner, and he carried her off a glad and willing companion, to be piloted rapidly up and down the shining sheet of ice in that breathless rapid way which is the delight of the skater, but which Cissy would not have ventured upon without the support of Geoffrey's strong hand.

And he did not let her go again all the while she stayed on the ice. Cissy's company had a charm for him as different from that of Yolante as sunlight is from moonlight. They had many things to talk of now—many objects of mutual interest, for Geoffrey was like an old friend, and Cissy's whole gratitude had gone out to him for all he was doing for Humphrey. It was Cissy who was his coadjutor in all things where her brother was concerned, and now he gave Guy in part to her keeping.

"For he really ought to be careful of himself for a time," he explained. "I do not quite like his looks."

"I think I could manage Guy if you tell me what he may not do. He is always so gentle and considerate. I'm sure he would not do anything to make people uneasy if he knew he ought not. I suppose he must stay indoors at night, and in very cold weather?"

"Yes, he ought not to be out after dusk all the winter, and for some days he had better keep to the house altogether, and then only go out in the middle of the day. He is in the humor to rest now, but that will not last very long, and then you will have to watch him. Of course he has a fire in his room? He ought not to breathe very cold air for any length of time together."

When Cissy went home she reported all this to her mother, who said it should be attended to. Guy laughed at her little sisterly attempts to coddle him up, but he enjoyed them all the same, and was very well content to spend his days with Humphrey, and let Cissy tyrannize over him in her gentle fashion.

Joyce would often drop in to see him, and he tried to meet her bright smile without shrinking, and to check the feeling that her voice was the sweetest music in the world for him. She was very much disposed to make him a hero, both on account of his academic laurels, and his fragile looks, which gave him a resemblance in her mind to one of her favorite knights: but Monk was delighted to see her make much of Guy, and no thought of jealousy ever seemed to enter his honest heart. He thought that it was natural that Guy should be admired, and never could be brought to see in him a possible rival. If Guy had cared for Joyce he would have told him so—so argued simple-minded Monk—and then he would have retired to leave him a fair field, for of course he should have no chance against the superior fascinations of Guy. But Monk went on his way in placid content, and Guy saw his happiness and good faith, and would have sooner cut off his right hand than do anything to thwart or supplant him.

So Christmas came and went. Guy found it as good to hear Monk and Yolante describe the festivities as to be there himself, and his companionship of Humphrey released Cissy from some of her attendance, and she was made to take part in the gaieties from which hitherto she had shrunk. Humphrey and Guy delighted in hearing of the successes she was making, and would on no account let her stay at home with them, when some festivity was on foot elsewhere. They had never taken that pleasure in Yolante's more brilliant career, perhaps for the reason that she thought so much of it herself, but of Cissy they were genuinely proud, and the Christmas was all the more happy and gay, because she was first "appreciated" by the outside world, as Humphrey said.

And if Yolante was sometimes jealous, at least she never betrayed herself, yet there were moments when a rather dark look would cross her handsome face, as her eye rested upon her younger sister, and these moments generally were when Geoffrey Northesk was singling out Cissy for special attention, as was not unfrequently the case.

THE BOOK SHELF

THE PROGRESSIVE REVELATION.*

FROM the first the Gospel was realized in the way of life. Little by little, the revelation of Christ's nature was made through the events of his intercourse with men. The facts were open before the world: it was for those to whom they were made known to read their lessons. These were seen and they were allowed to work. In this respect the answer which our Lord gave to the disciples of the Baptist (Matt. 11 : 2–6), shows the manner of revelation for all time. He sent no direct reply to his herald, but he stated plainly, and in a significant order, the signs from which a reply could certainly be deduced.

This characteristic of the method of revelation is signally illustrated by the records of the resurrection of Jesus. The incidents preserved by the Evangelists present two distinct and complementary views of the event. In one group we have the assurance that the risen Lord was indeed the same Lord as the disciples had known in his earthly life: in the other group we see that he was raised above the conditions of earthly existence. Either group would by itself be wholly inadequate to convey the truth which was to be made known. The first group alone, could establish only a rising again such as that of Lazarus to a life subject as before to death. The second group alone would leave us in the presence of shadowy phantom-like appearances, and offer no real connection between the two worlds. But the Evangelists give both groups without any consciousness of an opposition and without any direct interpretation. They present Christ as wholly the same after his resurrection, and yet wholly changed. The significance of the two series of manifestations in combination becomes apparent upon reflection; and faith by a spiritual synthesis, apprehends the fact of a continuity of human life under new conditions, of the transfiguration of all that belongs to the fulness of humanity. By the resurrection of Christ, thus realized, the two worlds—the seen and the unseen—are brought into a union of life, and we perceive that the fact is a revelation.

The revelation was thus made through a succession of facts, and the import of the facts was historically apprehended by progressive thought. This is true in different ways, both of the Apostles and of later Christian teachers; and the recognition of the truth is important for ourselves. For example, we commonly lose much for failing to notice how the divine nature of Christ was slowly discerned under the action of (what we call) natural historical circumstances. It is assumed that all was clear from the first; and that the Apostles were enabled at once and finally to grasp the fulness of the revelation, and to regard him, with whom they had gone in and out, as being what John in the end was enabled to declare him to be, "the Word become flesh." Such a view was equally at variance with Divine Providence, as made known to us in Scripture, and with the laws of the human mind. There is an order and growth in the teaching of God. This we know through our own experience. All indeed lies enfolded in the earliest seed, but the actual development is, to our observation, slow and continuous and in successive phases . . . Under this aspect the history of the Christian Church is the history of the victories of the risen Christ gained through the Spirit sent in his name. (John 14: 26.)

JESUS' LIMITATIONS.†

The limitations of Jesus are his glory; the fact that he does not claim any of these ideals of earthly greatness is because he sets up a greater ideal, to which they all belong. We can find an illustration in our human life. A king steps down among his people; he mingles with them, and sees them at their work. And there is not one of those workmen that cannot do something better than he can. If they should bring their difficulties of work to him, he could not answer one of them; he fulfils the ideal of no one of their positions. And yet all those interests are his, and are strong and healthy through his power and character. His kingly character remains untouched by the superiority of any one of those who are eminent in their departments, and the carelessness or scorn of some man who thinks a man no king who does not know his secrets, never moves his mien of royal dignity. The lifting-up of every one of those subjects to the higher conception of the nation over which he rules, is a work truly his, as no mechanical knowledge or minute practice can ever be. Such was Christ's position as King; and so he stands far above, though never apart from, every standard of human attainment. He helps every one of them, as he brings them all into connection with the very centre of life. He sets forth forever the truth that the life of the lower is to be found in the higher.

That was what the world needed, and what no other one could teach. Many a man is nobler and better and fairer in his business for the influence of the wife who never enters his place of business, and knows none of its secrets. True influence knows none of our limits, because it is dependent on something infinitely greater, and that Christ revealed. Our deepest knowledge of the Jewish priesthood to-day, our attention to all that ritual, is on account of him who never could minister at its altars. What achievement of self-sacrifice or of warlike valor has not gained inspiration from him whose whole life told of the power of standing up for principle against all enemies, the exalting inward conviction against outward forces? And to-day knowledge is strong and pure for his holy influence who made men respect the world in which they lived, and taught the duty of honest inquiry and manly thought; business feels the impulse of the honesty and prudence and strength of his teaching, who revealed the true relation between man and man, which controls all our intercourse; and whatever virtue dignifies the statesman, and whatever grace clothes the man or woman of society, finds its truest inspiration and illustration in him.

"BUDDIE" THE WAIF.*

It was several days before Madge was allowed to see Buddie, and then she scarcely recognized him. In a small white bed lay the little fellow, his face clean and very pale, his hair brushed smoothly off his forehead.

"Hey! Madge," he said, smiling faintly and holding out his hand. "How've yer bin? Thought as how yer'd forgot me."

"Forgot yer, Buddie!" cried Madge, great tears welling up into her eyes. "'Taint likely, I can tell yer. Every night the last thing I thinks of is yer. I dreams of yer, and the fust thing in the mornin' I thinks of yer again. I'se cried for yer every night, Buddie, an' I would o' come to see yer before ef they'd a let me.'

"Guess I'se been purty sick," said Buddie, with a kind of pride in the statement. "I don't 'member 'bout much; been kinder wild, yer know. How d'ye get along, Madge? Where yer been eatin' an' sleepin?"

"Oh! nowhar in partickiler," replied Madge, carelessly waiving the question. "I don't take no pleasure in nothin' sense yer been sick, Buddie. I'se so lonely; I misses yer, I do. An' I've bringed yer somethin' I thought yer might like."

Carefully undoing several dingy-looking pieces of paper, she produced with great pride a small red orange, and laid it on the bed

"My!" cried Buddie, who fully appreciated the delicate attention. "Ain't it a nice one? Why, Madge, yer's very kind to spend yer money on me. Say, yer'll have a piece, won't yer?"

"No, thank yer," said Madge, firmly, her tone belying the wistful look in her eyes. "I don't want none an' I ain't agoing to take it. I'se bought it for yer, an' I wants yer to eat it all. Lors! a orange like that ain't nothin' to me. Go on an' eat it yerself."

* From Little Saint Hilary, by Barbara Yechton, cloth covers, illustrated, price 60 c. Thomas Whittaker, New York, Publisher.

Not a word about the empty stomach that was craving to be filled, or the strong self-denial that had been required to get even that small orange, but I think Buddie guessed it all for he repeated softly, "Yer's very kind, Madge," and began to tear away the skin.

"Is it good?" asked Madge, bending forward eagerly.

"Good!" cried Buddie, smacking his lips. "Good ain't the name for it. It's about the bestest orange I ever eat."

"The man said as how it wor good," said Madge, with an air of satisfaction; "but oranges are very deceivin' sometimes." . . .

One day when Madge came they were all about his bed, the nurse and the doctor, and the lady who read to him was kneeling by him. He was very pale and was breathing slowly and with great effort, but there was no trembling, no shrinking; calmly, even cheerfully, Buddie met the great Destroyer.

"Oh! Madge," he said, with a faint smile: "I'se orful glad to see yer. I was 'fraid yer wouldn't get here in time."

"For what?" asked Madge, the old terror stealing over her.

"I'se a-going—fast, don't yer see it?" said Buddie, calmly.

"A-dyin'!" cried Madge shrilly. "Oh! yer's a-foolin'. Ain't he a-foolin'?" addressing the lady. Then throwing out her arms across him, "Oh! Buddie, I don't want yer to go, I ain't got nobody but yer."

"That's one thing wot worrits me," said the boy, slowly. "Ef I could take yer with me I'd like it fust rate. Yer know, Madge, I thinks a lot of yer; you an' I has allus hung together and it do go agen me to leave yer behind, but wot kin I do? The dear Lord, he says fur me to come alone, an' I has to go. An' I ain't onwillin' to go, for tho' I ain't spoke much 'bout it, I'se been orful tired sometimes—an' I've asked him to look arter you, Madge, pertickeler."

"You're not afraid to die, Buddie?" asked the lady.

"No!" said Buddie, simply, "'Cause the Lord's a-waitin' fur me on the other side. He promised he would, yer know, an' I ain't 'fraid he'll go back on his word—Madge, will yer meet me by'mby? I'll be a-watchin' fur yer. Say, will yer come?"

"I'll try," cried poor Madge, with a violent burst of tears. "But I don't expect to get ther; yer knows, Buddie, I'se allus been wicked."

Buddie's eyes were closing. "Sing 'I was weary, too,'" he whispered. So the lady sang slowly and softly:

Well I know thy trouble,
Oh, my servant true;
Thou art very weary,
I was weary, too.

When she finished the last line little Buddie was no longer weary.

IONE, THE MARTYR.†

THE weary hours of day and night had passed
Alike to them; the only light they had Glared from the lions' eyes behind the bars;
Instead of heaven's sweet winds upon the brow,
The breathing of their nostrils; and they heard
In all the pauses of the sacred song
Deep growls of hunger, grasping each other's hands
They trembled,—but a consciousness of power
Beyond their own upheld them.

Meanwhile, games
Were going on above; the wrestlers strove
And writhed for mastery, and athletes ran,
As if by Hermes sandalled, for the crown;
The pugilists, with heads and necks like bulls,
Rained desperate blows upon each other; then
Strong gladiators struggled for their lives,
With swords and nets and tridents. And their strife
Stirred up the people as wild beasts are stirred
To savagery by the taste of blood,
And all along the benches ran the words,—
A murmur, rising to an awful cry,
Hoarse and persistent, crueler than death,—
"Bring out the Christians!" . . .

The Asiarch, wondering at her face,
Thrice questioned ere she heard him; then she said,
"Yea, I am ready!" So they led her out,—
The rude, imbruted Ethiopian slaves
Awe-struck and trembling at her confidence,—
And from the arena's sands of bloody death,
She, with a score of others, entered Life.

. . . . . .

Beneath the dust of centuries there lies
A sculptured tomb of marble, with these words
Engraved upon the pavement: "In this place
Sleeps in the peace of Jesus Christ the dust
Of Ctesiphon and Ione, side by side,
Father and daughter.

"Blessed are the dead
Whose death is in the Lord; they rest from strife,
And their works follow them.

"This tomb was built
By Marius, a minister of Christ."

The Martyred Missionaries.

Further Details Respecting the Murder in China of Messrs. Wikholm and Johnson, the Swedish Missionaries.

FROM the letters of Dr. Griffith John, [illegible], China, we were informed of the circumstances attending the massacre of the two devoted young Swedes and published the story in this journal on Sept. 13. We are now enabled to publish the portraits of the young men. Dr. S. Lavington Hart of the London Missionary Society, whose station at Wuchang is near the headquarters of the Swedish Mission, knew them well and writes lovingly of them. "A few weeks ago," he says, "Mr. Wikholm came in to tell us about his difficult work in Sungpu. He described to us how false stories were being circulated about them, and how one man, especially, seemed filled with a violent hatred to the foreigners and their doctrine; so much so that he had placarded the town with notices calling on the people to unite and expel the 'foreign devils' from their midst, or, better still, to kill them. He even went so far as to incite them to do this foul deed during the 'feasts of the fifth month.' I remember how Mr. Wikholm told us that the mandarins would scarcely take any action in the matter. 'But I feel I must be there at the time,' he said, 'as the few who have sided with us have already suffered, and may be in danger if these threats prove true.' That evening he led the worship of our little household, and read from John xi.: 'I am the Resurrection and the Life,' speaking to us about death and the life to come.

REV. O. F. WIKHOLM.

REV. A. D. JOHANSSON.

"The last time I saw him was on the eve of his return. He was taking a walk alone on the city wall, doubtless facing the future and communing with his God. Our Swedish friends heard with relief that 'the feast of the fifth day' had passed off quietly, and that their two brethren were safe and well; for with Mr. Wikholm had gone Mr. Johansson, a man of whom it has been said that he loved the Chinese and trusted them even as he would have them trust him. But on Monday, July 3d, the coolie who had gone to Sungpu with stores returned, bringing the dreadful news of the riot and of the brutal stoning to death of these two Christian missionaries. Bit by bit the information was received, now by a Sungpuman—who had been all but beaten to death for his friendliness to the Swedes—now by the landlord of the house in which they lived—who had been threatened with his life, and had been [illegible]d to flee, leaving his goods to be ran[illegible]l—and by others who had escaped to Hankow. I do not intend to describe this cruel murder, as the details are too painful to recite. But often since hearing of the end of these brave messengers of Christ, I have had before my mind the scene, and have almost seen them beaten out of their house into the middle of the angry crowd, taking refuge in a [illegible] house and fleeing to the roof for [illegible] hunted from roof to roof till at [illegible] were compelled to meet their pur[illegible]nd, with the howling rabble closing in [illegible] them, gradually succumb to the stoning and the beating. And if the report be corr[illegible] posed day after day on the spot where they had [illegible] ing feasted by the mandarins of the district.

[illegible] friends to their last resting-place, close by the monument erected over the spot where, two years ago, Argent was buried. Mr. Lund, of the Swedish Mission, told us that as he and his friend Wikholm were standing in that [illegible] Wikholm had said to him: 'I wonder who will be the next?' Little did he think that he himself should be the next to wear the martyr's crown.

"Pray for the bereaved mission, pray for us that whatever may be the incidents of our very real warfare out here, we may be found faithful and fit to join in the last great victory song. But pray especially for China, its poor unenlightened people; for those who might hear and will not; for the many who are willing to hear, but can scarcely understand the simple message, and for the still larger number of those who cannot believe because they have not heard. And how shall they hear without a preacher?"

CONVERTS BECOME MISSIONARIES.

An inspiring report has been received by the Missionary Herald from Phalapye, the new district in Africa where King Khama has established himself and his people. It seems that the chief and his followers have been impressed with the duty of giving the Gospel which they have received to others, and they had planned to co-operate in a mission to Lake Ngami in April. A public meeting was held in reference to the matter, chief Khama presiding, making a very effective speech; missionaries and natives took part in the service, and the church at Phalapye contributed a wagon and oxen and three men. On the following Sunday a number of people who have been waiting a long time for reception into the church were welcomed, no less than sixty being received into church fellowship. Khama and his people are greatly cheered with the progress of the work amongst them.

THE TRIUMPH OF FAITH.

A Critical Year in the Orphanages Established and Maintained by Mr. George Muller.

OUR readers are familiar with the great work of faith which Mr. George Muller has conducted at Ashley Down, England, for now nearly sixty-four years. Although the expenses of feeding, clothing and educating the orphans under his care amounts to $450 a day, he has never yet made any appeal to the public for help. In every crisis he has made his appeal to God in secret and the needed funds have been sent in time. Sometimes there has been neither food nor money in the houses, but the children have never missed a meal. Gifts have always come before the need was felt. As many of these offerings have been sent from this country, an extract from the annual report just issued will be read with interest.

The financial year opened under a cloud. The salaries of the teachers were in arrear and some necessary repairs to the buildings had not been paid for. About $18,000 were required for immediate payments. Mr. Muller says: "Our trial of faith continued week after week, and month after month; but Mr. Wright and I, and our many helpers, looked with unshaken confidenee to the Lord, fully assured that in his own time he would more abundantly help and deliver us out of our difficulties." This faith was honored of God. At the closing of accounts at the end of May for the financial year, all the arrears has been cleared off, the current expenses paid and a balance is left on hand of $11,600 toward this year's expenses. This large amount of money has come chiefly in small sums and from total strangers. The number of orphans received during the year was 200 and there are more in the institutions now than at any previous period in their history."

Since the last acknowledgment of sums sent by women bearing the honored name of "Mary," as donations to the monument to be erected by the women of America to this representative Christian mother, I have received the following contributions: "In memory of a mother Mary C." by A. R. S., Ford's Store, Maryland, 25c.; M. H., by E. M. B., Birckton, Saratoga Co., N. Y., 11c.; Little Sister Mary, by R. A. R., Mount Holly, N. J., 25c.; Mary K. and Mary P., Mechanicsburg, Pa., 50c.; Grandmother, Mother, Aunt and Daughter, New Hampshire, $1.; Mother, by M. J. R., West Hoboken, 25c.; Mary H., by A. B. F., Mary A. F., by A. B. F., Mary G., by S. B. H., and Mary E. S., by W. H. H., Central City, Col., $1; a Mother 73 years old, Mary A. H., Mary E. G., Mary E. H. G., Mary E. G., Stonington, Conn., $1; Mary S., Patchogue, L. I., 25c.; Mary M. R., Pope Co., Ill., 25c.; Mary E. P. McKean, Erie Co., Pa., 25c. In reply to a contributor's question I would state that the price of The Story of Mary Washington, by Marion Harland, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass., is $1, also that all the profits upon the sale of the work go to the Monument Fund.

THE NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

The results to which the labors of Professor Zahn, of Erlangen, lead may be summed up as follows:

1. The Churches were in possession of all the canonical books before the time of Jerome, but circumstances had not permitted a full agreement upon all the items of the Canon. In the time of Jerome, the great Latin translator and editor (A. D. 380-420), the New Testament consisted of the same books which we now find in our English Bibles.

2. The idea of canonical Scriptures is a primitive fact in the history of the Church.

3. The first Bible of the Church was, as in the synagogue, the Old Testament. The Gospel was first received orally, though, no doubt, this spoken testimony would soon attain a new form. Apostolical Epistles were read, and, since the Apostles were regarded as men filled with the Holy Spirit, their communications weae received as inspired.

4. It is probable that the Epistles of Paul were the first to be collected in the Gentile Churches. When the Apostles had passed away, the four Gospels written by them or under their patronage, were formed into a Canon. The Gospels and thirteen of the Epistles of Paul first attained the full position of authoritative Scriptures. But the Act, the Catholic Epistles, Hebrews, and the Apocalypse, were known and were gradually received by recognition in particular churches.

5. It can, therefore, be shown historically that since the Apostolic Age the Church has not been without its standard of sacred writings as the ground of its authority.

HOME THE TYPE OF HEAVEN.

"The sweetest type of heaven is home," writes Rev. T. Holland Day, "heaven is the home for whose acquisition we are to strive most strongly. Home, in one form and another, is the great object of life. It stands at the end of every day's labor, and beckons us to its bosom. And life would be cheerless and meaningless did we not discern across the river that divides us from the life beyond, glimpses of the pleasant mansion prepared for us."

If you look at a dozen common lamp-chimneys, and then at Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass," you will see the differences—all but one—they break from heat; these don't; you can't see that.

Common glass is misty, milky, dusty; you can't see through it; Macbeth's is clear.

Tough, clear glass is worth fine work; and a perfect chimney of fine tough glass is worth a hundred such as you hear, pop, clash on the least provocation.

ELEVEN THOUSAND HOURS OF PRAYER.

The Retirement of Mr. J. C. Lanphier, who Led these Petitions at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting—Mr. C. F. Cutter Accepts the Leadership.

CHRISTIANS of every denomination and in every State of the Union and not a few in foreign lands have had relations with the prayer-meeting which is held every day at noon in Fulton Street, New York. For thirty-six years they have been sending requests for prayer to this meeting and have been asking that thanks be given to God for the answers to those prayers. The change that has just taken place in the management of the meeting will, therefore, be a matter of wide and lively interest. Happily it is not a change of method or of principle, but a personal change, rendered necessary by the passage of time. The venerable missionary, who has so ably and faithfully conducted the meeting for thirty-six years, has attained the age of eighty-four years and no longer feels physically equal to the work it entails. He has found a younger man able and willing to take his place, a man whose heart is in the work and whose faith in the power of prayer is so strong that Mr. Lanphier transfers the office to him with full confidence that the beloved offspring of his own labors will thrive and flourish under his care. This change was announced by Mr. Lanphier on Saturday, September 23, at the commencement of the thirty-seventh year of the history of the prayer-meeting. He then formally introduced Mr. C. F. Cutter as his successor and cordially commended him to the good-will of his colleagues.

Mr. Jeremiah Calvin Lanphier is the founder of the famous meeting. In 1857, the year of the memorable financial panic, when for months men of wealth and position knew not from day to day whether they would become penniless, and thousands saw the accumulated savings of a lifetime swept from their hands, there was a widespread solemnity in the community and a disposition to seek the eternal riches which can never fade away. Mr. Lanphier was then engaged in mission work in connection with the North Reformed Dutch Church, a picture of which appears with his portrait on this page. He had been in business and could sympathize with the men whose torturing anxieties were driving them to the Source of true peace and comfort. An absorbing desire to consecrate his efforts wholly to the service of God had led him, some time before, to relinquish business and devote his time and energies to labor in the populous district around the church. A tall, courteous, kindly man of forty-eight years of age, he was at that time, with a manner so gentle and sympathetic that people of all classes spontaneously confided in him, told him their troubles and sought his Christian counsel. Many broken-hearted, despairing men, grieving over the loss of home and fortune did he comfort in those troublous times, pointing them to the Friend who never fails, and encouraging them to trust in Him who would not feed the ravens and clothe the lilies, and leave his children in need.

No man can engage in such work without encountering difficulties, and Mr. Lanphier had his share. Often, his own faith faltered and he would grow discouraged. As Christ felt, when the woman touched him that "virtue had gone out of him," so the Christian worker often feels that in listening to the sorrows of others and imparting consolation to them that his own spiritual strength is impaired. At such times Mr. Lanphier went to the Consistory room, at the rear of the church, to bend in prayer before him "who giveth more grace." He would rise from his knees to resume his visiting, refreshed and strengthened. The thought crossed his mind that many a burdened soul might gain strength in the same way, if an opportunity was afforded. In that thought was the origin of the Fulton Street prayer-meeting. As he dwelt upon it, it grew to a practical purpose. One day, the business men of Wall Street and the adjacent streets, the clerks in the banks and offices, the brokers and dealers, received a circular informing them that on Wednesdays, beginning with September 23, 1857, a meeting for prayer would be held at noon in the Consistory room of the Old Dutch Church, and would continue for one hour. "This meeting," the circular explained, "is intended to give merchants, mechanics, clerks, strangers, and business men generally, an opportunity to stop and call upon God amid the perplexities incident to their respective avocations."

The first response to the invitation was not encouraging. At the time appointed, Mr. Lanphier took his seat in the room, but no one was there to join him in seeking the Lord. Half an hour passed and no one came. It seemed as if the men who had been invited had said like the men of whom Job wrote, "What profit shall we have if we pray unto him?" At the end of the half hour one man came and later, there were four others. At the meeting on the following Wednesday, twenty were present, and at the next meeting, the company numbered forty. Thus encouraged, Mr. Lanphier obtained the consent of the Consistory to the meetings being held every day. The same desire was felt by others. Before Mr. Lanphier could announce the change to the meeting, one of those present anticipated him by moving, as a resolution, the request that the meeting be held daily. The resolution was passed unanimously, and in a few well chosen words, Mr. Lanphier told the meeting that, as with many of the petitions they would offer at the Throne of Grace, this request was answered before it was presented. From that day to this there has been no break. It soon became necessary, owing to the increasing numbers who attended, to hold the meetings in the larger room on the ground-floor. Thirty-six years have passed, the growth of the city compelled the demolition of the church, but the old room still stands, and every day at noon believers still meet there to call upon God. Sometimes the meetings have been held in seasons of national trouble, as during the war, and the illness of President Garfield; sometimes in periods of financial stress, but in all seasons and in all kinds of weather and in all varieties of circumstances, with ever-growing confidence, men have come to lay before God their trials and perplexities and seek his aid.

MR. C. F. CUTTER,
The new President of the Fulton St. Prayer Meeting

The benefits of the meeting have not been confined to those who could be present in person. The knowledge that such a meeting was held spread far and near, and people in distant cities who were in some special need would write asking the prayers of the meeting for themselves or their loved ones. It has been no uncommon event for three hundred such letters to come in one day and it involved no slight labor to classify these so as to present them at the meeting. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mail such letters frequently come from persons who do not know the address of the meeting, with a request that they be forwarded. The most significant feature, however, as a good lesson for this agnostic age is the second letters which often come from the same people. While it is true that, like the ten lepers whom Christ cleansed, of whom only one returned to give thanks, many fail to report the answers to the prayers offered at their request and to ask that thanks be offered to God, so large a number have done so, as to

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE GARDENS OF THE SEA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Jonah 2: 5, "The weeds were wrapped about my head."

THE Botany of the Bible or God among the flowers, is a fascinating subject. I hold in my hand a book, which I brought from Palestine, bound in olive wood, and within it are pressed flowers which have not only retained their color, but their aroma; flowers from Bethlehem, flowers from Jerusalem, flowers from Gethsemane, flowers from Mount of Olives, flowers from Bethany, flowers from Siloam, flowers from the Valley of Jehoshaphat, red anemones, and wild mignonette, butter-cups, daisies, cyclamens, chamomile, blue-bells, ferns, mosses, grasses, and a wealth of flora that keep me fascinated by the hour, and every time I open it, it is a new revelation. It is the New Testament of the fields. But my text leads us into another realm of the botanical kingdom.

Having spoken to you in a course of sermons about God Everywhere: on the Astronomy of the Bible, or God among the Stars; the Ornithology of the Bible, or God among the Birds; the Ichthyology of the Bible, or God among the Fishes; the Mineralogy of the Bible, or God among the Amethysts; the Conchology of the Bible, or God among the Shells; the Chronology of the Bible, or God among the Centuries, I speak now to you about the Botany of the Bible, or God in the Gardens of the Sea. Although I purposely take this morning for consideration the least-observed and least-appreciated of all the botanical products of the world we shall find the contemplation very absorbing. In all our Theological Seminaries where we make ministers, there ought to be professors to give lessons in Natural History. Physical Science ought to be taught side by side with Revelation. It is the same God who inspires the page of the natural world as the page of the Scriptural world. What a freshening up it would be to our sermons to press into them even a fragment of Mediterranean sea-weed. We should have fewer sermons awfully dry if we imitated our blessed Lord, and in our discourses, like him, we would let a lily bloom, or a crow fly, or a hen brood her chickens, or a crystal of salt flash out the preservative qualities of religion. The trouble is that in many of our Theological Seminaries men who are so dry themselves they never could get people to come and hear them preach, are now trying to teach young men how to preach, and the student is put between two great presses of dogmatic theology and squeezed until there is no life left in him. Give the poor victim at least one lesson on the Botany of the Bible.

That was an awful plunge that the recreant prophet Jonah made when dropped over the gunwales of the Mediterranean ship he sank many fathoms down into a tempestuous sea. Both before and after the monster of the deep swallowed him, he was entangled in sea-weed. The jungles of the deep threw their cordage of vegetation around him. Some of this sea-weed was anchored to the bottom of the watery abysm and some of it was afloat and swallowed by the great sea-monster, so that, while the prophet was at the bottom of the deep after he was horribly imprisoned, he could exclaim and did exclaim in the words of my text: "The weeds were wrapped about my head." Jonah was the first to record that there are growths upon the bottom of the sea, as well as upon land. The first picture I ever owned was a handful of sea-weed pressed on a page, and I called them "The Shorn Locks of Neptune." These products of the deep, whether brown or green or yellow or purple or red or inter-shot of many colors, are most fascinating. They are distributed all over the depths and from Arctic to Antarctic. That God thinks well of them I conclude from the fact that he has made six thousand species of them. Sometimes these water-plants are four hundred or seven hundred feet long, and they cable the sea. One specimen has a growth of fifteen hundred feet. On the Northwest shore of our country is a sea-weed with leaves thirty or forty feet long, amid which the sea-otter makes his home, resting himself on the buoyancy of the leaf and stem. The thickest jungles of the tropics are not more full of vegetation than the depths of the sea. There are forests down there and vast prairies all abloom, and God walks there as he walked in the Garden of Eden "in the cool of the day." Oh, what entrancement, this sub-aqueous world! Oh, the God-given wonders of the sea-weed! Its birthplace is a palace of crystal. The cradle that rocks it is the storm. Its grave is a sarcophagus of beryl and sapphire. There is no night down there. There are creatures of God on the bottom of the sea so constructed that, strewn all along, they make a firmament besprent with stars, constellations and galaxies of imposing lustre. The sea-feather is a lamplighter. The gymnotus is an electrician, and he is surcharged with electricity, and makes the deep bright with the lightning of the sea. The gorgona flashes like jewels. There are sea anemours ablaze with light. There is the star-fish and the moon-fish, so-called because they so powerfully suggest stellar and lunar illumination. Oh! these midnight lanterns of the ocean caverns: these processions of flame over the white floor of the deep: these illuminations three miles down under the sea: these gorgeously upholstered castles of the Almighty in the under-world! The author of the text felt the pull of the hidden vegetation of the Mediterranean, whether or not he appreciated its beauty, as he cries out: "The weeds were wrapped about my head."

Let my subject cheer all those who had friends who have been buried at sea or in our great American lakes. Which of us brought up on the Atlantic coast has not had kindred or friend thus sepulchred? We had the useless horror of thinking that they were denied proper resting-place. We said: "Oh, if they had lived to come ashore, and had then expired! What an alleviation of our trouble it would have been to put them in some beautiful family plot, where we could have planted flowers and trees over them." Why, God did better for them than we could have done for them. They were let down into beautiful gardens. Before they had reached the bottom, they had garlands about their brow. In more elaborate and adorned place than we could have afforded them, they were put away for the last slumber. Hear it, mothers and fathers of sailor boys, whose ship went down in our last August hurricane! There are no Greenwoods or Laurel Hills or Mount Auburns so beautiful on the land, as there are banked and terraced and scooped and hung in the depths of the sea. The bodies of our foundered and sunken friends are girdled and canopied and housed with such glories as attend no other Necropolis.

They were swamped in life-boats, or they struck on Goodwin Sands or Deal Beach or the Skerries and were never heard of, or disappeared with the City of Boston or the Ville de Havre or the Cymbria, or were run down in a fishing-smack that put out from Newfoundland. But dismiss your previous gloom about the horrors of ocean entombment.

When Sebastopool was besieged in the Anglo-French War, Prince Mentschikoff, commanding the Russian Navy, saw that the only way to keep the English out of the harbor was to sink all of the Russian ships of war in the roadstead, and so one hundred vessels sank. When, after the war was over, our American engineer, Gowan, descended to the depths in a diving-bell, it was an impressive spectacle. One hundred buried ships! But it is that way nearly all across the Atlantic Ocean. Ships sunk not by command of Admirals, but by the command of cyclones. But they all had sublime burial, and the surroundings amid which they sleep the last sleep are more imposing than the Taj Mahal, the Mausoleum with walls encrusted with precious stones, and built by the Great Mogul of India over his Empress. Your departed ones were buried in the Gardens of the Sea, fenced off by hedges of coraline. The greatest obsequies ever known on the land were those of Moses, where no one but God was present. The sublime report of that entombment is in the Book of Deuteronomy, which says that the Lord buried him, and of those who have gone down to slumber in the deep, the same may be said—"The Lord buried them." As Christ was buried in a garden, so your ship-wrecked friends, and those who could not survive till they reached port, were put down amid iridescence—"In the midst of the garden there was a sepulchre." It has always been a mystery what was the particular mode by which George G. Cookman, the pulpit orator of the Methodist Church and the Chaplain of the American Congress, left this life after embarking for England on the steamship President, March 11th, 1841. That ship never arrived in port. No one ever signaled her, and on both sides of the ocean it has for fifty years been questioned what became of her. But this I know about Cookman, that whether it was iceberg, or conflagration mid-sea, or collision, he had more garlands on his ocean tomb than if, expiring on land, each of his million friends had put a bouquet on his casket. In the midst of the garden was his sepulchre.

But that brings me to notice the misnomer in this Jonahitic expression of the text. The prophet not only made a mistake by trying to go to Tarshish when God told him to go to Nineveh, but he made a mistake when he styled as weeds these growths that enwrapped him on the day he sank. A weed is something that is useless. It is something you throw out from the garden. It is something that chokes the wheat. It is something to be grubbed out from among the cotton. It is something unsightly to the eye. It is an invader of the vegetable or floral world. But this growth that sprang up from the depth of the Mediterranean, or floated on its surface, was among the most beautiful things that God ever makes. It was a water plant known as the red-colored Alga, and no weed at all. It comes from the loom of Infinite beauty. It is planted by heavenly love. It is the star of a sunken firmament. It is a lamp which the Lord kindled. It is a cord by which to bind whole sheaves of practical suggestion. It is a poem all of whose cantos are rung by Divine goodness. Yet we all make the mistake that Jonah made in regard to it, and call it a weed. "The weeds were wrapped about my head." Ah! that is the trouble on the land as on the sea. We call those weeds that are flowers. Pitched up on the beach of society are children without home, without opportunity for anything but sin, seemingly without God. They are washed up helpless. They are called ragamuffins. They are spoken of as the rakings of the world. They are waifs. They are street Arabs. They are flotsam and jetsam of the social sea. They are something to be left alone, or something to be trod on, or something to give up to decay. Nothing but weeds. They are up the rickety stairs of that garret. They are down in the cellar of that tenement house. They swelter in summers when they see not one blade of green grass, and shiver in winters that allow them not one warm coat or shawl or shoe. Such the city missionary found in one of our city rookeries, and when the poor woman was asked if she sent her children to school, she replied: "No, sir, I never did send 'em to school. I know it, they ought to learn, but I couldn't. I try to shame him sometimes (it is my husband, sir) but he drinks and then beats me. (Look at that bruise on my face), and I tell him to see what is comin' to his children. There's Peggy, goes sellin' fruit every night in those cellars in Water Street, and they're hells, sir. She's learning all sorts of bad words there, and don't get back till twelve o'clock at night. If it wasn't for her earnin' a shillin' or two in them places, I should starve. Oh, I wish they was out of the city. Yes, it is the truth; I would rather have all my children dead than on the street, but I can't help it." Another one of those poor women, found by a Reformatory Association, recited her story of want and woe, and looked up and said: "I felt so hard to lose the children when they died, but now I'm glad they're gone." Ask any one of a thousand such children on the streets: "Where do you live?" and they will answer: "I don't live nowhere." They will sleep to-night in ash-barrels, or under outdoor stairs, or on the wharf, kicked and bruised and hungry. Who cares for them? Once in a while a city missionary or a tract distributor or a teacher of ragged schools will rescue one of them, but for most people they are only weeds. Yet, Jonah did not more completely misrepresent the Red Algæ about his head in the Mediterranean than most people misjudge these poor and forlorn and dying children of the street. They are not weeds. They are immortal flowers. Down in the deep sea of woe, but flowers. When society and the church of God come to appreciate their eternal value, there will be more C. L. Braces and more Van Meters and more Angels of Mercy spending their fortunes and their lives in the rescue. Hear it, Oh, ye philanthropic and Christian and merciful souls; not weeds, but flowers. I adjure you as the friends of all Newsboys' Lodging Houses, of all Industrial Schools of all Homes for Friendless Girls, and for the many reformatories and humane associations now on foot. How much they have already accomplished. Out of what wretchedness, into what good homes. Of twenty-one thousand of these picked up out of the streets and sent into country homes, only twelve children turned out badly. In the last thirty years a number that no man can number of the vagrants have been lifted into respectability and usefulness and a Christian life. Many of them have homes of their own. Though ragged boys once and street girls, now at the head of prosperous families, honored on earth and to be glorious in heaven. Some of them have been Governors of States. Some of them are ministers of the Gospel. In all departments of life those who were thought to be weeds have turned out to be flowers. One of those rescued lads from the streets of our cities wrote to another, saying: "I have heard you are studying for the ministry; so am I." My hearers, I implead you for the newsboys of the streets, many of them the brightest children of the city, but no chance. Do not step on their bare feet. Do not, when they steal a ride, cut behind. When the paper is three cents, once in a while give them a five cent piece, and tell them to keep the change. I like the ring of the letter the newsboy sent back from Indiana, where he had been sent to a good home, to a New York Newsboys' Lodging House: "Boys, we should show ourselves that we are no fools, that we can become as respectable as any of the countrymen, for Franklin and Webster and Clay were poor boys once, and even George Law and Vanderbilt and Astor. And now, boys, stand up and let them see you have got the real stuff in you. Come out here and make respectable and honorable men, so they can say: 'There, that boy was once a newsboy.'" My hearers, join the Christian philanthropists who are changing organ-grinders and bootblacks and newsboys and street Arabs and cigar girls into those who shall be kings and queens unto God forever. It is high time that Jonah finds out that that which is about him is not weeds but flowers.

As I examine this Red Alga which was about the recreant prophet down in the Mediterranean depths, when, in the words of my text, he cried out: "The weeds were wrapped about my head," and I am led thereby to further examine this submarine world, I am compelled to exclaim, What a wonderful God we have! I am glad that, by diving-bell and "Brooks' Deep-Sea Sounding Apparatus" and ever improving machinery, we are permitted to walk the floor of the ocean and report the wonders wrought by the great God.

Study these gardens of the sea. Easier and easier shall the profounds of the ocean become to us, and more and more its opulence of color and plant unroll, especially as "Villeroy's Submarine Boat" has been constructed making it possible to navigate under the sea almost as well as on the surface of the sea, and unless God in his mercy banishes war from the earth, whole fleets of armed ships will yet far down under the water move on to blow up the argosies that float the surface. May such submarine ships be used for laying open the wonders of God's workings in the great deep and never for human devastation! Oh, the marvels of the water world! These so-called seaweeds are the pasture fields and the forage of the innumerable animals of the deep. Not one species of them can be spared from the economy of nature. Valleys and mountains and plants miles underneath the waves are all covered with flora and fauna. Sunken Alps and Apennines and Himalayas of Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. A continent that once connected Europe and America, so that in the ages past men came on foot across from where England is to where we now stand, all sunken, and now covered with the growths of the sea, as it once was covered with growths of the land. England and Ireland once all one piece of land, but now much of it so far sunken as to make a channel, and Ireland has become an island. The islands, for the most part, are only the foreheads of sunken continents. The sea conquering the land all along the coasts, and crumbling the hemispheres, wider and wider become the sub-aqueous dominions. Thank God that skilled hydrographers have made us maps and charts of the rivers and lakes and seas, and shown us something of the work of the Eternal God in the water-worlds. Thank God that the great Virginian, Lieutenant Maury, lived to give us "The Physical Geography of the Sea," and that men of genius have gone forth to study the so-called weeds that wrapped about Jonah's head and have found them to be coronals of beauty, and when the tide receded, these scientists have waded down and picked up Divinely-pictured leaves of the ocean, the naturalists, Pike and Hooper and Walters, gathering them from the beach of Long Island Sound, and Dr. Blodgett preserving them from the shores of Key West, and Professors Emerson and Gray finding them along Boston Harbor, and Professor Gibbs gathering them from Charleston Harbor, and for all the other triumphs of Algology, or the Science of Sea-Weed. Why confine ourselves to the old and hackneyed illustrations of the wonder-workings of God, when there are at least five great seas full of illustrations as yet not marshalled, every root and frond and cell and color and movement and habit of oceanic vegetation crying out: "God! God! He made us. He clothed us. He adorned us. He was the God of our ancestors clear back to the first sea-growth, when God divided the waters which were above the firmament from the waters which were under the firmament, and shall be the God of our descendants clear down to the day when the sea shall give up its dead. We have heard his command and we have obeyed: 'Praise the Lord, dragons and all deeps.'"

There is a great comfort that rolls over upon us from this study of the so-called sea-weed, and that is the demonstrated doctrine of a particular Providence. When I find that the Lord provides in the so-called sea-weed the pasturage for the thronged marine world, so that not a fin or scale in all that oceanic aquarium suffers need, I conclude he will feed us, and if he suits the Algæ to the animal life of the deep, he will provide the food for our physical and spiritual needs. And if he clothes the flowers of the deep with richness of robe that looks bright as fallen rainbows by day, and at night makes the underworld look as though the sea were on fire, surely he will clothe you: "Oh, ye of little faith!" And what fills me with unspeakable delight is that this God of depths and heights, of ocean and of continent, may, through Jesus Christ, the Divinely appointed means, be yours and mine, to help, to cheer, to pardon, to save, to emparadise. What matters who in earth or hell is against us, if He is for us? Omnipotence to defend us, Omnipresence to companion us, and Infinite love to enfold and uplift and enrapture us. And when God does small things so well, seemingly taking as much care with the coil of a sea-weed as the out-branching of a Lebanon Cedar, and with the color of a vegetable growth which is hidden fathoms out of sight as he does with the solferino and purple of a summer sunset, we will be determined to do well all we are called to do, though no one see or appreciate us. Mighty God! Roll in upon our admiration and holy appreciation more of the wonders of this submarine world! My joy is that after we are quit of all earthly hindrances we may come back to this world and explore what we cannot now fully investigate. If we shall have power to soar into the atmospheric without fatigue I think we shall have power to dive into the aqueous without peril, and that the pictured and tessellated sea-floor will be as accessible as now is to the traveler the floor of the Alhambra, and all the gardens of the deep will then swing open to us their gates as now to the tourist Chatsworth opens on public days its cascades and statuary and conservatories for our entrance. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." You cannot make me believe that God hath spread out all that garniture of the deep merely for the polyphs and crustacea to look at.

And if the unintelligent creatures of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic Ocean, He surrounds with such beautiful grasses of the deep, what a heaven we may expect for our uplifted and ransomed souls when we are unchained of the flesh and rise to realms beatific. Of the flora of that "Sea of Glass mingled with fire," I have no power to speak, but I shall always be glad that, when the prophet of the text, flung over the gunwales of the Mediterranean ship, descended into the boiling sea, that which he supposed to be weeds wrapped about his head were not weeds but flowers. And am I not right in this glance at the botany of the Bible in adding to Luke's mint, anise and cummin, and Matthew's tares, and John's vine, and Solomon's cluster of camphire, and Jeremiah's balm, and Job's bulrush, and Isaiah's terebinth, and Hosea's thistle, and Ezekiel's cedar, and "the hyssop that springeth out of the wall," and the "Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley," and the frankincense and myrrh and cassia which the astrologers brought to the manger, at least one stalk of the Algæ of the Mediterranean. And now I make the marine doxology of David my peroration, for it was written about forty or fifty miles from the place where the scene of the text was enacted. "The sea is his and he made it! and his hands formed the dry land. O, come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker. For he is our God, and we are the people of his pasture." Amen.

A BRAHMAN ASCETIC.

From Rev. John P. Jones, the American Board's missionary at Pasumalia in the Madura District of India comes the following story of a remarkable conversion: "Recently we had the pleasure of receiving into the Pasumalai church, on profession of his faith, a Brahman, probably the first one of that social status ever united with this church. His case is both interesting and encouraging. He is a young man of twenty-three years of age, of considerable intelligence, and well versed in Hindu Shastras. His home was at Wynaad, where his brothers and sisters now live. Four and a half years ago he donned the yellow cloth, became an ascetic and as a Hindu devotee has wandered all over India. He was everywhere well received inasmuch as he was in the habit of addressing audiences on Pantheism. But his own teaching brought him no peace of mind, and the more he taught the more he felt the utter hollowness of his own words. Moreover his visits to Benares to the temple of Jaggannath and to other sacred places revealed to him the vast corruption of these centres of Hinduism; so that he now claims that if there is a hell upon the earth it must be Benares. In his pilgrimages he also met in many places Christians whose lives he watched and whose Bibles he studied. Thus he grew more and more dissatisfied with his ancestral faith and leaned increasingly toward the Christian religion. When he came here a short time ago he was in an unsettled state of mind. I had a long talk with him and found that he was in no mood to defend his old faith. After a few days of intercourse with us here he finally decided to give himself up to Christ and asked that we baptize him. While rejoiced at this decision we hesitated to take so important a step without adequate evidence of his sincerity and conversion. Since that time I have seen him daily and had opportunity in conversation with him and in prayer to satisfy myself that he is thoroughly sincere. He is also remarkably well versed in the Bible and shows appreciation of its truth. The pastor with whom he has lived during these weeks is deeply impressed with his character and intelligence and believes most strongly in his new life. He now purposes to discontinue entirely his wanderings and after suitable preparation, to enter upon Christian service.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

S S. Lesson for Oct. 15 Rom 5 : 1-11. Golden Text, Rom. 5 : 8 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"HOW can man be just with God," or "before God?" (Job. 9:2,margin), is the question which arises in the soul of every man who is really awakened by the Holy Spirit. Every conversion which is not the result of God's answer to this question of questions lacks the true foundation for real and lasting relations with God. "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings,with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" (Micah 6: 6, 7.) All this would be no better than the offering of Cain which was rejected. "It cost more to redeem their souls." (Ps. 49: 8, P. B. V.) God can never deal with sin as though it had not been. "Every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward."

God Must be Just before he can justify, he must be true to himself, to his own holiness, in dealing with the sinner. God could never be a party to sin by treating it lightly: "The soul that sinneth it shall die." (Ezek. 18: 4.) Every heathen religion recognizes sin, but forgiveness, reconciliation, justification is unknown except in Christ. There is nothing in the heathen conception of God to raise and elevate him. He thinks of his Gods as powerful but capricious beings whom, for his own sake, he must propitiate; but holiness, righteousness, peace of conscience are unknown to him. The heathen choose their own Gods, manufacture them, carry them upon their shoulders, etc. But when it dawns upon a man that there is a God that made heaven and earth, in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, then he must also think: "How do I stand in relation to this mighty, this holy God? He is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and cannot look upon iniquity; how can I, with a heart "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," draw near to him? It was undoubtedly the question with which Jacob lay down with a stone for his pillows when the consequences of his cruel deceit with his old blind father made it necessary that he should fly from the face of his brother, Esau. O the bitter remorse of the man's heart when away from home, utterly alone upon the face of earth, his treachery discovered, his character for truth gone, he was still enough to give time for reflection and he would have drawn near to God, but that, to him, insuperable barrier, his sin, stood between, and he had to realize that he was even more cut off from him than even from his parents.

Bruised Jacob! There is one who does not break the bruised reed. Smouldering faith! Know that he does not quench the smoking flax. Jacob was nearer God now that he felt himself far off, than he had been before this fall, for he had now learned and he knew he was a sinner. No man can be justified till he knows this. Fatigue overcame him and sorrow and he slept. Then the sinner's Friend drew near, and wrote upon his tired brain and broken heart a revelation of himself. "He dreamed, and beholda ladder set up on the earth and the top of it reached to heaven." (Gen. 28: 12.) What then? Was there a way by which sinful man could indeed reach God? Could it be possible that man a liar should draw near to the God of truth? [illegible] how the ladder, "the Way," is Jesus Christ, who also hath once suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, "that he might bring us to God." But God revealed himself to him as far as it was possible,and Jacob knew that the holy God loved him, and cared for him, and from the awful condemning of his sin he was relieved; he would build an altar,would draw nigh unto God, and would meet no repulse. Jacob was at peace with God!

Under the New Testament our only ground for peace is Jesus Christ. "Now, in Christ Jesus,ye who sometimes were far off,are made nigh by the blood of Christ. For who hath made both [Jew and Gentile] one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances, for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace, and that he might reunite both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby, and came and preached peace to you that were afar off, and to them that were nigh." Peace between an offended God and sinful man, peace between Jew and Gentile,peace between us and our own consciences, because his blood "speaketh better things than that of Abel."

How different this is from the heathen idea of outbalancing the sins of the past by good deeds in the present! "Being justified by faith" in what Jesus Christ has done, "we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. By whom also we have access into this grace wherein we stand—for he is the Door, the Way—and rejoice in hope of the glory of God," when he shall come again. We can approach God now as justified, if we believe for our own selves, and God himself asks, "Who can lay anything to their charge? it is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again who is also at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

the prisoner, if the judge accepts the substitute, there can be no further appeal; the prisoner is as clear before his answer as though he had never sinned! But we sinners can never again lift up our hands in self-righteousness; we owe all to Another; we are justified only because the truly Just One took the place of the unjust, and in pure grace changed places with us. Therefore if there is in us any gratitude commensurate with the greatness of the Redemption by which we are justified, we shall not grumble, and pity ourselves at the first little trial we have; on the contrary "we glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given us." It is the test of how far the unspeakable love of Christ has laid hold of us that it becomes a joy to suffer for him, an instinct of love and gratitude. We have been conquered by love, we cannot forget that "when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. God commendeth his love to us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

When we deserved nothing but punishment, disgrace, and everlasting misery, he stood between us and the just punishment, and bore it himself for love to those who had treated him with indifference, scorn and contempt; those who had preferred the world and pleasure, their own will and device, to him and to his law. It is this which breaks the heart, this which conquers us, and makes us the slaves of love. What then? If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we [illegible]

Saved by His Life.

We have been saved through him by his death when he died for us, saved from hell and everlasting death, shall we not yield up our life to him, with our will and our affections, that by his life, lived in us, we may be saved from our own selfish hearts, our own crooked wills, our own evil affections, and so be made like him? It is the life of Jesus wrought in us by the Holy Ghost, which separates us from what we are by nature, and conforms us to what he is.

After Peter had left his business and his father and his ship to follow Jesus, he was still a forward, pushing, selfish man. He even rebuked the Lord Jesus, and wanted him to pity himself, (Matt. 16: 22, margin), instead of denying himself. He wanted selfishly to remain in the mount of transfiguration with Jesus, Moses and Elijah, James and John, and leave the poor world to perish! He wanted Jesus to fix a limit to forgiveness, and thought to forgive seven times was as great a stretch as could be possible (Matt. 18: 21), and was indeed astounded when Jesus said: "Seventy times seven;" hd wanted to drive bargains with God: "Behold we have forsaken all and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" (Matt. 19: 27),—all this was Peter's own self life. From all this Jesus saved him as he can save us.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

CLOSELY connected with last week's lesson is this of "Justification by Faith." Having explained the Godward side of salvation, showing that God was dealing with men in the Gospel as he dealt with them by the system of sacrifices, under the law, and having adjusted his old religious principles to the new revelation, Paul proceeds to explain the human side of the doctrine. The salvation of the Gospel was a free gift; man could never purchase it or earn it, but it was not given without conditions. Man must bring something on his side, before he could receive it. But it was as a qualification not as a payment. This something was faith. The condition was not, Paul held, a capricious choice, but one that was reasonable and philosophical. It was as if a regiment of soldiers had mutinied and under the military law were liable to execution. The favorite son of the king, by personal service and humiliation secures the offer of a free pardon to any rebel who will come forth from his hiding-place, lay down his arms and surrender to the son, who will conduct him to the king, his father. It is obvious that any rebel who hears of the offer and does not avail himself of it, is deterred by one of two motives. Either he does not desire the king's pardon, or he does not believe in the king's promise. Either attitude would be a new offence and would aggravate the original crime. It is not necessary that he should know how the pardon has been secured, although, that has been disclosed; nor is it necessary that he should do any penance, or make any payment; his one business is to prove his faith by coming in the way appointed and claiming the pardon promised. When Paul understood Christianity in this light, he felt like a man delivered from slavery. With joy, he proclaimed that the way to peace with God was not the long arduous and toilsome one of obedience to the Jewish law and observance of Jewish ordinances, but the way of simple trust and faith. This revelation lifted the burden from many shoulders and opened the door of hope to many hopeless ones. Centuries after Paul's time, men were groaning beneath a similar burden which had been imposed by the Roman Catholic Church and they knew no way to peace with God, but the one of payment and penance. The same revelation was again preached and it brought the same deliverance. Taking his stand on this chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, Luther proclaimed anew Paul's message of justification by faith and all Christendom was thrilled. Following Paul's example, he made that principle the corner-stone of his teaching and, since his day, wherever it has been proclaimed it has brought liberty and life to the seeking soul.

We rejoice in hope. It is a common, but erroneous idea that religion is a gloomy, sad thing, but as a matter of fact there is no man so hopeful and joyous as the man who possesses most of it. Col. A. J. Edgerton, while commanding a brigade in Louisiana, in which sickness and death were extremely prevalent, was requested to prohibit religious meetings, as "religion tended to depress the spirits of the men," and to injure their health. He caused a careful examination to be made, and refused the request because he said that he had learned that, while two-fifths of the whole regiment had died, only one-eighth of the Christians in it had died.

Scarcely for a righteous man will one die. Instances of such devotion have been known, but they are rare. Among the statues in ancient Rome is one of brass to a servant who knowing that his master was to be put to death, clothed himself in the garments of the latter that he might be taken for him. He was taken one night and killed, and his master caused this statue to be erected as a monument to his servant's faithful affection.

On the borders of a forest in Russia stands a granite pillar which is a memorial of a thrilling incident. It was a wild region, infested with wolves, and as a little party travelled along, it soon became plain that these were on their track. The pistols were fired; one horse after another was left to the ravenous wolves, till, as they came nearer and nearer, and nothing else remained to be tried, the faithful servant, in spite of the expostulations of his master, threw himself in the midst of them, and by his own death saved his master. That pillar stands where his bones were found; that inscription records the noble instance of attachment.

Some would even dare to die. One of the most conspicuous instances on record is that of the famous Dr. Guyon who voluntarily laid down his life that his fellow physicians might learn by the records he left the nature of a fatal disease. The plague was making a desert of the city of Marseilles; death was everywhere. The physicians could do nothing. In one of their councils a physician said how sad it was that they were all ignorant of the nature of the disease, being unable to see how it affected the organs of the body. If we could see them, he said, as they appear after the disease has run its course, we might learn how to save many lives. To do this, however,the corpse of one who died from the disease must be dissected,and to do that would involve the death of the operator. Dr. Guyon arose, and said, "I devote myself for the safety of my country. Before this numerous assembly, I vow in the name of humanity and religion, that to-morrow,at the break of day I will dissect a corpse, and write down as I proceed what I observe." He immediately left the room, made his will, and spent the night in religioos exercises. During the day a man had died in the house of the plague, and at daybreak on the following morning,Guyon entered the room and critically made the necessary examinations, writing down all his surgical observations. He then left the room, threw the papers into a vase of vinegar, that they might not convey the disease to another, and retired to a convenient place, where he died in twelve hours.

Christ died for us. The penalty once borne by Christ as our divine Substitue will not have to be suffered again by any who avail themselves by faith of his sacrifice. When Napoleon I. was emperor a conscription was made for the army, and a poor fellow, who had a wife and family, was drawn. He was fortunate enough to procure a man to take his place in the ranks as a substitute. The latter went to the field of battle and was killed in the very first action. Soon after this another draft was ordered, and the name of the same man was drawn again. He,however,refused to go out. Said he, "I am free from the conscription; I sent a substitute into the army, and he was killed; therefore I am a dead man." The case was disputed, and went before the French judges, who decided that under the law the man was free through his substitute's death.

"The Land of the Sky."

Russia's Expedition to the Vicinity of the Pamirs—A Mountainous Territory whose Possession gives the Key to India.

FOR a number of years past Russia has been advancing her interests step by step in Central Asia. The military outposts of the Czar's expeditionary forces some time ago penetrated to the Pamir region, sometimes called "the land of the sky," a territory on the north-western extremity of the great Thibeto-Himalayan mountain plateau, whence the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes take their source. It lies between Asiatic Russia and Afghanistan, immediately north of the Hindoo Koosh and with the wedge-like uplands of Northern India reaching up to its Southern borders. Control of the Pamirs would give to Russia the key to India, and would be a constant menace to the British, who have hitherto jealously guarded the mountain passes of the northwest against all intruders.

On this page we give an illustration in connection with the latest Russian official tour in Central Asia. Baron Wrewsky, the Russian Governor-General, and his staff encountered many hardships in their journey to Eastern Bokhara, and along the Amou-Daria river, and especially in surmounting the great natural barrier (known as the Pass of Terek Daven), which separates the Russian from the Chinese empires in Central Asia. The pass is rough and extremely mountainous, being 12,000 feet above the level of the sea. In approaching the pass, they observed among the fragments of rocks numerous skeletons of men and beasts, the relics of caravans which had perished there, amid the bleak cold winds and the eternal snows. The whole region about the pass has been a battle-ground for ages, Mussulmans, Chinese, and natives of Kashgar and Yarkand having there contended for supremacy on many hard-fought fields. Other passes, almost equally rugged, had to be traversed and the Asiatic scenery, rich in mountain, river and cascade, rivalled in grandeur anything found in Europe.

At almost every point the Russians were hospitably received by the native rulers and people. At a place called Dara-out-Kourgan, they were met and entertained by the Emir of Bokhara and the Bek of Karategin at a sumptuous "dastarkhan" or banquet, served under tents to a large company, who dined upon characteristic Asiatic viands, consisting of meats, pilaffs, bread and sweetmeats.

A number of Russia's Asiatic dependencies were visited, the object of the tour being to ascertain their condition and whether there has been any real improvement under Muscovite dominion. As a whole, the result was satisfactory.

China, too, has an eye on the Pamirs, and has at different times sent out expeditionary forces to watch the movements of England and Russia. Between Yarkand (on the verge of the Pamirs) and Sarag-gol is the desert of Shaitan Kum, a burning stretch of sand, and among the mountains themselves are some of the worst precipices in Asia. China claims a sort of suzerain right over the Pamirs and is apparently resolved that neither England nor Russia shall occupy the much-disputed territory. Sometime ago, a British expedition under Lord Dunmore and Major Roche entered the Pamirs by the Valley of Tashkurgan, which is the Chinese key to that country, and remained encamped on the Kukturk river fifty-five days, hunting and taking observations.

There is little doubt that, in the near future, the Pamir region is destined to be the scene of exciting events, in connection with Russia's Asiatic ambitions and England's determination to prevent the possibility of losing her hold on India.

THE LIGHTED PATH

The experience of a ship-captain's wife as she related it to a party of Christian ladies conveys a useful lesson. "We were on shipboard," she said, "the night was stormy and we were near shore. Suddenly the vessel ran on a sand bar. The waves dashed over the ship and seemed as if they would beat her to pieces. It was decided to abandon her and in some way unknown to me then the sailors were going ashore. I was told to go. I was terribly afraid, but a strong hand was laid on my arm and a kindly voice said, 'Do not be afraid; I will take care of you.' My guide bore a peculiar-shaped dark lantern, only a single ray of light being emitted from a small circular aperture. 'Now,' he said, 'take my hand; hold fast, do not look on either side of you, only on the little spot lighted by my lantern, and place your footsteps firmly right there.' I heard the rushing of the waters, and was still conscious of fear; but I did as he told me, planting my footsteps just there, not turning either to the right or the left, clasping firmly the strong hand. The danger was overcome, and the shore reached in safety. The next day my guide said, 'Would you like to see the way by which you came last night?' Then he showed me where our vessel had been lying, and the very narrow plank (just a single one) by which we had reached the shore." That is the way the Christian travels through life. He does not see far ahead but all he needs is to have light on the next step.

AN AMERICAN HOSPITAL IN INDIA.

The mail from India brings the report of the dedication of the new building of the American Mission Woman's Hospital at Madura city. At the dedication there were songs and prayers and addresses, in the presence of many members of the mission and a large company composed of Hindu gentlemen and of the native Christian community. Appropriate addresses followed by Rev. Mr. Jones in behalf of the mission, the Rajah of Ramnad in behalf of the Hindu community, by a native member of the municipal, and by Dr. Chester. The building is large and of two stories, and is located between the mission dispensary and the ladies' bungalow. The arch over the gateway has teach an impressive lesson. No reasonable unprejudiced man can examine the records which Mr. Lanphier has carefully kept without being convinced that God does answer prayer. It is not too much to say that the evidence thus furnished, if presented as evidence of the truth of some scientific theory would be accepted as irrefragable.

How the meeting is conducted thousands know by observation. Mr. Lanphier, with the organizing and penetrative faculty which characterizes him, early found that it was possible to throw "a wet blanket" on the meeting. Good but indiscreet brethren would preach, would indulge in "vain repetitions," would monopolize the time, and rules had to be established and observed. Ten minutes were allotted for opening the meeting with singing and reading a passage of Scripture. A pile of letters on the table, sent from all parts of the world, have previously been opened and their contents summarized. The chairman reads that a son in North Carolina asks prayer for the conversion of his friend; that a father in Vermont asks prayer for the reclamation of his wandering son; that a pastor of a dead and cold church wants the meeting to pray for the quickening influence of the Holy Spirit, etc., etc. One and another rises in the meeting to present special requests. Prayers limited to five minutes follow, until a quarter of one. Then a few words from the chairman touching on various requests, mentioning letters received containing grateful acknowledgment of answers received to prayers asked at former meetings. Then a hymn, the benediction, and the meeting separates for another twenty-four hours.

The conduct of the meeting for this long period of thirty-six years has been to Mr. Lanphier a labor of love. He counts it a rare privilege to have been permitted for so long a time to superintend this interdenominational work, and to have witnessed the cordiality with which Christians of every sect have united in worship and communion with God. Still more, he rejoices that through this meeting so many have come to realize the efficacy of prayer and to know that God is, and is the rewarder of those who diligently seek him. It has also been, on the other hand, a privilege to the Church throughout the land to have had at this centre a servant so painstaking and so faithful, serving their members in their hours of need, reading their letters, formulating their requests and seeing that they are presented to God in prayer. Such long service deserves a public acknowledgement and we should be glad to see a suitable testimonial presented to him now that in his old age he feels compelled to relinquish the service he has so long rendered to friends and strangers.

It is a great satisfaction to Mr. Lanphier, that in his successor, Mr. C. F. Cutter, whose portrait appears on the first page, he has a man likeminded who cares for the same things. Mr. Cutter is firmly convinced that the Christian man can and should be faithful to Christ in his business and that success in business is by no means incompatible with a conscientious discharge of Christian duty. He holds that in business no less than in the pulpit the follower of Christ may serve him faithfully and find opportunities of promoting the kingdom of Christ and winning souls for him. Mr. Cutter occupies a responsible position in the house of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, and has an abundance of business matters to occupy his attention, as every business man has in these days, yet he has cheerfully accepted this new duty, believing that strength will be given him to perform it faithfully. Like his predecessor in the presidency of the meeting, he has unbounded faith in prayer and brings to his work with the energy and activity of his young manhood a spirit of devotion and a desire to serve Christ by serving his fellow man which is an augury of success. Mr. Cutter is a native of Illinois. His father was one of the pioneers in that State, as other members of his family were in Iowa and California. He received his education at Phillips Academy at Andover, where he had the privilege of the tuition of "Uncle Sam" Taylor. He subsequently studied at Yale College, from which he graduated in 1875. He also took a course at Union Seminary and has had a law education. He is consequently thoroughly well equipped by study and mental training for the position he has accepted and is a conspicuous illustration of the fact that the highest knowledge and culture may be united with profound faith in Christ and Gospel truths.

At the meeting on Sept. 23, when Mr. Lanphier resigned his office to his successor, a large number of ministers and laymen attended. Many addresses were given by old friends of the meeting, recalling various scenes that had been witnessed within the walls of the old house, and many fervent prayers offered for God's blessing on the retiring veteran and his young successor. Mr. C. N. Crittenton spoke of the inspiration the meeting had given him in his rescue work in New York and on the Pacific slope. Mr. Huggins, who has been a frequent attendant from the beginning, told the history of the early years and related many incidents of answered prayer. Mr. Homer, who had been examining the records of the meeting, said that the meetings numbered 11,232, over 56,000 prayers had been offered, and the requests for prayer which had been sent in writing besides those made verbally in the meeting numbered more than 225,000. More than half a million persons had attended the meetings since they had been established. When Mr. Lamphier rose to address the meeting he was visibly affected. "Dear old Fulton Street," he said, looking around at its walls, "how I love you; I have come to say goodby and God bless you." The good old man's voice broke and he had to pause for a time while he controlled his emotion. Then he went on: "I commend to you my dear brother Cutter who succeeds me here. Hold up his hands; encourage him and cheer him in his work. He will need your help and your prayers." Then taking Mr. Cutter by the hand, the white haired veteran fervently prayed that God would bless him and give him great faith. The scene was a most pathetic one, and it will never be forgotten by any who witnessed it.

MORTALITY AMONG BOOKS.

RECENTLY, walking through the streets, I saw piles of neglected books for sale. Whether it be Asiatic cholera or trichina that has got among them, we know not, but most certain it is they are dying a hundred a day. The second-hand bookstores are the morgues where thousands of them are laid out. Many of them died after doing their work and their end was peace; but many of them from the start were afflicted with a marasmus that never allowed them to take a healthy breath. The mortality of novels is something fearful. Three-fourths of them never paid the expense of their publication. The entire enterprise was a dead loss. Most men need to publish one book in order to find what an expensive and unsatisfactory business it is in most cases.

I had a friend who had given birth to a religious poem. He thought it would rival John Milton's Paradise Lost and shake the nations. He kept the secret under lock and key for a long while, showing it only to a few special friends, and that under promise of secrecy. He grew thin in calculating at what time the world could best endure the exhilaration of the publication. At last the manuscript was in type and the proof read and the book put upon the market. He banqueted his friends on publication day in anticipation of a large fortune. He figured up how many would be sold. First, he calculated on disposing of 20,000, but as he reviewed the importance of the work and the fascination of the style, he put the figures up to 50,000. Afterward, bethinking himself that it was impossible to keep a rare thing on this side of the Atlantic and the certainty of its world-wide distribution, he concluded it reasonable to expect a circulation of 100,000. The fact was that of the first edition of 500 copies, 150 were sold, and the rest were given away. Its rivalry did not hurt John Milton's reputation a bit. My friend's experience was that of the man spoken of in the fourth chapter of Revelations: "I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up, and it was in my mouth sweet as honey, and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter." My friend died of chagrin.

We once had a cross old relative who believed in war because he thought the best way to reform the race was to keep killing it off. While we reject that theory we really believe that the epidemic among books is fortunate. If one half of the books which have been printed in the last thirty years had continued to live, our libraries and tables and bookstands would have been so crowded that the world would have had no room to turn around. If all the snow that had ever fallen continued lying on the ground we should have had banks of it reaching well on up to the moon; but fortunately the crystals melted. And the only reason that our way is not entirely blocked up by snow-storms is because, through the paper mills, the material soaks away. Long life to all good books and honorable sepulchre to those that die early.

A CARNIVAL OF CRIME.

DID you ever see a season so full of stories of theft and burglary and vagabondism and highway robbery and murder? What is the matter? Is it the dogdays giving to the human race canine paroxysm? Tramps on the road. Gangs of desperadoes on the streets. More Charley Rosses stolen. At noon-day, carriages stopped until the owner gets out and the ruffian gets in. Is it the hard times and no wages? No. The men who do such deeds would not work if they had wages of $5 a day offered them. Examine the character of these criminals, and you will find they did not work when times were thrifty. The only time they ever toiled was when they were in the penitentiary, and the overseer threatened them with protracted shower bath or extra hoppling. My opinion is that one cause of all this villany is the fact that public officials seem to fear these men will some day get into supremacy, and will all want to be either Governor or President. But why fear these men when the workingmen of the country hate them with a perfect hatred? Those men who have worked hard until they quite or nearly own their own house will never allow these outlaws to gain power in this country. Let the law be executed. Let the police become more vigilant. Let them break up these gangs of loafers at our street corners. If honest men are to walk the streets undisturbed and children to have safety in our parks and womanhood alone shall be as safe as womanhood with armed escort, it will be by the toning up of the courage of public officials. What we want throughout the land are more asylums for the support of people who are willing to work, but who, through invalidism or old age, are incompetent, and more work-houses, where the voluntary idlers and scapegraces of the country shall be compelled to work for the State, if they will not work for themselves. For these men who threaten to rob and burn and destroy, nothing is so well adapted as the old-fashioned whipping-post. These outlaws would like nothing better than a prison bunk, in which for three months to recline their laziness. Ordinary imprisonment for them on the part of government is a consent to pay the board and take in the washing of these miserable desperadoes. Some kind of physical chastisement is the only thing that will have a tendency to work their reform. Order we will have in our cities, and the men who have not the courage to execute the law must come down and take the position of private citizens. I have noticed that immediately after the officials of any city rouse themselves up to a rigid execution of the law, there come quiet Sabbaths, empty jails, and wide public equilibrium.

DANGEROUS LETTERS.

THERE is nothing more perilous than masked correspondence. So great are the rivalries in business that cipher telegrams are, to a great extent, unavoidable, if bargain makers between city and city wish to have any privacy of agreement or intelligence. So far, all is well; but I warn especially young men against the habit, more and more prevalent, of throwing mystery around their correspondence, whether by pen or telegraph. When people begin to go astray, look out for mysterious allusions and letters blindly directed and the insertion of fictitious names, and initials for signature, because initials are safer than the full name. As far as possible, cultivate frankness and outspokenness. Never put your initials to anything to which you dare not put your full name. When you have to watch the correspondence of others lest your own be mixed up and accidentally read, and you are tempted to write in an assumed hand, or to use ciphers when plain Anglo-Saxon ought to do as well, you are entering on dangerous territory. Ciphers are useful in telling New York what the Western markets indicate; but they are suggestive of evil when they are used either in matters of the heart or politics.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Framingham, Mass. In what battle did ten thousand soldiers lie under the river banks and let the other soldiers do the fighting and when did it take place?

Possibly some of our readers may be able to furnish this information.

Subscriber, Sigourney, Ia. How could James write against Paul? Would it not be one inspired writer against another?

If you compare the second chapter of James with the fourth chapter of Romans you will see that James did oppose Paul's teaching You will find also that the inspired Apostle Paul withstood the inspired Apostle Peter to the face and Paul states the fact plainly, adding, "because he was to be blamed." (See Galatians 2: 11.) The statements of the two men can be reconciled, but it is plain that there was antagonism between the men.

Thos. Lawson, Grayton, Mo. I see it stated that the interval between the two stages of Christ's coming may be three and a half or five or seven years; will there not be an interval of a thousand years between the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked?

Both statements are true. Christ will come into the air to summon his waiting people and those "who sleep in him." After a short period he will descend to the earth with them, to take vengeance on Antichrist and the living wicked and will reign as king on the earth for a thousand years in millennial glory. At the end of the thousand years the resurrection of the wicked dead and the last judgment will take place. That is the programme according to the New Testament.

E. E. Politi, New York. After the 144,000 Christians have been taken up will those remaining be the lukewarm Christians spoken of in Rev. 3: 16? Are there not more than 144,000 Christians in the world?

We expect that the Christians left behind will be so concerned by the removal of their brethren that they will become very earnest and will labor very diligently for Christ and will be the means of converting many. So far from being lukewarm they will be martyrs, dying by the sword or fire rather than renounce the faith. There are more than 144,000 Christians in the world, but not all Christians will be caught up in the rapture. It is a privilege reserved for those who are leading consistent lives, who are looking for Christ and waiting for him and have not allowed the world to have their affections.

E. L. G., Walmapital, Can. Does Hebrews 6: 4-6 imply that a child of God may finally be lost?

The expression "tasted" seems to apply not so much to the experience of a child of God as to those who are nearly but not quite converted. It is a common experience of ministers to find that there are none so difficult to arouse as those who in some revival were impressed, went through a period of anxiety, attained a temporary peace and then went back into the world. We know that is so, apart from the information of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. His statement that if some line is crossed, return is impossible, should never discourage us from effort to restore the backslider. There are many promises which assure a backslider of pardon and welcome if he will apply for them and they will be kept.

J. Henry Gardner, Philadelphia. 1. Does the statement of Paul in 1. Cor. 15: 8 mean that he saw Christ in the flesh? 2. Was not Christ in the flesh after his resurrection?

1. Paul refers in that passage to the vision he had of Christ on his way to Damascus when he was converted. This was six years after the ascension. If Christ had been on the earth, in the flesh, when Paul saw him, it is not likely that we should have had the record that the men who were with Paul at the time heard a voice but saw no man. (Acts 9: 7). It was a vision. 2. Jesus said after his resurrection that a spirit had not flesh and bones as he had, yet the descriptions of his appearances, coming in when the doors were shut, and appearing suddenly at places long distances apart at times when it would have been impossible to travel from place to place indicate that his body after his resurrection had powers which ordinary bodies have not. When it is said that Paul did not see Christ in the flesh, it is meant that he did not see Christ during Christ's natural life.

Subscriber, Burlington, N. C. What would be your advice to a young man who feels that he is called of God to do the work of an evangelist, whose eyesight will not permit a college course and who has not sufficient education to receive authority from the church, nor the means to complete a theological course?

To distrust the feelings, which often deceive people. The fact that the way is closed is a sufficient indication that God has not called him, because God does not call men to do impossibilities. If he holds himself ready to go in the event of the way opening he has done all that is necessary in the way of obedience to his supposed call. In the meantime we should advise him to labor for Christ among his friends and acquaintances and to speak for Christ when he has opportunity. For that work, which may be richly blessed, he does not need a college course nor the authority of a church.

T. M. Janeway, Indianapolis. How many current versions are there of "Rock of Ages"?

There are many various forms of Toplady's beautiful hymn. Hardly a line has been left in the original form. Here are some of the changes:

Toplady's lines:	Altered to:
From thy riven side. . .	. . . wounded side.
Be of sin the double cure. .	. . of sin and fear the cure.
Cleanse me from its guilt and power. .	save from wrath and make . . . me pure.
Could my zeal no respite know	no languor know.
Nothing in my hand I bring	In my hand no price I bring.
Foul I to the fountain fly	Vile I to the fountain fly.
When my eyelids break in death	. . . eyelids close . . .
When I soar to worlds.	. . . soar through tracks

The foregoing are only a few of the many instances of changes made by successive publishers.

Protestant, New York. Please inform me what authority you have for the statement in your "Mail Bag" (issue of Sept. 6th), to the effect that Peter was in Rome and was crucified there? The New Testament has not a word to say about Peter ever having been in Rome, and I have read many reputable Protestant authors who deny utterly that there is any proof of Peter ever having been there, much less of his having been Bishop of Rome, which is the pretention of Roman Catholics?

It is held as a settled point, by the oldest writers, that Peter went to Rome in the last year of his life. The statements of Eusebius and Jerome that the Apostle remained many years in Rome do not seem to rest upon accurate information. But concerning his actual visit there, there is no room for doubt. Clement of Rome, writing before the close of the first century, mentions it. Ignatius, in an Epistle to the Romans, refers to Peter in terms that show his special personal connection with their Church. Papias also refers to Peter's Roman experience, and Dionysius of Corinth writing to Soter, Bishop of Rome, in the second century, explains the intimate relations between the two churches by the fact that Peter and Paul both taught in Italy and both suffered martyrdom there. Irenæus bears distinct testimony to Peter's presence in Rome. Caius, the Roman presbyter, in the next century, also gives similar testimony and speaks of Peter's tomb in the Vatican. Besides, there is the additional evidence of Origen, Tertullian and the ante and post-Nicene fathers as to Peter's presence in Rome. None of those authorities mentioned, however, assert that he was the sole founder and head of the Church, as the Romish clergy contend. As to Peter's martyrdom, we may cite Origen, who declares that the Apostle himself chose crucifixion. St. Ambrose and Tillemont also give corroborative testimony.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

BRAZIL'S NEW REVOLUTION.

ONCE more the Brazilian republic is brought face to face with a revolution—the third since the downfall of the Empire. Nearly a year ago, the province of Rio Grande do Sul, which had never been considered entirely loyal to the new regime, revolted; but the movement was short-lived. This was followed by a demonstration against the government of President Peixoto by a portion of the Brazilian navy which, however, was speedily suppressed and its leader executed. The latest rising, which seems to include practically the entire naval and a portion of the land forces, is of so formidable a character that it is not improbable that the present administration may ultimately be overthrown. Admiral Mello, the commander of the insurgent fleet, has already bombarded the forts protecting the harbor of Rio Janeiro, and has effected a combination with the land insurgents near Santos. Notwithstanding several repulses, in all the fighting thus far the insurgents seem to have more than held their own. With the best of the navy, a portion of the army, and the provinces of Rio Grande do Sul and San Paolo supporting him, Admiral Mello has felt himself in a position to deliver an ultimatum, demanding the surrender of Rio, which would virtually mean the end of the Peixoto government; and failing compliance, he threatens to bombard the city and lay it in ashes. Even the loyalty of the Rio forts is doubted. Meanwhile, a panic prevails in the Brazilian Capital, and merchants and traders are fleeing inland. The cause of the rebellion is, in some respects, not unlike that which brought about the recent revolt in Chili against Balmaceda. Peixoto and his cabinet are accused of arbitrary, dictatorial and unconstitutional acts, which have neither the approval of Congress nor of the people. The immediate provocation was furnished when, in contemptuous defiance of the Courts, the government refused to release certain persons arrested on political grounds. When the release was finally granted in obedience to popular clamor, the press of Rio was outspoken in condemnation of Peixoto, declaring that an administration so conducted afforded no guarantee for the safety of the persons or property of citizens. This is only one of many similar instances of the arbitrary and despotic policy that has aroused the revolutionary feeling. There are many who believe that Mello's revolt is instigated by the deposed royalties now in Europe, and that his triumph would mean the restoration of the Empire. Possibly, the deposed royalties may have encouraged Mello to revolt; it is to their interest that the republic should be divided and disturbed. But Mello, even with royalist backing, would have little chance of success if Peixoto had given the people a just and wise government. His arbitrary and despotic rule has apparently brought them to a condition in which they are ready to accept a new ruler or return to the old ones. It reminds us of the parable Christ told of the house swept and garnished (Matt. 12: 43-45), except that Brazil did not keep her house empty when she had cleared it of royalist abuses, but suffered it to be occupied by a tenant who made as much muss as did the former occupant. It is so in spiritual matters; when the wicked man reforms his life, and the drunkard becomes sober, and the vicious man virtuous, every one rejoices; but the man is not safe unless he gives himself over to the rule of One who governs well and is strong enough to keep out the old or a new tyrant. (Luke 11: 21, 22.)

THE REVOLUTION IN BRAZIL.—THE CITY AND HARBOR OF RIO JANEIRO.

A Ghastly Cargo.

A derelict ship was brought to New York last week by the Norwegian steamer Breidablik, which has occasioned some surprise. The Norwegian found her near Cape Hatteras floating about helplessly. On sending a party on board, it was found that she had been deserted by her officers and crew. The log showed that she sailed from Alexandria on May 24, ninety-six days before she was sighted off Hatteras. Where she had been in the interval there is nothing to show. It was quite as much of a mystery why she had been deserted. The hull was in good condition and, except for the loss of a top mast and some of her rigging, she had suffered no damage. The cargo, however, was the matter which aroused the greatest discussion. It is composed wholly of rags and bones. A great portion of the latter are human bones and one part of the hold is filled entirely with human skulls. It is supposed they were collected in the deserts and cemeteries of Egypt and were shipped for use in fertilizing. The vessel and cargo were estimated to be worth $40,000. They will probably be sold to satisfy the Norwegian's claim for salvage. At present the health officers will not allow the cargo to be landed and it will have to be disinfected before it can be admitted. It is horribly offensive to the sense of smell as well as of sight. Apart from the cargo, a good price will, it is expected, be obtained for the ship as it is staunch and strong and when thoroughly cleansed of its present cargo can do valuable service. It is like some of the human derelicts, deserted by relatives and friends, degraded and dirty and with loathsome thoughts and habits, who are brought in at the Christian missions, who are capable of becoming under the cleansing power of the Holy Spirit, vessels for God's service of priceless value. (1. Cor. 6: 11.)

A Fortune-Teller's Dupe.

An extraordinary application to Justice Ryan in a New York Police Court last week elicited a curious story. The complainant was a dressmaker of rather sentimental appearance. She had summoned on the charge of non-support, a young man who is a clerk in a store. She said that the young man was her husband, but that he would not live with her nor support her. The young man said that he was not her husband and did not even know her name. Then she explained that she had seen the young man in the store where she went to make some purchases and had fallen in love with him at first sight. She consulted a fortune-teller as to the prospect of his returning her love and the fortune-teller had promised to help her. No progress was made with the strange courtship as the clerk seemed disconcerted by her singular manner when she went to the store and was under the impression that she was demented. Again she went to the fortune-teller who undertook for twenty-five dollars to assure her complete success. She paid the money and the fortune-teller put a ring on her finger and told her to consider herself the clerk's wife. She did so, but had failed to get an interview with him or to approach him in any way. She therefore applied to the court and received a severe reproof for her folly. The woman must have been very simple to suppose that she could, by a payment to another person, become a man's wife without his consent. Yet there are some people, who would despise her folly, who expect to go to heaven as part of the bride of Christ through their gifts to religious or philanthropic institutions, without seeking through faith in Christ the acceptance of God of their own persons. (II. Cor. 13: 5.)

A Sponsor's Despair.

A pathetic incident in banking circles is reported from Minneapolis. The unexplained absence from his post of the paying teller of one of the banks of that city recently, led to an examination of his accounts. It was found that there was a shortage of fifteen thousand dollars and it was then realized that he had absconded. The man most distressed by the discovery was the cashier of the bank. He went over the accounts personally again and again, hoping to find that the absent man was innocent. On Sept. 6th he remained after the bank closed until nearly dawn, checking the various entries and working over the books. Then when the fact of the defalcation could no longer be doubted, he sank into a mental collapse. He recovered sufficiently to go to his home, but a short time after his arrival there, he committed suicide. The distress which overturned his reason was caused by the fact that it was on his recommendation that the teller had been taken into the service of the bank and had been promoted from place to place, until he had reached the responsible office in which he had committed the defalcation. The cashier was in no way concerned in the loss, but he brooded over his protege's misconduct until his reason failed. Doubtless the defaulter will be astonished at the calamity when he hears of it. He probably had no idea, when he committed the crime, that his sponsor would feel the disgrace so keenly. Men often forget how heavily the consequences of their wrongdoing will fall on their friends and benefactors. The Christian, especially cannot do wrong without causing such innocent suffering. The Church and Christ, himself, have to suffer reproach when one who bears the Christian name goes astray. (Hebrews 6: 6.)

BRIEF NOTES.

From our stock of Oxford Teacher's Bibles we have thrown out a case into which a little dust had settled. They are perfect in every respect and are the same as those we used in our Premium Department. We will mail these Bibles, about 500 in number, at One Dollar each to such of our subscribers as may desire to avail themselves of this opportunity.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

CHRIST'S CONSTRAINING LOVE.

Preached last Sunday morning, Oct. 1, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: "For the love of Christ constraineth us." II. Cor. 5: 14.

IT is quite evident that some persons, perhaps famous teachers in Corinth, charged the Apostle Paul with being beside himself. Such a charge made against a man of his consuming zeal for the salvation of men is not surprising. The same charge was made against him by Festus, when he said, "Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad." Such a charge was made against our Lord by his friends and relatives, who "went out to lay hands on him, for they said he is beside himself." Often in the history of the Church since, worldly men and cold-hearted Christians have been ready to make a similar charge against those who were earnest in Christian work because of the love of Christ in their hearts. Such a charge is often the highest honor which can be conferred upon Christian workers. They are the only truly sane. Many who boast of prudence and wisdom in their devotion to the things of time and sense are really insane men; they, and not true Christians are the insane. It would be well for the world and the Church if a larger number of Christians were so inflamed with holy zeal as to merit the charge of being beside themselves. Men who live for this life alone, who live for the body and the world, forgetting God and eternity, must be considered in the sight of true Christians, of holy angels and of God as really insane. The Apostle Paul wishes now to show that he was influenced, in what seemed to his critics his extraordinary conduct, entirely by the love of Christ in his soul.

The Mighty Impulse.

There is a little ambiguity in the phrase, "The love of Christ," both in the Greek original and in the English translation. The phrase may mean, Christ's love to us or our love to Christ. The sense is to be determined by the connection in which the words stand, and by the nature of the argument itself. Here it is almost certain that the phrase means, Christ's love to us, rather than our love to Christ. We might translate it "For Christ's love constraineth us;" that translation would remove all ambiguity. A grammatical explanation, is given by Meyer who remarks, "that the genitive of the person after 'love' is with Paul always subjective." This commentator cites a number of passages which clearly prove that this is the usage of the Apostle Paul. The whole argument here requires this interpretation. The Apostle desires to show that only this mighty love could influence him in the conduct which led to the suspicion of his insanity. His remarkable zeal was because of this powerful impulse; he lived under the inspiration of this divine love. He shows further that Christ's love was revealed in his dying for all men. Nothing can be more certain than that he desires to emphasize Christ's love to us, rather than our love to him.

No translation could be more appropriate than the word constraineth in this connection. The original word means to hold together, to press together, to inclose, and then to urge, to impel, to excite. The idea is that of a forcible limitation, that of confining to one object. The argument is that he who rightly considers the marvelous love of Christ toward us, as seen in his death for us, must be bound to God by the strongest possible cord, must be inseparably held to Christ and to duty in his service. We have in these words examples of the apostle's careful forms of expression, of his wise choice of words, and of his masterly appeals to all that is tenderest in the human heart. The love of Christ was always with the apostle Paul the constraining and persuading motive. The infinite and eternal love of God, as seen in the self-sacrifice of Christ, binds us to God and his service with a threefold cord, which can never be broken.

This subject is appropriate for us to-day. This morning we commemorate in the ordinance of the Lord's supper the atoning death of the Son of God. In this ordinance we are reminded of his everlasting love. Here at his table we see the Lord of glory, as he was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities. He thought of us and ordained this feast in the darkest scenes of his earthly history. The cup of suffering was before him even in his hours of greatest earthly triumph. Surely our hearts to-day will be affected by the powerful motive which the apostle Paul here presents.

Proofs of His Love.

We may fittingly, at the outset, notice some instances of Christ's wonderful love. It was gloriously manifested in what he has already done for us. Language breaks down utterly under the effort to express the love of Christ for the children of men. To form any suitable conception of that love we would need to have a right appreciation of the number and nature of the terrible sorrows which he endured on our account; we would need to know more than the Christian ever will know of the terrors of that second death, whose sting he extracted on our behalf; we would need to appreciate the wonderful fact that he redeemed us from the curse of the law, by being made a curse for us. We know that he suffered without the gate that he might sanctify the people with his blood; that he made a full and everlasting satisfaction for the sins of those who receive him for their Saviour; that he is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. When we think of the enormity of our sin, we are led to say of Christ's sufferings, "Here is love whose breadth, length, height and depth surpass all human or angelic comprehension." There was no form of humiliation to which Christ did not stoop; there were no sufferings which he did not endure in bearing our sins in his own body on the tree. That we might have riches he became poor; that we might have a mansion in heaven he had not where to lay his head on earth. The Apostle Paul could say, "He loved me and gave himself for me." We know that he was made sin for us that we might receive forgiveness of sin. This wondrous fact will fill heaven's high dome with songs of praise and shouts of adoration. The redeemed will ever sing, "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood and hath made us kings and priests unto God, and his Father, to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen," and turning their faces to the throne on which sits their blessed Redeemer, as a Lamb that had been slain, they will strike as they chant, "Thou art worthy, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood." Compared with this love all other love is cold and dead. We know the love for their country of the brave Spartans at Thermopylæ, of Howard for his fellow men, as he dies of a fever caught in their dungeons, of the Moravian missionaries, who incarcerated themselves in a leper house to preach to the dying; but the love of Christ is to these as the light of the sun to that of the stars.

A Still Loftier Note

His love is shown by what he is doing now as our advocate in heaven. After discharging his duty as our Substitute he appears before God as our advocate. He has entered into the holy place to appear in the presence of God for us. He is now able to save to the uttermost, because he ever liveth to make intercession. In all the affliction of his people he was afflicted. There is no sorrow which can come to the hearts of his people, which he does not fully know, and in all their burdens he bears a full and personal part. Having suffered while on earth, he knows now how to sympathize although he is on his throne. He carried to the skies the marks of Calvary; and these wounds make effectual intercession for his people. Never was a Father's pity so tender as that of Jesus Christ; never was a mother's comfort so personal, precious, and healing as is that of Jesus Christ.

His love will be illustriously displayed in supporting his people in life and death, and in giving them a triumphant entrance into his kingdom. Before leaving his disciples he assured them that he was going to prepare a place for them. In his matchless intercessory prayer, which is the true Lord's prayer, he prayed, "I will that they also whom thou hast given me." His heart longed for the presence of his disciples. He desired to show them his glory with a fulness and blessedness impossible while he sojourned in humiliation on the earth. Heaven will be more heavenly even to Jesus because of the presence of his redeemed; and heaven would be impossible to the redeemed without the presence of Jesus. He will add them to

That Innumerable Throng

"who came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." He will fashion their bodies like unto his own glorious body. He will lead them to fountains of living water, and he will wipe all tears from their eyes. He will reveal to them the hitherto inexplicable mysteries of providence and grace; he will still be their great teacher as they sit at his feet in the celestial university learning the deep things of God. The reality of this glory almost oppresses us; in its contemplation reason staggers, imagination is overwhelmed, but love is enkindled, and adoration fills the soul with heavenly thoughts and divine peace. Here is glory unspeakable, joy ineffable, and bliss inconceivable. Even on earth it is true that "eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

We see now how this love ought to affect the hearts of God's children. It will surely lead them to rejoice supremely in Jesus Christ, and to say with the apostle of love, we love him because he first loved us." The eyes of unconverted men see no beauty in Jesus that they should desire him; to them he has no form or comeliness. There is nothing in his life of lowliness to charm the lovers of sin. They pass by the man of sorrows without true sympathy with his sorrows, or true penitence for their own sins. But we have seen "the King in his beauty." We know that there is no other object of love to be compared with him. With the apostle Peter we can say, "Lord, we have left all and followed thee;" with the apostle Paul, "I count all things but loss for of Jesus Christ my Lord;" with the apostle Peter again, "whom having not seen ye love, and in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory;" and with David, "thou art fairer than the children of men," "whom have I in heaven but thee." This is the language of every true Christian. The believer delights to think of Christ, to read of him, to speak of him, to hear of him and to take up his cross and follow him. He never grows weary hearing and studying the "things touching the king." It was said that French audiences would rather hear repetitions from Bourdaloue than novelties from another. It is certain that true Christians would rather hear of and from Christ than aught beside. To them there are new charms in his cross, his manger and his crown. Their heaven will be in being in his immediate presence forever.

Christ's love shed abroad in the heart will constrain men openly to confess him. As with the heart we believe in Christ, so with the lips we are to confess Christ. We are not to play fast and loose with Christ and the world. Men who are ashamed to own him now, he will be ashamed to own in the presence of his Father and the holy angels. We cannot have Christ as our prophet to teach us, nor as our priest to atone for us, except we have him as our King to command us. We must remember that he is a princely priest and and that God hath highly exalted Christ to be not only a Saviour, but to be also a King. All who cordially receive him will wish promptly to confess him. Our faith in the heart is not complete until confession is made with the mouth. The Bible knows nothing of any considerable company of secret disciples. It is utterly humiliating that men and women should strive to secure salvation without performing the duties which its possession implies and necessitates. Christians who are ashamed of their principles are Christians of whom their principles ought to be ashamed. The Pentecost believers confessed and were baptized; the eunuch confessed and was baptized; and Saul of Tarsus confessed and was baptized. Thrice shame on the cowards who would secretly secure pardon and cravenly refuse to acknowledge Jesus as their Lord and Saviour. Such persons have never truly received pardon; and such can never be owned at the last as the disciples of the Lord. It is said that on one occasion Napoleon standing before his troops asked for one hundred men to lead a forlorn hope. He frankly told them that every man would doubtless be killed the moment the enemy opened fire. Who would dare to respond to this call and die for his Emperor? Lifting his voice, Napoleon said, "One hundred men forward! Step out of the ranks!" Did one hundred men respond? It is said that the whole regiment as one man instantly sprang forward in solid line to obey. Shall Christ call and men refuse him, as the Captain of our salvation and the Redeemer of our souls? True Christian love will teach us to make any sacrifice for our faith and our Lord. We cannot serve God and mammon. We must break with the world; we must follow the Lord fully: we must love him more than father or mother. But his love makes obedience easy; his love cushions the yoke of duty, and makes it light and soft. This love is the mightiest motive known among men. As it led Paul to give himself without reservation to Christ, so it has led the Careys and the Judsons and ten thousand more, to give themselves, body, and soul and spirit, to the service of God.

The Constraint.

The apostle Paul in this text virtually says that the love of Christ has obtained and now possesses unlimited dominion over his soul. As he contemplated the freedom, the riches, the sovereignty, the immensity and the eternity of this heavenly love, he was lost in amazement. At times he was so transported with this blessed experience that he scarcely knew whether he was in the body, or out of the body, whether he was still on earth or already in glory. This love is the sublimest influence that can ever reach, fill, and dominate a human soul. When it surely possesses the heart a Christian will be constrained to do all he can for the spread of the Gospel. Christ has removed from him an exceeding and eternal weight of wrath, and has given him in its stead an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. When we become true believers we become eternal debtors. We are not our own but Christ's, who has bought us with his precious blood. This love is the true motive for all true missionary endeavor. It so fills the soul with its joy and peace that we cannot but tell to others the story of this marvelous, matchless and heavenly love. We become willing to endure any trial, to incur any risk in order that we may be the bearers of this message to those who sit in darkness. The idea that God should have given his only begotten Son to die, the just for the unjust, is such a revelation of God's love that it rebukes our selfishness and inspires every noble quality in the soul. It leads us out of the dark cellar of our own selfish nature and places us upon the house-top of our noblest selves, where we can feel the air of kindliness toward all men, and where we can bask in the sunshine of our Father's presence and love.

The Inspiration.

Every disheartened Christian should take fresh courage, because of the constraining love of Christ. There is no need that he sink into despair when this constraining love throws its mighty and gentle arms around him. Cold and dead must be that heart that does not respond to the wooings of this mighty love. Surely the man who remains indifferent to its call must have a stone and not a heart in his bosom. By that constraining love, as seen in the cradle, and in all the early life of Christ, as conspicuously displayed when he drank the cup of suffering in Gethsemane, and as it reached its highest point on the cross of Calvary, I beseech every unconverted soul now to yield to the claims, to obey the commands, and to accept the invitations of this loving Lord.

This love holds us in our station and duty as soldiers are held together under the banner of their country. Christ's banner over us is love. Under the inspiration of this love timid women have become heroines, and brave men have become braver still. It has made the dungeon, otherwise loathsome, resplendent and glorious; it has made the wheel and rack softer than couches of down. It has made the fagot and flame a triumphal chariot to bear noble souls to glory and to God. O men and women, yield your hearts to-day to this mighty motive. In life amid all its trials, in death amid its coldness and darkness, and in heaven amid its triumphal songs and peerless glories, true Christians can express the dominant motive, the controlling influence, and the inspiring purpose of their entire life by saying with the apostle Paul, "The love of Christ constraineth us."

PARENTAL INFLUENCE.

Home Association and Example Affect the Whole After Life.

UNHAPPY and undisciplined homes are the source of much iniquity. A good home is deathless in its influences. Parents may be gone. The old homestead may be sold and have passed out of the possession of the family. The house itself may be torn down. The meadow brook that ran in front of the house may have changed its course or have dried up. The long line of old-fashioned sunflowers and the hedges of wild rose may have been graded, and in place thereof are now the beauties of modern gardening. The old poplar tree may have cast down its crown of verdure and may have fallen.

You say you would like to go back a little while and see that home, and you go, and oh, how changed it is! Yet that place will never lose its charm over your soul. That first earthly home will thrill through your everlasting career. The dew-drops that you dashed from the chickweed as you drove the cows afield thirty years ago; the fire-flies that flashed in your father's home on summer nights when the evenings were too short for a candle; the tinged pebbles that you gathered in your apron on the margin of the brook; the berries that you strung into a necklace, and the daisies that you plucked for your hair—all have gone into your sentiments and tastes, and you will never get over them. The trundle bed where you slept; the chair where you sat; the blue-edged dish out of which you ate; your sister's skipping-rope; your brother's ball; your kite; your hoop; your mother's smile; your father's frown—they are all part of the fibre of your immortal nature.

Rascally and vagabond people for the most part come forth from unhappy homes. Parents harsh and cruel on the one hand, or on the other lenient to perfect looseness, are raising up a generation of vipers. A home in which scolding and fault-finding predominate is blood relation to the gallows and penitentiary. Petulance is a reptile that may crawl up into the family nest and crush it. There are parents who disgust their children even with religion. They scold their little ones for not loving God. They go about even their religious duties in an exasperating way. Their house is full of the war-whoop of contention, and from such scenes husbands and children dash out into places of dissipation to find their lost peace, or the peace they never had.

Traveler for eternity, with your little ones gathered up under your robe, are you sure you are on the right road, or are you leading them on a dangerous and winding bridle-path, off which their inexperienced feet may slip, and up which comes the howling of the wolf and the sound of loosening ledge and tumbling avalanche? Blessed the family altar where the children kneel. Blessed the cradle where the Christian mother rocks the Christian child. Blessed the song the little one sings at nightfall when sleep is closing the eyes and loosening the hand from the toy on the pillow. Blessed the mother's heart whose every throb is a prayer to God for the salvation of her children. The world grows old, and soon the stars will cease to illuminate it, and the herbage to clothe it, and the mountains to guard it, and the waters to refresh it, and the heavens to overspan it, and the long story of its sin, and shame, and glory, and triumph will turn into ashes; but parental influences, starting in the early home, will roll on and up into the great eternity, blooming in all the joy, waving in all the triumph, exulting in all the song of heaven, or groaning in all the pain, and shrinking back into all the shame, and frowning in all the darkness of the great prison-house.

THE MARSOVAN COLLEGE.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has received word from Dr. Herrick, the President of the American College at Marsovan, Turkey, that the promised firman for Anatolia College has not been granted, and that the permit to rebuild at Marsovan on the ot where the building burned last winter stood s withheld. The authorities have demanded a written pledge, before giving the permit, that he building shall not be used for church or for chool purposes, and the answer has been that he building was designed for a school. "It seems difficult to believe," says the Board, 'that the Turkish Government will violate its pledge, made to the United States Minister, to grant the firman for the college, and we cannot but think that our government will not brook much further delay in the matter. The case s a clear one. We have rights under treaties which cannot be ignored. In the meantime our work in Turkey is much impeded and our brethren need our sympathies and our prayers."

MARAH.

"Thou knowest, Lord, how weak and sick
The body is,—how dark and thick
The shadows lie across my soul,
And how I long to be made whole!
Thou knowest, too, how hard a thing
For Faith to lift her bruised wing,
When she has flown so far, so long,
Against the storm so fierce and strong."

Long prayed I thus with many a sigh,
Before he seemed to heed my cry;
"He knoweth," then the answer came,
And I feel sure he will not blame,
If sometimes, through my blinding tears,
Besieged by doubts, hard pressed by fears,
I fail to recognize my Lord,
And do not clearly read his Word. —"C."

AT NIGHT.

THESE human hearts of ours are prone to wander
Throughout the day from paths we know are best,
But when night's shadows fall each star fn yonder
Broad firmanent speaks silently of rest;

And leads us back by gentle, strong emotions,
Back to our God and holy ways once more;
And all our being seems submerged in oceans
Of love that stretch far out to Heaven's shore.

How sweet it is to turn back home at even!
Tho' late the hour, the Saviour lets us in.
Aye, soon or late, each heart will cry to Heaven,
Or soon or late will learn the curse of sin.

BY-AND-BY.

WHAT will it matter, by and by.
Whether my path below was bright,
Whether it wound through dark or light,
Uuder a gray or golden sky,
When I look back on it by and by?

What will it matter, by and by,
Whether unhelped I toiled alone,
Dashing my foot against a stone,
Missing the charge of the angel nigh
Bidding me think of the by and by?

What will it matter, by and by,
Whether with cheek to cheek I've lain
Close by the pallid angel, Pain;
Soothing myself through sob and sigh,
"All will be elsewise by and by.

What will I care for the unshared sigh,
If, in my fear of slip or fall,
Closely I've clung to Christ through all;
Mindless how rough the path might lie,
Since he will smooth it by and by.

Ah, it will matter, by and by,
Nothing but this—that joy and pain
Lifted me skyward, helped me gain,
Whether through rack or smile or sigh,
Heaven—home—all in all—by and by!

THE THREE RANKS.

The Types of the Classification of the Lord's People to be made at His Coming.

BY MISS A. M. BARBOUR.*

THIS question of the "First-fruits" is a most important, and a most precious one to God's beloved and blood-washed children, and it is a truth which in these "latter days," is occupying, as it well may, much of their thoughts and attention. Until comparatively recently, it was believed that when Christ came, he would take away all his own, the luke-warm and worldly Christians (providing they were but truly his) as well as the consecrated ones. But God, we believe, is teaching his children differently now, and the more closely we study our Bibles in the light of the Holy Spirit's revelation, the more clearly I think we shall see, that only the watching, waiting, faithful ones will be taken when our Lord first comes.

Now in Matt. twenty-five, we have three classes, three grades of Christians, spoken of and described—the Sheep, the Servants, and the Bride. Perhaps there is no animal that is endowed with less instinct than the sheep. Unable, if it stray away from the home in which it has been born and reared to find its way back, unless the shepherd himself goes out after it, searches it out and returns with it to the fold. Foolish sheep! Yet there is one thing the sheep can learn, one thing it can do—at least in the East, where the scene of the parable in the tenth of St. John was laid—it can learn to know the shepherd's voice, it can keep close to the shepherd's side. And as sheep, this is all that our Shepherd asks of us, all he expects from us.

Then there are the servants. Now there is a vast difference between the irresponsible sheep and the trusted and valued servant, one who understands his Master, has his interests at heart, and to whom he can entrust his most prized possessions with the certain knowledge that they will be well taken care of and thoroughly looked after.

Ah! let us not be content with merely being sheep. Knowing and loving our Shepherd it is true, and blindly following him, but not understanding his heart, with no appreciation of his character, not engaged in his service, never having woke up to the fact that we are saved to serve, and bringing our Lord and King no true return for all the wealth of love and blessing which he has poured out upon us.

Not to the sheep, but to the servant, will the sweet words of commendation be spoken one day—"Well done, good and faithful servant . . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Lastly, we come to the Bride. And just as there is a vast difference between the sheep and the servant, so there is a great distinction between the servant and the bride. The servant, no matter how valued and trusted he may be, can never occupy the place in the household that belongs to the Bride.

Now if we are content to remain sheep, and sheep only; if we have no thought beyond being just saved; if we have none of that holy ambition which characterized the Apostle Paul (see II. Cor. 5: 9, R. V. marg.); if we shrink from service, and are unwilling to be amongst the "overcomers," I know not how we may expect to be a part of the Bride. And think you it is possible to develop from the sheep into the Bride all at once? Methinks not. If we are too idle, too lazy, or too timid to enter into Christ's service down here, if we have cared so little about his interests, if we have been so estranged from him in will and purpose as to have no love for the perishing souls about us, no hunger for their salvation, or no desire to help his own poor, needy, suffering and ignorant ones, we never need anticipate occupying a seat which means so much

"If we suffer we shall also reign with him." And just in so far I believe, as we know what it is, to have fellowship with our Lord down here, and to have been drawn by his loving power into close and abiding communion with himself, shall we be fitted to occupy that position, that glorious seat—the highest which heaven itself can give.

"With me in my throne." Up beyond the blue canopy of space, away beyond these lower heavens up, up, further and yet further, where the dazzled imagination and dimmed eye can no longer follow somewhere up there, comes the whispered echo, clear and sweet—"With me in my throne." And yet not only do the unsaved, but even God's own beloved children, in alas, too many instances, "Turn away from this grand destiny of bliss and dream that they were made for this poor earth."

THE C IRISTIAN'S HOPE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 15. Rom. 5: 1-5; Phil. 1: 20-27.

IN declaring that the Christian's hope is one that maketh not ashamed, Paul states precisely what every man needs to know about a hope, before he entertains it. Man is a hopeful creature. He is constantly looking forward to some state, or condition, or prize, that he does not yet possess. He hopes that the burdens and restraints which now oppress him will one day be removed and he will be at liberty to enjoy himself in his own way. Such hopes brighten his life, make him patient in trial and hardship and cheerful under affliction. They encourage and stimulate him to effort and they nerve his heart to overcome obstacles. A hopeless man is a useless, as well as a miserable man. His work is perfunctory and his life dark and joyless. But not always are these hopes guests whom it is wise to entertain. Some hopes do make those who indulge them ashamed. Some are shameful in themselves, as when they are sordid or selfish or immoral; while of others a man is ashamed when he discovers that they are unattainable. To have indulged the former is a reflection on his purity and to have indulged the latter is a reflection on his sagacity. There is no surer index to a man's spiritual condition than the nature of his hopes. As a man hopeth in his heart, no less than as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. His hopes represent his conception of his highest good. They indicate what he would choose for himself if he had the power to fix his lot. Of all the many impulses and desires in his nature the one he would most like to gratify is represented by his chief hope. If his hope is for wealth, or pleasure, or power, or the gratification of the senses, or for spiritual attainment, or usefulness, there need be no doubt in any case as to the nature of the man. When we consider the Christian's hope, about which Paul writes, the contrast of natures is fundamental. His conversion is a begetting "unto a living hope." It influences his thought and conduct. "He that hath this hope purifieth himself." It gives him courage and fortitude in every period and state of his life. "Happy is he whose hope is in the Lord." And even when he comes to die, "the righteous has hope in his death." His bereaved friends are also comforted, for "they sorrow not as others who have no hope." This hope we are assured will never make a man ashamed, for it will be realized. In fact, unlike the hopes that are for this world's good, it falls far short of the realization. "Neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath grepared for them that love him." It is a hope based on experience. Tribulation and patience have preceded its birth and the love of God in the heart is the earnest of its fulfilment.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN CHINA.

An interesting letter from Minnie E. Wilson sent to the Epworth Herald, describes the conduct of a Chinese chapter. In the course of her letter she says: Epworth Leagues are not numerous in China, there being only two to my knowledge—one here in Hinghua, and one in Foochow; as to a girls' programme, this is the first we have heard of here, and were not our Christians whole-hearted, liberal-minded eople such a thing would be impossible, s the heathen Chinese women and girls are not supposed to be seen in public, much less heard. But since the organization of the league they have led the meetings and testified as Christians would at home.

One feature of the evening was the "Little daughter-in-law's soliloquy," being the life history of three typical girls—Hindoo, Chinese and American, beginning with their birth, and the welcome and unwelcome attending it; the next stage was that of five years old, when takes place the betrothal of the Hindoo, the foot-binding of the Chinese, the kindergarten of the American; then at ten years the marriage of the Hindoo, the betrothal of the Chinese, the public school life of the American; at sixteen the widowhood of the Hindoo, the marriage of the Chinese, the high school and college experiences of the American; and at twenty-five the grandchild of the Hindoo, the betrothal of the daughter of the Chinese, and the bethrothal and marriage of the American. It graphically portrayed the difference between the customs of heathen and Christian lands, and the comfort and blessing that come to the Hindoo and Chinese after they become followers of the true God.

A song, "Oh, Happy Rest," translated into Chinese for the occasion was sung by a number of girls. A calisthenic exercise by ten of the smaller girls was very well given, and much enjoyed by the audience, some of whom had never seen the like before. As I beheld the graceful dignity of the girls that evening I looked into the future and saw what Chinese women can and will be when Christianity gives them the station in life and home that God intends for them.

Refreshments of fruit, native cakes, sugared peanuts, and tea were served at the close of the meeting. The enjoyment of the Leaguers was not without its pathos; it was so new to them in that dark land though common to us.

THE B Y. P. U. SECRETARIES.

Our readers who belong to the Baptist Young People's Unions of the various cities will all be glad to have the portraits which appear on this page. Although the Secretary of any society or institution does not claim or receive equal honor with its President, his work is generally more arduous and his responsibility greater. The efficiency or non-efficiency of that officer has more influence on the welfare of the enterprise than has that of any other, and therefore any society that has secured a really earnest, methodical and genial man for the office deserves to be congratulated. As the Baptist Young People's Union has two such secretaries it is entitled to double congratulation. Dr. Frank L. Wilkins, of Chicago, is the General Secretary, and Mr. A. M. Brinckle, of Philadelphia, is the Recording Secretary. The Union has made the mistake of adding to the duties of the General Secretary, which must be sufficiently heavy in a Union comprising over five thousand Societies, the duty of editing the organ of the Union, a duty which can never be done properly by any man who does not give it his undivided attention. The results of this mistake are palpable to all critical readers but the fault is with the Union, not with Dr. Wilkins who must often be sorely pressed with the multiplicity and variety of his duties. As the Union is growing with phenomenal rapidity and its Founding Fund already amounts to a large sum, it will doubtless see the benefit to be gained by giving its overworked General Secretary all his time to devote to the legitimate duties of his office. His energy and devotion to the cause like those of his Philadelphia colleague are worthy of all praise.

Y. P. S. C. E. IN ENGLISH CHURCHES.

The representative councils of several denominations in England have taken action in favor of the Christian Endeavor movement, and it is significant that the strongest words of approval come from the various sections of the great Methodist body. Rev. W. Bainbridge, a member of the English Council reports these utterances to the Golden Rule and speaks enthusiastically of the prospects of the Society. The Conference of the Methodist New Connection, he says, has given the Society its imprimatur and the president, the Rev. Thomas Scowby, made reference, in his address to the Conference, to the spiritual characteristics of the Endeavor movement. The address of the Conference to the churches, written by the ex-president, gives prominence to the Society which "recognizes variety in endowments, in aptitude and attainment, and finds a sphere in which the talents of each may be utllized, amid the best conditions to secure success and commends the organization to churches that have not yet directed their attention to it."

The Annual Assembly of the United Methodist Free Churches—a large and influential community—also adopted Christian Endeavor pure and simple. The Free Methodist, the weekly paper of the denomination, remarks: "Among the decisions of the annual assembly which are likely to have far-reaching and blessed results, we place the one indorsing the Christian movement and directing that ministers shall be instructed to bring the matter before the various churches in their circuits. It was notable that the judgment of every speaker in the Assembly, who had practical acquaintance with the working of the Society, was not only favorable, but strongly so." The Congregationalists and the Presbyterians have heartily adopted the Society and the Synod of the Morav an churches unanimously passed a resolution "That in response to a resolution from the last national Christian Endeavor convention, addressed to all evangelical churches, this synod expresses its official and formal approval of the movement of the Y. THE LUMBERMEN'S CHAPTER.

Few people had any idea of the extent of the work done by the King's Daughters among lumbermen and miners until Miss Emma C. Nason read her paper on the subject in Chicago. The work it appears, commenced in 1889. Our first field, Miss Nason says, was Hurley, a mining town in the northeast corner of Wisconsin. This town had become a hotbet of dissipation. There the worst characters of America's sixty million people had gathered in fastnesses of vice. From there came those awful reports of iniquity too dreadful to believe, yet undoubtedly true, and the worst has never been revealed. The call to the rescue came as a voice from eternity. It sounded in our ears day and night until we could not sleep, and were willing to give our life for this mission. Hedged in by difficulties, without money, we prayed. Money came. A missionary was supported in Hurley. He sought the lost in saloons and dens of vice. Rescues followed. Gamblers and drunkards were amoug the saved.

This work at Hurley was only the gateway to a greater field. In two years thirty thousand people, mostly poor, largely foreigners, settled on the Gogebic Range. Nowhere did the population increase so fast as in Northern Wisconsin. Here in the vast pineries, hundreds of miles in depth, is our camp mission of Northern Wisconsin. This great army of woodsmen are banished from the sound of church bells and the comforts of home, and from saving influences, save as they are reached by camp evangelists. No congregations receive Gospel messages more gladly. No camp meetings in the world have been blessed with better results than these winter camp meetings. In occasional instances the whole camp has been morally changed. Hundreds of lumbermen and miners have professed conversion during the last three years. Many Bibles have been given away, 3,000 Testaments and Gospel literature in ten languages have been distributed.

Work on the magnificent new building which is being erected for the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago is being pushed with great rapidity. The finishing touches have been put on the towers, thus completing the exterior of the building. The plastering in those rooms which are to be occupied this season has been finished and the floors are now being laid. Other inside wood finishing is being done as rapidly as possible. It is expected that the association will be able to occupy its quarters in the new building by the 1st of November.

The Endeavor society has been adopted and endorsed by no less than eleven different evangelical denominations in the United States, by several in Canada, four in England and by as many more in the different colonies of Australia, while many other denominations which have not in any formal adopted the society have practically no other young people's organization in their church. The circle of the denominations which have adopted the Christian Endeavor society is constantly widening, an omen which augurs well for the practical co-operation of Christians the world around in future years.

Fijians at the World's Fair.

Picturesque People from the South Seas, who are both Musical and Warlike—Their Beautiful Country, once Cannibal now Christian and Progressive.

IF evidence were needed of the rapid advance of civilization and Christianity in the remote regions of the world, the unconvinced could not do better than to study the life in some of the villages along the Midway Plaisance at the World's Fair. It would have been well-nigh impossible, a quarter of a century ago, to have brought together such an aggregation of nationalities as is there assembled. The native African, the descendant of generations of savages, is next neighbor to the New Zealander, and the Polynesian, whose forefathers were painted cannibals. Contact with the Caucasian has both evangelized and civilized them, and has modified, yet without materially changing, their national customs and mode of life.

The thirty Fijians who, under the leadership of an old chief and warrior, are now sojourning at the Fair, are pleasing representatives of the South Sea native races. They are very musical, and fond of dancing; their voices are clear and resonant and their singing is not ungraceful. Physically they are among the finest specimens of manhood and womanhood at the Exposition, the men strongly built, war-like and graceful, and the women much handsomer than many of their dusky sisters from other parts of the world. The complexion is light coffee-color, not unlike that of some of our own Indian tribes. The quarters of the party are opposite the Javanese Village. They are domiciled in strongly-built huts, composed of stout timbers, and heavy thatched roofs, the whole sufficiently snug to afford shelter in stormy weather and abundant shade in the heat. Our artist has reproduced from the life some interesting types among the Fijian visitors. Those interested in aquatics will at once recognize in the native boat, with parallel pole on extended supports, the principle applied in the construction of the catamaran, which is not uncommon on our own coasts. The catamaran is a surf boat and its principal recommendation is that it does not capsize.

The Fijians are classed between the Malay and Papuan types of the negro race. Their native government is patriarchal and before the advent of Christianity they had many gods, and worshipped idols. Since 1884, they have been under British protection. There are several schools and a number of missionary stations on the islands, which are some 300 miles from the Samoan group. They are almost an earthly paradise in the abundance of of their tropical fruits and the luxuriance and beauty of their vegetation.

The Heart's Latch-String.

A young girl and her mother had been visiting a friend. As the lady was bidding them good-by, she said: "Now remember that the latch-string will always be out for you." "What did she mean, mamma?" asked the child, as they drove away. "Why," said her mother, "in old times, when people did not have door-knobs or locks and keys, they hung a string out of the door, and it was fastened to the latch, so that whoever pulled the string would open the door. If the family in the house saw any bad-looking person coming, they could draw in the string." "Couldn't we have latch-strings now?" the little one asked. "Not on the doors of our houses, but on the doors of our hearts," said her mamma. "Then if we see 'Naughty Words' or 'Wrong Thoughts,' or any other bad things coming to get in, we ought to pull in the latch-string and keep them out. But we will let 'Love' and 'Kindness' come in. Let us keep the door open for them always."

Home Cares.

One would imagine, writes Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher in Godey's, that there could be few departments in housekeeping where the time and skill would be so taxed as in dusting. Yet to some, this work, properly performed, is often one of the most disheartening of the housekeeper's duties. To teach our young daughters it calls for more constant oversight and repeated direction than almost any other work in which we are anxious to have them perfected. Yet in this case long and patient continuance in repeating the lesson wins at last. But not one in ten of our "hired help" ever dusts properly. They slip over and slight this work as if they say less danger of their negligence being recognized than any other portion of their duties.

Some are often very capable in the performance of almost any household labor allotted to them, but wretched failures in the simple labor of dusting a room.

We urge mothers to begin early to teach their young daughters how to dust a room peefectly, and by such thorough work to polish and rejuvenate the furniture and ornaments that add so much to the beauty of a home. Let them begin their first lessons by taking charge of their play-rooms and playthings, and knowledge thus gained in seeming play will increase each week in perfection, and prepare them soon to be valuable and efficient assistants to their mothers on a larger scale of work.

Mothers understand that there is a great difference in the children, even in one family; and that one child needs to be looked after and assisted in every step of her way toward becoming a practical, helpful daughter and woman, much more than her other children. This is often a heavy tax on the mother's strength, but love and patience will conquer in the end.

THE LITTLE ONES HE BLESSED.

I WONDER if ever the children,
Who were blessed by the Master of old,
Forgot he had made them his treasures,—
The dear little lambs of his fold.
I wonder if angry and wilful
They wandered afar and astray,
The children whose feet had been guided
So safe and so soon in the way.

One would think that the mother at evening,
Soft soothing the silk-tangled hair,
And low leaning down to the murmur
Of sweet childish voices in prayer,
Oft bade the small pleaders to listen,
If haply again they might hear
The words of the gentle Redeemer
Borne swift to the reverent ear.

And my heart cannot cherish the fancy
That ever these children went wrong
And were lost from the peace and the shelter,
Shut out from the feast and the song.
To the days of grey hairs they remembered,
I think, how the hands that were riven
Were laid on their head when He uttered,
"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

A PLEASANT JUVENILE EXPERIMENT.

"HOW can I see to the bottom of the river, or lake?" is a question that often arises in youthful minds. Now, it isn't so very hard a problem, after all. The young people will be pleased to know that the object can be attained by the use of a water-telescope, such as the Norwegian fishermen use to ascertain the position of herring shoals. It is made quite simply. Procure a tube made of tin, and funnel-shaped, about three and a half feet long and nine inches in diameter at the broad end. It should be wide enough at the top to take in the observer's eyes, and the inside should be painted black. At the bottom or wide end, a clear, thick piece of glass must be inserted. with a little lead in the form of a ring to weight the tube. When the instrument is immersed in clear water, it is astonishing how many fathoms down the observer can see. A great deal of genuine instruction and amusement can be gathered out of such an instument for young folks.

CHAPTER X.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION.

THE idea of Guy going to Spain or Italy for the winter was submitted to Geoffrey at a family conference at which Mrs. Dangerfield and Monk and Funk assisted. Yolante was not present, but she was interested and when her mother came out of the room she eagerly inquired: "Is he going abroad, Mamma?"

"I hardly know. Geoffrey Northesk does not seem to think it actually needful, if he takes common care of himself at home."

"I wish he would go," said Yolante. "I can't bear him about the place."

Mrs. Dangerfield looked up quickly and keenly. It was strange to hear her sentiments echoed so truly by her daughter. She felt that she was calculating his chances of life with a strange desire to hear that the mother's constitution was developing in him over the tough Dangerfield fibre, of which it had hitherto seemed to be made. She might hide all this from others, but it was becoming impossible to hide it from herself: and the knowledge that this was so, was slowly embittering her whole mind, and was degenerating it slowly and surely.

As for Yolante, she could hardly restrain the expression of her impatience at Guy's constant presence in the house, and had more than once asked him point blank what he was going to do, and how long he proposed, now that his education was complete, remaining a gentleman at large, a mere hanger-on of Monk's.

And indeed that same question was occupying a good deal of Guy's attention at this very time, and it was partly this which brought him to Fordingham one afternoon in Christmas week, when the wind was blowing softly from the southwest, and the thaw seemed to have set fairly in. He bent his steps towards the riverside house where Geoffrey Northesk lived with his sister, and upon the very threshold, he encountered Cicely, coming in from one of her rounds.

"Why, Guy," she explained, for by this time Guy had been received as one of the family by all who had known the other Dangerfields in their childhood, "I certainly never expected to see you here. Do you think you ought to be out, so far away from home?"

"O yes—I am almost all right again, thank you, and I have got leave to be out now that the wind has changed, I thought I would come over and have a chat with Geoffrey. I have not seen him for some days."

"No, he is very busy, but he generally comes in about this time from his long round. Come up and have some tea."

"It sometimes seems almost wicked to come in to such luxury, after all the things one has heard and seen during the day," she said, as she took off her hat, and unbuttoned her warm jacket, leaning back in an easy chair with the fire-light playing over her face. "One knows that there must be differences in the world, but it is sometimes hard to understand the how and why."

Guy looked at her with quick comprehension and sympathy.

"It is odd that you should have said that now."

"Why?"

"Because I have come to talk to Geoffrey on a subject somewhat akin. You know we do sometimes think at college about other things than books and games. Several of my greatest friends are men who are going to the pulpit. I have been thinking a good deal as to whether I should do the same."

"Yes?" Cicely looked sympathy and interest, though her words were few.

"I am too young yet—Monk thinks I hardly know my own mind. He would rather I took some other line: but he will end in acquiescing whatever I choose. I have no special bent for anything else. The question is, have I a call for that life. Of course, it is not one to be taken up quickly or thoughtlessly."

"Indeed not. But I do not think you would fall into that error, and earnest men are greatly wanted—even in this little town we feel it [illegible]

"You must not think of commencing anything serious until the warm weather is here," Geoffrey said when he came in presently and the project was laid before him. "You have overworked yourself and let yourself down, and it will not do to think of hard work or rough living until you are your own self again. You cannot work among our poor while in danger of taking chills and in fear of night air—and you ought to be very cautious to avoid those two ills, for some months to come. Think it over and wait till you are your old self: and then if you are still in the same mind I can promise you a warm welcome."

Guy's face brightened. He would have liked to commence at once, but saw the sense of Geoffrey's advice: and as did not take any serious or gloomy view of his own condition, being too young to understand that a hereditary tendency is rather a serious thing in such cases, he felt that a little patience would quite set matters right, and that having some definite occupation to look forward to in the future would help to make the time pass quickly.

He had a great admiration for Geoffrey, and when the young doctor told him that the rooms at the top of the house had long been vacant, and that their landlady was a very estimable woman, he could hardly be restrained for striking a bargain for them then and there, and when after some more chat, Geoffrey discovered that it was raining fast, and that the air was raw and chill, he resigned himself with real pleasure to being their guest for the night, as Cicely suggested, so that they could talk over the future and lay plans for his coming walk in life. A telegram was sent to Monk at the Park to set his mind at rest, and a very happy evening was spent in the riverside house.

Next morning was foggy and damp at the outset, and only cleared toward noon, so Guy did not get home very early, and when he did so he was at once pressed into the service of re-making wreaths for the church which on the morrow was to be refurnished for the new year.

Next day the hounds were to meet about five miles off, and as there had been three weeks cessation from hunting on account of the frost it was reported that the gathering would be large, and Monk was resolved to be present, as were also Yolante and Fulk; and Cissy. Guy would have liked to go, but was advised against it, and his own good sense told him he was better away. Moreover there were the decorations to be put up in the church, and he knew that Cissy would stay at home if there were nobody else to undertake the office.

"Never fear for the wreaths," he said, "I'll see to all that. You can go with a clear conscience, Cissy. I'll see to everything."

"And console yourself afterwards by another visit to Geoffrey," suggested Fulk, "as you two seem so uncommonly thick."

"Well, perhaps I will," answered Guy, who always met chaffing more than half way. "So if I don't turn up at night, you'll know where I am."

He saw the hunting party off, and spent the rest of the morning in finishing, with a little help from Humphrey, the work for the church that still remained to be done. He lunched with Mrs. Dangerfield, and immediately afterwards set off with his wreaths and flowers, and was seen no more for many hours by anyone at Dangerfield.

His aunt, as she chanced to pass along near the church that afternoon, saw Guy's face looking out from one of the belfry tower windows. She shrewdly suspected that he had finished his work, and had gone up there to explore. Almost immediately afterward Mrs. Dangerfield saw the sexton locking up the church, and toddling off to his cottage with the keys.

She paused, struck by the oddness of such a proceeding. Surely Guy had not had time to get down the stairs and leave the church? But if anyone was still inside why did the old custodian lock it up? Mrs. Dangerfield took a few steps in the direction of the old man's cottage, and then suddenly stopped short.

After all what reason had she to infer that Guy had been inadvertently locked in the church? There were more keys than those belonging to the sexton. The Rector had one, and so had Mr. Wydham, who was churchwarden. It would be absurd for her to trouble her head over such a simple thing. Certainly Guy was quite capable of taking care of himself.

So Mrs. Dangerfield walked tranquilly on—tranquilly at least as far as outward appearance went: but within a fire seemed to rage and burn, and she shrank from looking into her own heart to see what terrible thought she was cherishing there.

Not Guy's death—to do her justice she did not go so far as that: but she longed to have him out of her house—removed from the current of her daily life, taken away from the family circle, in which his presence was a constant mute reproach, so that she might once again breathe freely, as she never could do now.

She felt perfectly certain that a winter's night passed in the dank chill of that unwarmed church would not fail to leave its impress Guy could not stand such exposure with impunity, and it would take only a little more delicacy of lung to induce the doctors to order him off forthwith to the south of Europe for this and perhaps many succeeding winters. She wanted to get him out of the house—out of her sight, and out of danger of any contact with those vindictive Stapletons, of whom she stood in some awe, though she could hardly have said why. She knew that they could not know her secret, and yet from the rumor that sometimes reached her ears she knew that they still cherished the hope of seeing Guy reigning at Dangerfield, and she felt like one who walks by the crater of a volcano.

It has been truly said that it is the first step that costs, and Mrs. Dangerfield had taken the first step long years ago, when she had locked away the old Bible, and with it the secret of Guy's true age. Then, when this next temptation of another kind met her face to face, it did not seem hard to yield to it also. It troubled her less than she once would have deemed possible, for her conscience was growing seared, and the power of evil within her had dominated her will so long and so often that she yielded herself a willing slave to the promptings of its beguiling voice.

With steady and even steps she walked home, a sense almost as of triumph in her heart, and she settled herself in her cosy drawing-room, to await the return of her children without allowing herself to dwell upon the thought of what was passing within the walls of the lonely church, situated so far back from the road that it was most unlikely any shout from within its walls would arouse the attention of a chance passer-by. It did not stand upon the man road, and there was little traffic in the lanes after dusk.

About five o'clock in came the riding party, splashed and hungry, and in excellent spirits after a very exciting day with the hounds.

"And where is Guy?" was Monk's inevitable question, as soon as they had related a few of their adventures.

"I have not seen him since he went to the church," answered Mrs. Dangerfield quietly. I have not been troubling myself about him."

The subject dropped then, and the evening passed as merrily as usual. Monk's prognostication as to the weather proved right, for Fulk who went to look out at ten o'clock reported a stinging frost, and the wind setting into north east. Mrs. Dangerfield heard the news with a certain contraction of the brows: but she had tied her own hands and could not speak now, even had she wished, which she was not certain that she did.

So Guy was left to his fate and might have remained all night in the cold church in that bitter Christmas weather, but for a fortunate accident. From the churchwarden's window his daughter Geraldine looked out about midnight and saw a light in the church. She aroused her brother who went to the church to see what brought anyone into the building at that hour. Guy was released and as he was coughing badly, was hurried to the churchwarden's house and warmed and made comfortable for the remainder of the night. In the morning he breakfasted without much appetite and then made his way home.

As he walked into the hall, in which the houshold had assembled as they often did during the early part of the day, a good many questions were showered upon him, and he had barely time to note the strange gleam in Mrs. Dangerfield's eye as he made his greeting, and wonder what brought it there.

But there was a fine sensation produced when he really did tell what happened to him. Monk whistled below his breath, and began abusing all the church authorities for what was certainly not any fault of theirs, whilst Cissy looked anxiously at Guy, and Fulk curiously at their mother.

There was to be a dinner party at the Park that night, and Guy dozed away the hours with Humphrey, trying to convince himself that he was none the worse for his night's adventure.

"I suppose you can't let me off to-night, Yolante," said Guy's voice at her door, as she was putting the finishing touches to her dress.

She opened it, and heaved a sigh of relief to find that he was dressed, despite this appeal.

"No, indeed we can't. It would throw the table all wrong, and we should be thirteen, which is out of the question. Why do you ask. You look all right. Are you very tired?"

"I've got a bad headache, and feel a bit seedy, but I'll come if I'm wanted—anything to be useful."

They went down together, and the guests began to arrive. The story of Guy's last night's adventure had got whispered abroad, and everbody was anxious to learn the truth of it. When the ladies left the table, Geoffrey, who had risen with the rest, crossed the room and took Geraldine's vacated chair by Guy and soon afterward the two went out together.

Yolante was not pleased when she found that Geoffrey was not forthcoming after dinner because Guy had captured him and taken him off somewhere. But she could not say anything then, and made the best of her evening without him. It was only when everybody else had gone that Geoffrey appeared again, and then with rather a grave look upon his face. Monk caught the look at once, and his face contracted.

"Nothing wrong with Guy, I suppose? Don't be a croaker, Geoffrey."

"Better croak in time than too late," was Geoffrey's answer. "Guy is in bed, and there he will have to stay until I give him permission to get up. I thought that would be the end of the fine escapade your guests were laughing at so heartily at table just now. I suppose it was a series of unlucky blunders that no one could foresee: but it does seem as though some amongst you might have known enough of his movements to institute inquiry when he was missiug after dark."

Fulk looked at his mother—he could not help it—and he saw the very slight contraction of her features. Again he was possessed by that uncomfortable feeling that there was some kind of mystery behind which he could not penetrate. It was his voice that asked what was the matter with Guy,

"There is a distinct inflammation of one lung, and a good deal of fever. I hope to save the other, but his chest will not stand liberties. You might give an eye to him to-night, Fulk—you know enough to be of use. I think he will sleep—he is so dead tired."

Fulk nodded acquiescence. He made no display of his feelings, but all the same he was very much attached to Guy, and doctoring and nursing were not distasteful to him.

Mrs. Dangerfield looked up and spoke rather incisively. "If Guy is so very delicate, it is a great pity for him to stay in England. The Riviera is the place for delicate lungs, and if Guy were my son he should go there at once, and return a new man after a residence there."

"Well," said Monk, "if that's what it all means, and the poor old fellow wants another climate than this, we'll start off to-morrow with all my heart. But I believe in home for fellows who want looking after."

"And," said Geoffrey, "there is no option. Guy could not travel now, nor for some weeks to come. When he is on the road to recovery we must discuss what is to be done."

Monk looked rather relieved. He hated the idea of leaving the country: but it had not yet occurred to him that Guy could go without him. Mrs. Dangerfield let Geoffrey depart, and Yolante, who hated discussions about Guy, go to her room, and then she turned to her son.

"It is time for you to realize, Monk, that you and Guy cannot always be together. Your place is now here, where your duty imperatively demands you to remain. If you sacrifice that for a boyish freak you will stand a very good chance of utterly blighting your prospects in life. You have a happy future stretching out before you, and you have only to put out your hand to take it. But believe me, my boy, when I tell you that no woman will stand being in the second place: and if ever you mean to think of marriage, you must learn to look upon Guy as no more and no less than an ordinary cousin. To go on as you are doing now is simply to court ridicule and unhappiness."

And without waiting to see the effect of her words, Mrs. Dangerfield swept quietly from the room.

HENRY VARLEY IN CHICAGO.

The Celebrated English Evangelist Gives His Impressions of Religious Work in the Exposition City—Mr. Moody's Gospel Campaign.

THIS is a great city! Situation, prospect and climatic conditions are all elements of power in Chicago. Her position takes hold at the centre of a confluence of influences. Commercially, she must increase. Rapidity of growth is her danger. The people rush on in an intense and unhealthy excitement. A careworn and premature age marks the countenances of masses of the people, and is removing them further and further from the handsome contour of well-developed and useful men and women. This "beating the record" spirit threatens a disastrous success. Having distanced in architecture, in commerce, and in mass of population all other of the State cities, New York herself is seen ahead, and is to be raced, caught up to and surpassed. The question whether the evolution of a city of two millions of people, excited, reckless and engaged in a neck and neck race on the lines of keen competition, will yield desirable and healthy results is not thought of. The aggregations of human life in our English cities are not yielding results which indicate social or national prosperity. The rural and suburban populations furnish our highest types of physical strength and beauty, as also the normal glory which belongs to home and family life.

MR. HENRY VARLEY, EVANGELIST.

It is impossible, however, not to admire the marvellous enterprise of the people. The city not yet thirty years old since the time the great fire laid it in ruins, tells of expenditures fabulous in amount, and on the score of time, buildings seemingly impossible of erection. The massive piles of elaborate structures devoted to Chicago's giant commerce I have never seen surpassed. From eight to sixteen stories high and used in their vast capacities from cellar to topstone, these stores are second to none throughout the earth as illustrating an enormous commerce.

Mr. Moody's Meetings.

I have not yet seen the Exposition Buildings, the scene of the World's Fair. Should time serve in the midst of this great evangelistic session, I will send you some account of it; but I write you first my impressions of the work initiated and carried on by that centre of evangelistic energy, D. L. Moody.

It was a bold conception to make the six months of the World's Fair the occasion for preaching the Gospel to the largest company probably that ever heard, in a great city, the word of Life. The ministers as a whole were in fear and regarded the campaign as Quixotic and Utopian. Not so our honored brother, who in dependence upon the Lord, and using with marked sagacity and common sense, went courageously forward. I am not writing to criticise the ministers, for when we take into account the heat of summer and the absorbing interest of the greatest Fair the world has ever seen, it is not matter for wonder that they feared to inaugurate the campaign. But the campaign was inaugurated and has challenged and secured the attention of hundreds of thousands of the residents in, and visitors to Chicago. Despite the silence of the daily press and the crowding out of him who is Lord of all, his power and glory have been manifested wondrously. It is still true "he cannot be hid." "The Light of the World" shall not be voted out even by the World's Fair Committee. The battle has indeed, been carried to the gates. Some idea may be formed of the widespread interest which exists when I state that the week just closed gathered from 55,000 to 60,000 people to twenty different centres in which the needed and adapted Gospel of Christ has been heralded and taught.

The great central building where we all live and rally is the Bible Institute. I question whether the energy ability, devotedness and unity of hearts which exists here was ever exceeded. As the waters in Ezekiel's visions flowed out, so here, literally, truth, zeal and energy for God and man pour forth from a hundred living springs. Here there are about three hundred students. The impress of the beloved leader marks the majority, and Mr. Moody appears, under God, to have engraved upon these young men and women who for more than four months have carried on this great and holy war, the motto, "Out and out for Christ,"—the favorite motto of one of our brothers here. What a magnificent training for Gospel ministry!

A Great Evangelistic Gathering!

Then there are present about thirty leading ministers and evangelists. There are amongst us Pastors Stoecker of Berlin, John McNeill, John Robertson, A. C. Dixon, R. A. Torrey, Drs. Riddell, Wharton, Goodwin, Majors Whittle and Cole, besides the tent worthies, Merton Smith, R. Atkinson, Fred Schiverea, and others whose names I cannot recall. We make long days. Days of prayer, sowing, service, testimony, teaching, and "bringing in the sheaves." It is a bright, joyous, company which gathers every night in Mr. Moody's room. He is leader in the war with his eye upon the man with the drawn sword who is Captain of the Host. From about 10-15 to 11-40 P. M., we come in and report progress and discuss America's huge water-melons, and afterwards go to sleep without a grain of desire for Egypt's leeks, onions, or garlic. They are good times we are having and no mistake. Walking in lowliness before our gracious Lord, I venture to think no brighter days for evangelization ever existed than are found in Chicago now.

I should not have found time for this letter but there is something in the air which comes from Lake Michigan that induces hoarseness to nearly all public speakers, on their first arrival, and I unwillingly am unable to speak without difficulty till my voice is restored. The first week, through Mr. Moody's kindness, I spoke of Christ Jesus to fully 15,000 people. Sunday Morning, 3,000 crowded the Haymarket Theatre at ten o'clock to hear our leader. The doors had to be closed, as many being shut out as were found inside. A quarter of a mile distant, I was preaching in Standard Theatre to 1,700 people, and John McNeill at the Central Music Hall to another crowded house numbering 2,500. The afternoon and evening saw even greater companies thronging the twenty different buildings and tents devoted to the living God through the band of workers gathered under brother Moody.

The Power of Gospel Song.

The power of Gospel song and the virtue of the old, old story of God's great love exhibited in Christ Jesus is seen here and I joyfully testify to the fact. Our brethren—Stebbins, Towner, Burke, McGranahan, and Mrs. Pierson, are capital leaders in the service of song. The choirs sing admirably, and some young men render valuable help in the same attractive ministry. Sunday evening, I had the joy of preaching for Dr. Goodwin. I was not aware that the Lord would so soon grant me the honor of standing with the noble man whose heroic exhibition of the Gospel of Christ in London a few months since had endeared him to the hearts of thousands. All honor to the brave who will not bow the knee to the cultured criticism which presents another Gospel, or in my judgment, at least, a misrepresentation of the Word of Life. It would do some brethren good to see here the power of the Gospel of the Grace of God.

Monday following we had the first of the great Central city prayer-meetings. The Central Music Hall, taken till the Fair closes, is right in the heart of the city. Two thousand people crowded the floor and first gallery of the spacious auditorium and Mr. Moody presides. Songs of praise, prayer, and addresses continue till about 12-15; Rev. John McNeill preaches and teaches the exalted Christ. The meetings are bound to grow. More prayer, power, and zeal—the fruit of communion,—indicate the course mapped out. We are of one heart and mind, set for the preaching and exaltation of him whom God hath raised up, and sent to bless the sons of men in turning every one from his iniquities and bring by his power into the glorious relationship of the sons of God.

The Failure of Sunday Opening.

There is one item that deserves to be heralded to the ends of the earth. Amongst the other "booms," the exhibition was to know a "Sunday Boom." The law was against it, but the World's Fair Commissioners secured practically the repeal of the law which prevented the opening of the exhibition on Sunday. Meanwhile a petition against the opening was brought in from various parts of the States (the largest ever signed, numbering millions of names.) The law has been practically set aside and broken, might triumphing over right for greed of gain and ungodly license.

And now mark the result! The judges have stood up for the overthrow of the closing law. The Fair has been opened on Sundays according to the decision of the judges, but this great people have not gone and will not go! I quote the actual average figures to illustrate the position of those who said that America wanted Sunday opening:

Saturday, Sept. 2,	paid admissions	152,063.
Sunday, Sept. 3,	" "	25,439.
Monday, Sept. 4,	" "	121,851.

The Sunday opening is a deserved failure. A few thousands attend, but not enough to meet the expenses entailed by opening. Thank God for this noble protest against the lawless judges and commissioners who would unjustly destroy the sanctity and glory of the day of rest! Sound this glad fact throughout the world! The American people's voluntary defense of the day of rest and home and God!

If my pen can overset my temporary disability to speak, my silence shall serve him!

Yours faithfully,

Chicago, Sept. 7, 1893. HENRY VARLEY.

THE old age of good men is often a beautiful spectacle. They show us the example of a mellower wisdom, a larger tolerance, a sweeter temper, a more unselfish sympathy, a clearer faith. The setting sun of their bright day tinges even the clouds which gather round it with softer and more lovely hues.

We cannot say this of David's age. After the oppressive splendor of his heroic youth and manhood there was no dewy twilight of honored peace. We see him in a somewhat pitiable decrepitude. He was not really old; Josephus says that when he died he was only seventy years old. He had reigned seven years and a half in Hebron and thirty-three years in Jerusalem. At the age of seventy many men are still in full vigor of strength and intellect, but the conditions of that day were not favorable to longevity. Solomon does not seemed to have survived his sixtieth year; and it is doubtful whether any one of the kings of Israel or Judah—excepting, strange to say, the wicked Manasseh—attained even that moderate age. Threescore years and ten have always been the allotted space of human life, and few who long survive that age find that their strength then is anything but labor and sorrow. But the decrepitude of David was exceptional. He was drained of all his vital force. We are surprised at such total failure of life's forces. But David had lived through a youth of toil and exposure, of fight and hardship, in the days when his only home had been the dark and dripping limestone caves and he had been hunted like a partridge on the mountains by the furious jealousy of Saul. The sun had smitten him by day and the moon by night, and the chill dews had fallen on him in the midnight bivouacs among the crags of Engedi. Then had followed the burdens and cares of royalty with guilty anxieties and deeds which shook his pulses with wrath and fear. Coincident with these were the demoralizing luxuries and domestic sensualism of a polygamous palace. Worst of all, he had sinned against God, and against light, and against his own conscience. True he was forgiven, but he must have found it terribly hard to forgive himself. God gave back to him the clean heart, and renewed a right spirit within him; but the sense of forgiveness differs from the sweetness of innocence, and the remission of his sins did not bring with it the remission of their consequences. From that disastrous day David was a changed man. It might be said of him as of the Fallen Spirit:

> His face
> [illegible] and entrenched, and care
> Sat on his faded cheek.

The Nemesis of sin's normal consequences pursued him to the end. Dark spirits walked in his house. Joab knew his guilty secrets, and Joab became the tyrannous master of his destiny. Those guilty secrets leaked out, and he lost his charm, his influence, his popularity among his subjects. He was haunted by an ever-present sense of shame and humiliation. Joab was a murderer, and went unpunished; but was not he too an unpunished murderer? If his enemies cursed him, he sometimes felt with a sense of despair, "Let them curse. God hath said unto them, curse David." His past carried with it the inevitable deterioration of his present. In the overwhelming shame and horror which rent his heart during the rebellion of Absalom, he must often have felt tempted to the fatalism of desperation.

Curses in his family, a curse upon his daughter, a curse upon his sons, a curse upon himself, a curse upon his people—there was scarcely one ingredient in the cup of human woe which, in consequence of his own crimes, this unhappy king had not been forced to taste. But among all the "sad stories of the deaths of kings," none ends a purer glory with a more pitiful decline than the poet-king of Israel, whose songs have been to so many thousands their delight in the house of their pilgrimage. Truly David's experience no less than his own may have added bitterness to the traditional epitaph of his son on all human glory: "Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity."

Dreams and Prophecy.*

DREAMS have interested the children of men in all past ages principally, not for their imaginative qualities, nor for their naturalness and vividness, but for the prophetic meaning ascribed to them. History is full of famous dreams, poets have often used them as a powerful motive, and, to be frank, who of us have not thought over a dream, to whom has not the thought come whether this or that dream may not have some meaning? The subject-matter of the dream is of little consequence. The main thing is how deeply our emotions are engaged. A dream in which we revel in masses of gold and precious stones causes but a smile at most when we awake. But when in a dream we pass by our own grave, and see a future date inscribed upon the head-stone as the date of our death we must be very sordid or very much preoccupied if it does not appear to us as a warning prophecy. And very self-possessed must we be if we can look forward to the date without a certain terrifying expectation.

Any one, too, may convince himself of the deep hold which dreams not particularly affecting the emotions have upon one. An elderly gentleman related to me the following dream: "I thought," he said, "that I was at the Court of St. Petersburg. His majesty, the Emperor of all the Russias, conversed intimately with me about the Russian troops, calling my special attention to the difference in arms between the Russians and Germans. While we were talking, a gentleman covered with orders approached me from the brilliant circle of courtiers, or rather he hopped toward me in a ridiculously impossible way, and said: 'You must not address His Majesty, but must wait until spoken to.' I disposed of this individual summarily by saying that I understood that very well, but that it was doubtless permissible in a dream. All laughed. I laughed too, and awoke, and the childish scene made so strong an impression on me that I continued to laugh, and could not control my hilarity for at least half an hour. Still more during the whole forenoon, though engaged in business, I could not get rid of the sight or at least of the memory of the bright yellow buttons on the uniforms of the Russian soldiers." In this case there was undoubtedly entopic vision in question, and probably local excitation of the center of the brain which affected the risible muscles.

Easily excitable persons dream more vividly and are more affected by dreams after awaking than do cool, critical, calculating natures. Children and women dream more vividly than men do. The people of the Orient with their lively imaginations pay more regard to the "interpretation" of dreams than do the cooler people of the West. There the interpretation of dreams was reduced to a system, a regular, psychological method. The dream interpreter enjoyed a high distinction. He must be a highly gifted, learned, and pious man. Knowledge of the human heart and of physiognomy were the chief requisites together with a gift of fine sounding, ambiguous speech and imposing demeanor. Other matters, too, had to be taken into consideration.

A "College by Mail."

Miss Mary L. G. Petrie, B.A., and her Philanthropic and Literary Work—A Remarkable Experiment in Bible Study.

HIGH on the list of self-sacrificing Christian women, stands the name of Mary L. G. Petrie, a young Englishwoman, whose remarkable talents have been consecrated to the service of the Master and who has wonderfully succeeded in an altogether new field, which she has opened up for herself. Miss Petrie enjoyed the blessing of a pious ancestry. Her grandfather, Commissary-General Petrie, was the friend of Count Guicciardini, and in the early part of this century distributed Bibles among the people of Italy. Her father, Colonel Martin Petrie, now dead, was a faithful servant of his God and of his country. He took an active interest in philanthropic work in London. Her mother was Eleanora Grant Macdowall, one of the Macdowalls of Gartland, Scotland.

MISS MARY L. G. PETRIE.

In 1880, Miss Caroline Cavendish founded the English Christian Women's Educational Union, with the two-fold object of "raising the intellectual standard of religious education and bringing definite religious influence to bear upon higher education." Mrs. Petrie was one of the original members of this union, and in consequence of a suggestion from Miss Cavendish, her daughter Mary undertook to give aid in study to two or three girls who were unable to avail themselves of professional teaching. This informal correspondence class was mentioned in the weekly press in 1881, and the result was an avalanche of letters from all parts asking for the proffered aid.

Meanwhile, Miss Petrie was a very busy woman with her private studies. In 1883 she took her degree with honors in classics, modern languages, mental and moral science, English literature and history. She also won numerous prizes at University College, London. She was the first woman to gain the scholarship in philosophy and logic. She then began to devote her entire leisure to the "College by Mail," which she soon organized on a complete working basis. It seeks to promote the systematic study of Holy Scripture, as well as to give secular instruction to girls over sixteen years of age. All the teachers give their services gratuitously; the students have no expense save a nominal sum to defray postage. There are at the present time over 3000 students, each of whom devotes half an hour daily to Bible study, and may join one or more secular classes. The staff consists of over 200 ladies, many of whom have had a University education, and all of whom are well qualified for the position they hold. Both students and teachers are in direct communication with the president, and none but those who have been with Miss Petrie in her study can have any idea of the enormous amount of labor involved in the undertaking. Sixty out of seventy Scripture classes have taken up a "Chronological Scripture Cycle." A scheme for reading the Bible through chronologically in three years, was originally worked out by the president, in a set of twelve pamphlets for the use of the College. Within a short time 3000 of these papers had been subscribed for, not only by the students, but by others who wished to follow out the scheme at their leisure. So numerous were the requests for them, that on Dec. 20, 1892, the complete course, revised and enlarged, was published in the volume, Clews to Holy Writ. One of the latest additions to the College is a class to study the Expansion of Christendom. The papers prepared by the president, include a sketch of missionary history from the Day of Pentecost to the present time, illustrated by the lives of great representative missionaries.

Miss Petrie is shortly to be married, but she will continue to conduct her "College by Mail," although the scene of her labors will probably be transferred from London to Montreal, Canada, where her future husband, Prof. Carus-Wilson, is connected with the McGill University.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have treated its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) A CITY OF TEMPLES AND IDOLS.

Beautiful Madura, Once a Royal Capital and a Centre of Hinduism, now a Focus of Christianity—The Work of the Madura Mission.

A REMARKABLE illustration of the growth of Christianity, under most adverse conditions, is found in the mission work now going on at Madura, India. This ancient seat of the Pandiar kings, who ruled over a great part of India from the fifth century before Christ to the end of the eleventh century of our era, is a district crowded with palaces and temples. The city of Madura, the largest in the district, is the fourth largest city in the Madras Presidency. Among its celebrated structures are the "Hall of a Thousand Pillars," the famous palace of Tirunialai Nayack, and the "Vasantu" or "Pathu Mantapam," which is said to have been built as a summer retreat for the god Sundareshwara, one of the many forms of Siva. The city was in ancient days, not only the capital of a kingdom, but the centre of South Indian culture and learning, and a stronghold of Hinduism.

The Madura Mission, which is under the control of A. B. C. F. M., was established in 1834. A recent enumeration of the foreign evangelical force of the American Board showed thirteen ordained, Christian missionaries, two physicians, and a number of female assistant missionaries, while the native force was nineteen pastors, 120 catechists, seventeen evangelists, 254 teachers, and thirty-five Bible-women. There are 141 common schools, with 3,603 pupils, ten station boarding-schools, besides a Training College, Theological Institute, Normal, High and Middle schools, eighteen Hindu Girls' Schools, 230 out-stations, thirty-six churches with 3,439 members, and 12,030 adherents. When the American missionaries, in 1834, took up their residence in Madura, the more influential Hindus treated them with studied indifference—a policy which afterward changed to bitter opposition. But the work progressed in spite of obstacles, and the principles of Christianity secured an enduring and ever-growing hold upon the Hindu people. Especially was the work very successful among the native women. Native Bible-women in cities and villages taught their Hindu sisters to read and to "know Christ." Many were beaten and persecuted for their loyalty to the new religion, their Bibles were seized and torn up or burned, and they themselves deprived of liberty. The Madura Female Normal School is training and sending out hundreds of well-equipped Christian teachers, while the Pasumalai Institute, with its 400 pupils, has furnished the field with hundreds of native helpers, and prepared many for the Madras University. During the great famine of 1877-78, about 60,000 persons in Southern India renounced idolatry and embraced the Christian religion, over 2,000 of them joining the Madura Mission. Five years ago, a determined effort was made by the Hindus to check the progress of the work in Madura, and a violent persecution of Christians was inaugurated. Preachers were stoned and the Bible and its religion were abused, and an effort was made to break down the Christian schools; but like similar movements, the persecution failed, and the Christian element gained in strength and popularity everywhere.

In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. T. S. Taylor, an active worker in the missionary field, gives some interesting facts connected with the progress of the Gospel in Madura. He writes:

"As a traveller approaches Madura, the only signs of the existence of that famous city are the lofty towers of the temple rising above the belt of cocoanut trees which hem it on every side. The four lofty towers which now rise from the walls surrounding the temple, are supposed to have been built between, 1,450 and 1,500 A. D., by the last of the Pandiars. The west tower is said to be the oldest of the four.

"The actual number of the pillars in the 'Mantapam' is 999, many of them being ornamented with spirited carvings of gods and heroes. The most important addition to the temple was the New Mantapam (hall) of the god, Sundareshwara, built for his retreat during the dog-days in the burning month of May, in consequence of which it has the name of the 'Spring Hall.' It is surrounded by a narrow, stone water-course intended to cool the air during the fierce heats of May. The flat roof is composed of long slabs of granite, supported by 124 stone pillars, carved in the ordinary Hindu style and placed in four rows. Ten of these pillars are ornamented with statues, sculptured in stone, of Tirunialai Nayak and his nine predecessors of the Nayak dynasty, together with their wives. To a stranger, the most imposing of Tirunialai Nayak's buildings is the Palace which, even in its ruin, is admired by all who see it. The American Board, which, early in 1834, selected Madura as the most suitable place for missionary work, has now for its guidance the accumulated experience of fifty-nine years. Twelve ordained missionaries and sixteen missionary ladies married and single, are working in the field here at present. On coming out of the pastor's house the stranger sees the missionary dispensary, which is just in front. The first thing to which his eyes are drawn is a crowd of people on the dispensary verandah, with an evangelist in their midst who appears to move the crowd with impressive words, uttered with eloquence. This over, the Medical Missionary, Dr. Van Allan, and a hospital assistant, administer medicines and perform surgical operations. Once a rich man came from Malaiputti, thirty-seven miles off, and received kind attention and medical treatment. He informed the doctor that he desired the friendship of a missionary

POMPEII AND ITS LESSONS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Isaiah 25: 2: "Thou hast made of a defenced city a ruin."

A FLASH on the night sky greeted us as we left the rail train at Naples, Italy. What was the strange illumination? It was that wrath of many centuries —Vesuvius. Giant son of an earthquake. Intoxicated mountain of Italy. Father of many consternations. A volcano, burning so long, and yet to keep on burning until, perhaps, it may be the very torch that will kindle the last conflagration and set all the world on fire. It eclipses in violence of behavior Cotopaxi and Ætna and Stromboli and Krakatoa. Awful mystery. Funeral pyre of dead cities. Everlasting paroxysm of mountains. It seems like a chimney of hell. It roars with fiery reminiscence of what it has done, and with threats of worse things that it may yet do. I would not live in one of the villages at its base for a present of all Italy. On a day in December, 1631, it threw up ashes that floated away hundreds and hundreds of miles, and dropped in Constantinople and in the Adriatic Sea and on the Apennines, as well as trampling out at its own foot the lives of eighteen thousand people. Geologists have tried to fathom its mysteries, but the heat consumed the iron instruments and drove back the scorched and blistered explorers from the cindery and crumbling brink. It seems like the asylum of maniac elements. At one time far back its top had been a fortress, where Spartacus fought and was surrounded, and would have been destroyed had it not been for the grape vines which clothed the mountain side from top to base, and laying hold of them he climbed hand under hand to safety in the valley. But for centuries it has kept its furnace burning as we saw it that night on our arrival in November of 1889.

Of course the next day we started to see some of the work wrought by that frenzied mountain. "All out for Pompeii!" was the cry of the conductor. And now we stand by the corpse of that dead city. As we entered the gate and passed between the walls, I took off my hat, as one naturally does in the presence of some imposing obsequies. That city had been at one time a capital of beauty and pomp, the home of grand architecture, exquisite painting, enchanting sculpture, unrestrained carousal, and rapt assemblage. A high wall, twenty feet thick, three-fourths of it still visible, encircled the city. On those walls at a distance of only one hundred yards from each other, towers rose for armed men who watched the city. The streets ran at right angles and from wall to wall, only one street excepted. In the days of the city's prosperity, its towers glittered in the sun; eight strong gates for ingress and egress; Gate of the Sea Shore, Gate of Herculaneum, Gate of Nocera, perhaps the most important. Yonder stood the temple of Jupiter, hoisted at an imposing elevation, and with its six Corinthian columns of immense girth, which stood like carved icebergs, shimmering in the light. There stands the Temple of the Twelve Gods. Yonder see the Temple of Hercules, and the Temple of Mercury, with altars of marble and bas-relief, wonderful enough to astound all succeeding ages of art, and the Temple of Æsculapius, brilliant with sculpture and gorgeous with painting. Yonder are the theatres, partly cut into surrounding hills and glorified with pictured walls and entered under arches of imposing masonry, and with rooms for captivated and applaudatory audiences, seated or standing, in vast semi-circle. Yonder are the costly and immense public baths of the city, with more than the modern ingenuities of Carlsbad. Notice the warmth of those ancient tepidariums with hovering radiance of roof, and the vapor of those caldariums with decorated alcoves and the cold dash of their frigidariums, with floors of mosaic, and ceilings of all skilfully intermingled hues, and walls upholstered with all the colors of the setting sun, and sofas on which to recline for slumber after the plunge. Yonder are the barracks of the celebrated gladiators. Yonder is the summer home of Sallust, the Roman historian and senator, the architecture as elaborate as his character was corrupt. There is the residence of the poet Pansa, with a compressed Louvre and Luxembourg within his walls. There is the home of Lucretius, with vases and antiquities enough to turn the head of a virtuoso. Yonder see the Forum, at the highest place of the city. It is entered by two triumphal arches. It is bounded on three sides by Doric columns. Yonder, in the suburbs of the city, is the home of Arrius Diomed the mayor of the suburbs, terraced residence of billionairedom, gardens, fountained, statued, colonnaded, the cellar of that villa filled with bottles of rarest wine, a few drops of which were found eighteen hundred years afterward. Along the streets of the city are men of might and women of beauty formed into bronze that many centuries had no power to bedim. Battle scenes on walls in colors which all time cannot efface. Great city of Pompeii! So Seneca and Tacitus and Cicero pronounced it.

Stand with me on its walls this evening of August 23rd, A. D., 79. See the throngs passing up and down in Tyrian purple and girdles of arabesque and necks enchained with precious stones, proud official in imposing toga meeting the slave carrying trays a-clink with goblets and a-smoke with delicacies from paddock and sea, and moralist musing over the degradation of the times passes the profligate doing his best to make them worse. Hark to the clatter and rataplan of the hoofs on the streets paved with blocks of basalt. See the verdured and flowered grounds sloping into the most beautiful bay of all the earth—the Bay of Naples. Listen to the rumbling chariots, carrying convivial occupants to halls of mirth and masquerade and carousal. Hear the loud dash of fountains amid the sculptured water nymphs. Notice the weird, solemn, far-reaching hum and din and roar of a city at the close of a summer day. Let Pompeii sleep well to-night, for it is the last night of peaceful slumber before she falls into the deep slumber of many long centuries. The morning of the 24th of August, A. D., 79, has arrived, and the day rolls on, and it is one o'clock in the afternoon: "Look!" I say to you, standing on this wall, as the sister of Pliny said to him, the Roman essayist and naval commander, on the day of which I speak, as she pointed him in the direction in which I point you. There is a peculiar cloud on the sky; a spotted cloud, now white, now black. It is Vesuvius in awful and unparalleled eruption. Now the smoke and fire and steam of that black monster throat rise and spread, as, by my gesture, I now describe it. It rises, a great column of fiery darkness, higher and higher, and then spreads out like the branches of a tree, with midnights interwrapped in its foliage, wider and wider. Now the sun goes out and showers of pumice stone and water from furnaces more than seven times heated, and ashes in avalanche after avalanche, blinding and scalding and suffocating, descend, North, South, East and West, burying deeper and deeper in mammoth sepulchre, such as never before or since was opened, Stabiæ, Herculaneum, and Pompeii. Ashes ankle deep, girdle deep, chin deep, ashes overhead. Out of the houses and temples and theatres, and into the streets and down to the beach fled many of the frantic, but others, if not suffocated of the ashes, were scalded to death by the heated deluge. And then came heavier destruction in rocks after rocks, crushing in homes and temples and theatres. No wonder the sea receded from the beach as though in terror, until much of the shipping was wrecked, and no wonder that, when, they lifted Pliny the elder from the sail cloth on which he was resting, under the agitations of what he had seen, he suddenly expired. For three days the entombment proceeded. Then the clouds lifted and the cursing of that Apollyon of Mountains subsided. For seventeen hundred years that city of Pompeii lay buried and without anything to show its place of doom. But after seventeen hundred years of obliteration, a workman's spade, digging a well, strikes some antiquities which lead to the exhumation of the city. Now walk with me through some of the streets and into some of the houses and amid the ruins of Basilica, and Temple and Amphitheatre.

From the moment the guide met us at the gate on entering Pompeii that day in November, 1889, until he left us at the gate on our departure, the emotion I felt was indescribable for elevation and solemnity, and sorrow and awe. Come and see the petrified bodies of the dead found in the city, and now in the museums of Italy. About 450 of those embalmed by that eruption have been recovered. Mother and child, noble and serf, merchant and beggar, are presentable and natural after seventeen hundred years of burial. That woman was found clutching her adornments when the storm of ashes and fire began, and for 1700 years she continued to clutch them. There at the soldiers' barracks are sixty-four skeletons of brave men, who faithfully stood guard at their post when the tempest of cinders began, and after seventeen hundred years were still found standing guard. There is the form of gentle womanhood impressed upon the hardened ashes. Pass along, and here we see the deep ruts in the basaltic pavements worn there by the wheels of the chariots of the first century. There, over the doorways and in the porticos, are works of art immortalizing the debauchery of a city, which, notwithstanding all its splendors, was a vestibule of perdition. Those gutters ran with the blood of the gladiators, who were the prize-fighters of those ancient times, and it was sword parrying sword, until, with one skilful and stout plunge of the sharp edge, the mauled and gashed combatant reeled over dead, to be carried out amid the huzzas of enraptured spectators. We staid among those suggestive scenes after the hour that visitors are usually allowed there, and staid until there was not a footfall to be heard within all that city, except our own. Up this silent street and down that silent street we wandered. Into that windowless and roofless home we went and came out again on to the pavements that, now forsaken, were once thronged with life.

And can it be that all up and down these solemn solitudes, hearts, more than eighteen hundred years ago, ached and rejoiced, and feet shuffled with the gait of old age or danced with childish glee, and overtasked workmen carried their burdens, and drunkards staggered? On that mosaic floor did glowing youth clasp hands in marriage vow, and across that threshold did pall-bearers carry the beloved dead, and gay groups once mount those now skeletons of staircases? While I walked and contemplated, the city seemed suddenly to be thronged with all the population that had ever inhabited it, and I heard its laughter and groan and blasphemy and uncleanness and infernal boast, as it was on the 23d of August, 79. And Vesuvius, from the mild light with which it flushed the sky that summer evening as I stood in disentombed Pompeii, seemed suddenly again to heave and flame and rock with the lava and darkness and desolation and woe, with which, more than eighteen centuries ago, it submerged Pompeii, as, with the liturgy of fire and storm, the mountain proclaimed at the burial: "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust."

My friends, I cannot tell what practical suggestion comes to your mind from this walk through uncovered Pompeii, but the first thought that absorbs me is that, while art and culture are important, they cannot save the morals or the life of a great town. Much of the painting and sculpture of Pompeii was so exquisite that, while some is kept on the walls where it was first penciled, to be admired by those who go there, whole wagon-loads and whole rooms full of it have been transferred to the Museo Borbonico at Naples, to be admired by the centuries. Those Pompeiian artists mixed such durability of colors that though their paintings were buried in ashes and scoriae for seventeen hundred years, and since they were uncovered many of them have remained there exposed to the rains and winds and winters and summers of a hundred and thirty years, the color is as fresh and vivid and true as though yesterday it had passed from the easel. Which of our modern paintings could stand all that? And yet many of the specimens of Pompeiian art show that the city was sunk to such a depth of abomination that there was nothing deeper. Sculptured and petrified and embalmed abomination. There was a state of public morals worse than belongs to any city now standing under the sun. Yet, how many think that all that is necessary is to cultivate the mind and advance the knowledge, and improve the arts. Have you the impression that eloquence will do the elevating work? Why, Pompeii had Cicero half of every year for its citizen. Have you the idea that literature is all that is necessary to keep a city right? Why, Sallust, with a pen that was the boast of Roman literature, had a mansion in that doomed city. Do you think that sculpture and art are quite sufficient for the production of good morals? Then, correct your delusion by examining the statues in the Temple of Mercury at Pompeii, or the winged figures of its Parthenon, and the colonnades and arches of this house of Diomed. By all means have schools and Dusseldorf and Dore exhibitions, and galleries where the genius of all the centuries can bank itself up in snowy sculpture, and all bric-a-brac, and all pure art, but nothing, save the religion of Jesus Christ, can make a city moral. In proportion as churches and Bibles and Christian printing presses and revivals of religion abound is a city clean and pure. What has Buddhism or Confucianism or Mahommedanism done in all the hundreds of years of their progress for the elevation of society? Absolutely nothing. Pekin and Madras and Cairo are just what they were ages ago, except as Christianity has modified their condition. What is the difference between our Brooklyn and their Pompeii? No difference, except that which Christianity has wrought. Favor all good art, but take best care of your churches and your Sabbath Schools and your Bibles and your family altars.

Yea, see in our walk to-day through uncovered Pompeii what sin will do for a city. We ought to be slow to assign the judgments of God. Cities are sometimes afflicted just as good people are afflicted, and the earthquake and the cyclone and the epidemic are no sign in many cases that God is angry with a city, but the distress is sent for some good and kind purpose, whether we understand it or not. The law that applies to individuals may apply to Christian cities as well: "All things work together for good to those that love God." But the greatest calamity of history came upon Pompeii not to improve its future condition, for it was completely obliterated and will never be rebuilt. It was so bad that it needed to be buried seventeen hundred years before even its ruins were fit to be uncovered. So Sodom and Gomorrah were filled with such turpitude that they were not only turned under, but have for thousands of years been kept under. The two greatest cemeteries are the cemetery in which the sunken ships are buried all the way between Fire Island and Fastnet Light House, and the other cemetery is the cemetery of dead cities. I get down on my knees and read the epitaph-eology of a long line of them: Here lies Babylon, once called "The hammer of the whole earth." Dead and buried under piles of bitumen and broken pottery and vitrefied brick. And I hear a wolf howl and a reptile hiss as I am reading this epitaph: Isa. 13: 21, "The wild beast of the desert shall be there and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures."

The next tomb I kneel before in this cemetery of cities is Nineveh. Her winged lions are down and the slabs of alabaster have crumbled, and the sculpture that represented her battles is as completely scattered as the dust of the heroes who fought them. Perhaps I put my knee into the dust of her Sardanapalus as I stoop to read her epitaph: Zephaniah 2 . 14, "Now is Nineveh a desolation and dry like a wilderness, and flocks lie down in the midst of her: all the beasts of the nations, both the cormorant and the bittern, lodge in the upper lintels of it." And while I read it I hear an owl hoot, and a hyena laugh. The next entombed city I pass has a monument of fifty prostrate columns of grey and red granite and it is Tyre. The next sepulchre of a great capital is covered with scattered columns, and defaced sphinxes, and the sands of the desert, and it is Thebes. As I pass on I find the resting place of Mycenae a city of which Homer sang, and Corinth which rejected Paul, and depended upon her fortress Acrocorinthus, which now lies dismantled on the hill, and I move on in this cemetery of cities, and I find the tombs of Sardis, and Smyrna, and Persepolis, and Memphis, and Baalbek, and Carthage, and here are the Cities of the Plain, and Herculaneum, and Stabia, and Pompeii. Some of them have mighty sarcophagus, and hieroglyphic entablature, but they are dead, and buried never to rise.

But the cemetery of dead cities is not yet filled, and if the present cities of the world forget God, and with their indecencies shock the heavens, let them know that the God, who, on the 24th of August, '79, dropped on a city of Italy a superincumbrance that staid there seventeen centuries, is still alive and hates sin now as much as he did then, and has at his command, all the armament of destruction with which he whelmed their iniquitous predecessors. It was only a few summers ago that Brooklyn and New York felt an earthquake throb that sent the people affrighted into the streets, and that suggested that there are forces of nature now suppressed, or held in check, which, easier than a child in a nursery knocks down a row of block houses, could prostrate a city, or engulf a continent deeper than Pompeii was engulfed. Our hope is in the mercy of the Lord continued to our American cities. It amazes me that this city, which has the quietest Sabbaths on the continent and the best order and the highest tone of morals of any city that I know of, is now having brought into as near neighborhood as Coney Island carnivals of pugilism as debasing as any of the gladiatorial contests of Pompeii. What a precious crew that "Coney Island Athletic Club" is, under whose auspices these orgies are enacted. What a degradation to the adjective "athletic," which ordinarily suggests health and muscle developed for useful purpose! Instead of calling it an athletic club they might better style it "The Ruffian Club for Smashing the Human Visage." Vile men are turning that Coney Island, which is one of the finest watering-places on all the Atlantic coast, into a place for the offscouring of the earth to congregate, the low horse jockeys and gamblers and the pugilists and the pick-pockets and the bloats regurgitated from the depths of the worst wards of these cities. They invite delegates from universal loaferdom to come to their carnival of knuckles. But I do not believe that the pugilism contracted for and advertised for next December will take place in our neighborhood.

Evil sometimes defeats itself by going one step too far. You may drive the hoop of a barrel down so hard that it breaks. I will not believe that the International Prize Fight will take place on Long Island, or in the State of New York, until I see the rowdy rabble rolling drunk off the cars at Flatbush Avenue and with faces banged and cut and bleeding from the imbruting scene. Against this infraction of the Laws of the State of New York I lift solemn protest. The curse of Almighty God will rest upon any community that consents to such an outrage. Does any one think it cannot be stopped and that the constabulary would be overborne, then let Governor Flower send down there a Regiment of State Militia, and they will clean out the nuisance in one hour.

Warned by the doom of other cities that have perished for their Ruffianism, or their Cruelty or their Idolatry or their Dissoluteness, let all our American cities lead the right way. Our only dependence is on God and Christian influences. Politics will do nothing but make things worse. Send politics to moralize and save a city and you send small-pox to heal leprosy, or a carcass to relieve the air of malodor. For what politics will do I refer you to the eight weeks of stultification enacted at Washington by our American Senate. American politics will become a reformatory power on the same day that pandemonium becomes a church. But there are I am glad to say benign, and salutary and gracious influences organized in all our cities which will yet take them for God and righteousness. Let us ply the Gospel machinery to its utmost speed and power. City evangelization is the thought. Accustomed as are religious pessimists to dwell upon statistics of evil and dolorous facts we want some one with sanctified heart and good digestion to put in long line the statistics of natures transformed, and profligacies balked, and souls ransomed, and cities redeemed. Give us pictures of churches, of schools, of reformatory associations, of asylums of mercy. Break in upon the Misereres of complaint and despondency with Te Deums, and Jubilates of moral and religious victory. Show that the day is coming when a great tidal wave of salvation will roll over all our cities. Show how Pompeii buried will become Pompeii resurrected. Demonstrate the fact that there are millions of good men and women who will give themselves no rest day nor night until cities that are now of the type of the buried cities of Italy shall take type from the New Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven. I hail the advancing morn. I make the same proclamation to-day that Gideon made to the shivering cowards of his army, "Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return and depart early from Mount Gilead." Close up the ranks. Lift the Gospel standard. Forward into this Armageddon that is now opening and let the word run all along the line: Brooklyn for God! All our cities for God! America for God! The world for God! The most of us here gathered, though born in the country, will die in town. Shall our last walk be through streets where sobriety and good order dominate, or grog-shops stench the air? Shall our last look be upon City Halls where justice reigns, or demagogues plot for the stuffing of ballot-boxes? Shall we sit for the last time in some church where God is worshipped with the contrite heart, or where cold formalism goes through unmeaning genuflexions? God save the cities! Righteousness is life, iniquity is death. Remember picturesque, terraced, templed, sculptured, boastful, God-defying and entombed Pompeii!

A JUST MAGISTRATE.

A notable communication is published in the Church at Home and Abroad from Rev. A. A. Fulton of Canton, China. It refers to the conduct of a magistrate to whom Mr. Fulton had to apply for protection in spite of the Geary Law. He says: A few days ago placards were put out against us, stating that we pretended to do good, but would harm the people by our medicines. This was serious. I had a personal interview with the magistrate, and showed him copies of our treaty, and of the Emperor's last edict against posting inflammatory placards. It was the 5th of May, the very day when the Chinese were to be ejected from our country, and here I was asking this magistrate for protection. What did he do? He said treaties must be kept. He put out proclamations all over the city stating that we came here to do good, and threatening with imprisonment any who would dare to disturb us. He ordered all the defamatory placards torn down, and sent soldiers to our boat. He also, yesterday issued one of the strongest edicts in our favor that I have seen. This edict is for protection of our chapels. He states very clearly that we have a right to open chapels everywhere, that this is by treaty requirements and imperial authorization, and that he will punish any who put out placards against us, or disturb our work. He also issued proclamations to be sent by special soldiers and posted in our chapels at Shing Tong and Shun Kok, situated in this district, distant from this place ten and fifteen miles respectively.

CHRISTIAN LIVING.

S S. Lesson for Oct. 22. Rom 12: 1-15. Golden Text, Rom. 12 : 21 By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AS those who have "turned to God from idols," from the "vain manner of life handed down from their fathers," (1. Pet. 1: 18, R.V.) who have been delivered "from the present evil age," "to serve the living and true God and to wait for his Son from heaven," it is our privilege to lead a transformed life. If we anticipate the day when he whom we are looking for shall fashion anew, or transform, the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, it is but befitting that our lives and our whole spirit shall first go through a transformation. The first principle in the life of a true Christian is: "Ye are not your own, for ye were bought with a price, glorify God, therefore, in your body." Redeemed, blood-bought, belonging to another, our whole life is seen with other eyes. Christ died "for all that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again."

Thus Paul, having told out the greatness of redemption, justification, and the power of God to live a holy life, exhorts: "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service." (R.V., margin; "spiritual worship.") Anything less is unreasonable, anything less is carnal. Until we come to understand, not in doctrine, but in actual daily living, that our body, our eyes, ears, hands, feet, brain, heart, etc., are no more our own than is that which we have sold or given into the hands of another, we cannot live a really Christian and transformed life. Just the knowledge of sin forgiven, without this radical change in the whole tenor of our lives, can do nothing for the kingdom of God. A sacrifice was never a sacrifice until its life was laid down; it was its very consumption upon the altar which made it to be a sacrifice, and the very offering to God made it to be holy and acceptable to him. And, practically, this transforms a life. Something may happen which is a real trial to me, it upsets my plans, it humbles me, it tests my patience; it seems to be contrary to the interests of God's work; what shall I do, then? Shall I resist? Shall I pity myself? Shall I struggle against it? How can I? A sacrifice can only yield and die. The only purpose of a sacrifice is to die, if we are a living sacrifice, then our vocation is to die, yes; with Paul, to "die daily." (1. Cor. 15: 31.) To be "crucified with Christ," even if the crucifixion may be a very lingering and painful one. This is Spiritual Worship.

It does not consist of the singing of hymns and offering of prayers except they proceed from a life laid down. The powerlessness of the Christianity of the present day is that the true spirit of sacrifice is so largely wanting, the religion of the day, even the conversions of the day, partake of the spirit of the age in which we live, while Paul says: "Be not fashioned according to this age, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God" (R.V.) Self will is the spirit of the age: "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Self-will governs politics, self will reigns in churches, in communities, in families. A man [illegible] bution, and thus might is right. More or less this is the spirit which prevails between man and man throughout the world. In civilized countries there are certain restraining influences, which keep the will of man, to a certain extent, under control, and self interest will lead him to recognize that he benefits by law and order, but, at heart man is a selfish being, and when he is not subject to the law of God, he will suffer more or less, and make others suffer under his own self-will. God has redeemed us that we may be made a blessing to others, and calls us to be transformed, not to transform ourselves, that, instead of following out our own evil self-will we may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. Our part is to yield; the part of God the Holy Ghost is to transform us. It is God—i. e., God the Holy Ghost—that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. He will always do his work on one who is fully yielded, one who does not resist God, but who meets everything in the spirit of sacrifice, not considering himself, but only "what is God's will?" Such will discover that his will to a yielded spirit is good and acceptable and perfect, "although it would have been gall and bitterness to his self-will if it had not been laid down. They who are looking forward to a transfigured body when Christ shall come again, cannot but yield to him day by day and hour by hour, in all the rules and crosses of every day life, that their whole spirit may be transformed day by day, so as to accord with that "house from heaven" with which Jesus will clothe them when he comes. But the detail of such a life is Exceedingly Practical.

A transformed man will not think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but will think soberly, according as God hath dealt to each man a measure of faith." (R.V.) That is to say he will see himself by faith and not by sight; he will value himself no more by what he is, his own advantages of birth, position, wealth or talent will not make him regard himself as superior to others, he will see himself in the light of redemption, of the blood which bought him, and of the calling wherewith he is called, and so cannot possibly exalt himself above the weak brother. The spirit of the age is quite another: men are everywhere valuing themselves, boasting themselves, priding themselves upon their birth, their position, their talents, their education, their wealth, their property, their power, etc., etc. God wants a witness against this spirit of the age, "a little flock who can afford to be little, to be nobodies, to be despised, rejected and unknown; and yet who, when put to the test, are found fireproof, temptation-proof, scoffing-proof, satan-proof, people of another order, truly conformed to him who is the Firstborn among them; a people of new creations in Christ Jesus, unlike all others.

God would have our relations to one another to be not of choice or of self-will but a Matter of Faith.

"For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office; so we also being many are one body in Christ, and everyone members one of another. We cannot always see or feel our relations to one another; there are brethren or sisters who see all things from such a different point of view, people may misunderstand us if we acknowledge them, and yet they are brethren, according to their light they serve the Lord as we do. When our heads would not discover the oneness, let us, by faith, discover whether they are united to the one Head, Christ, and if so, be one with them through faith in him, bearing with all which he bears with, and acknowledging all which he acknowledges. Only he can bring us near to brethren who misunderstand us, and whom, perhaps, we misunderstand; no part of our life needs more faith, more close dealing with our God than our relations one to another.

Here again comes in the truth "Not your own." Deeper down than our own choice, uniting us more closely to our brother or sister than anything in their natural character which might attract us, there is the recognition that Christ has given them a place in the Body; if [illegible] be, what can they be to us? Only let us be careful how we admit either attraction or repulsion which is not by faith in God: we are stewards of our relations to our brethren as we are stewards of all else, and it is a glorious witness which we bear to the world, if our relations to our brethren are indeed regulated from above, for they will be unable to comprehend how our love for our brethren does not, in any degree, depend upon what they are or how they treat us.

Again it is by faith we are to regard the special gifts which God has committed to us. While the worldling will look down with contempt on those whom he regards as inferior, and will conceit himself upon gifts, talents, or advantages, which he did not bestow upon himself. It is the graceful privilege of the children of God and disciples of Jesus to be servants to gifts for the sake of others: their gifts are the Lord's, and they are servants of their brethren for his sake. Therefore the Spirit of living sacrifice pervades all.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SELF-SURRENDER and self-conquest are the key-notes of the lesson. Having dwelt at length on what God has done for man and emphasized the cardinal duty and saving power of faith, Paul goes on to show the practical results of faith in life and conduct. If any of the Apostle's readers supposed that a mere assent of the intellect to the facts of the atonement constituted them Christians in Paul's view of the word, their error would be corrected when they read this chapter. He tells them that not only would such faith as he had been describing lead them to holiness and service, but the very graces it produced must be nourished and cultivated. As usual, he uses a Jewish figure. The body is to be a living sacrifice . . . unto God. Under the Mosaic dispensation the sacrifice was slain, but in this case the sacrifice is to live that it may be offered continually. It is to be a perpetual offering, consecrated so long as it exists as the habitation of the soul. It is as if a man desired to give his mansion and grounds to the people. He would not demolish the house but would fill it with such books and pictures and statues and apparatus as would render it suitable for the entertainment and culture of the people. It would be consecrated to their use and benefit. The body is to be placed at God's service, according to Paul's conception of the Christian life. It is to be transformed, purified, renovated, so that the whole man shall be the Lord's. Entering into details, the apostle mentions some things which need to be done. Vanity and conceit are to be excluded, and under the figure of the mystical body he shows the reasonableness of the exclusion. As every member has its office, so every man has his work. A body is maimed and crippled whether it is a hand or a foot that is missing; so the meanest, poorest member of the church is not to be despised, for he is necessary to the perfect body. There is not only to be respect, but love for the brethren and that love is not to be hypocritical, but sincere. Earnestness, activity, cheerfulness, patience in trouble and prayerfulness, benevolence, hospitality, magnanimity, and sympathy are all enjoined. The man is to be fully alive, alert, energetic, consecrated. He has been redeemed, as a slave or a prisoner might be set at liberty, but not that he may spend his life in idleness or pleasure or self-indulgence, but in active service for his benefactor and his fellow-men. As Paul observes, this is a reasonable service.

Present your bodies. In the old schools of philosophy it was usual for the pupils to bring a present to their teacher at the commencement of each term. On one of the occasions when the disciples of Socrates one by one were going up with their gifts a poor youth hung back. But when all the others had presented their gifts he flung himself at the feet of the sage, and cried, "I give thee myself."

A brother going to spend a day in a large city, said to his invalid sister, "Can I buy anything for you, dear? I do want so much to bring you something." She interrupted him, "Nothing, dear; don't bring anything. Come back as soon as you can. I only want you."

Be ye transformed. Two children, brother and sister were playing together in a room, where there was a large mirror. They stood for a moment before it looking at their reflections. The boy was a bright handsome boy, with clear complexion and bright eyes. The girl was freckled and plain with irregular features. The boy made a hard, contemptuous remark taunting his sister with the difference between their looks. The girl burst into tears and went to her father for consolation. "Do not be distressed my child," said he. "When you look in the glass remember that the lustre of amiable conduct and kindliness of heart and manner will always be more appreciated than beauty." To the boy, he said, after reproving him for hurting his sister's feelings, "Remember when you look in the glass that a most lovely face may be dishonored and debased by unloveliness of character; and harshness and unkindness and pride are deformities for which beauty can never atone."

One body in Christ. An ancient fable has it that two friends went into the forge of Vulcan to beg a boon of him. It was that they might be made one. Vulcan told them it could be done only by beating on the anvil or melting in the furnace. The moral was that only by adversity and suffering could there be union. There is no doubt of the truth of this. The union of Christ's people with him comes in that way, and he bore the suffering.

Members one of another. The humblest members of society and of the Church should not be discouraged nor should they be despised, as the duties they may do are necessary to the welfare of the whole. Rev. Mark Guy Pearce uses the following illustration of the fact: I stood awhile ago and looked at a drinking-fountain; a marble angel, beautifully sculptured, stood pointing to heaven. Then came polished granite inscribed with gilt letters, and massive slabs of stone. But I noticed that the water came through a small brass pipe, and the people drank from an iron cup attached to an iron chain. And the marble angel pointing heavenwards would have done nobody any good, but for the brass pipe and iron cup. Think if the pipe had said, "If they do not make me of gold I will not belong to the thing." Or if the cup had said, "I must be of silver or I shall be ashamed to be there at all. No, I thought I heard the music of the three—common water, common pipe and common cup. "Well," they sang, "they can't do without us, and we must do our part along with the marble angel and polished granite."

He that giveth let him do so with liberality. (R. V.) Two ministers, collecting for a Missionary Society had a hundred dollars brought to them by a man in low circumstances of life. Doubting whether it was consistent with his duty to his family and the world to contribute such a sum, they hesitated to receive it, when he answered to the following effect: "Before I knew the grace of our Lord, I was a poor drunkard, I never could save a shilling; my family were in beggary and rags. But since it has pleased God to renew me by his grace, we have been industrious and frugal; we have not spent many idle shillings; and we have been enabled to put something into the bank, and this I freely offer to the blessed cause of our Lord and Saviour."

Fervent in spirit. The inward life, if it is vigorous and intense, changes the outward appearance so that the face becomes sweet and bright. "I have noticed in the winter," says Dr. Hamilton, "a row of cottages half hidden in snow. Great piles of it rested firmly on their sloping roofs and even when the sun was up, it merely melted a little from the surface. But some of the cottages were denuded of their load early in the day. It slipped in some cases in one mass and in some cases in fragments from the roof to the ground. I found that in those houses a fire had been kindled and the houses were warm inside, while in the houses on which the snow remained there was no fire."

Rejoicing in hope. History is full of the records of Christian men and women who, have rejoiced even in the agonies of a cruel death, being supported in the hope of eternal happiness. A modern instance occurred in Uganda, Equatorial Africa, recently. The executioner of King M'Wanga was ordered to torture three young men for having become Christians and if they would not renounce Christ under torture to burn them. After the cruel deed was done, he went to the missionary and begged to be instructed in a religion which had the power to support any one in trying circumstances. He told the missionary that the young men had borne the torture like heroes. Finally, he had cut off their arms, and yet they would not recant. Then, in obedience to the king's command, he had piled the wood around the stakes to which they were chained, and actually when they were lighting the fire, they had broken out in joyful song which they kept up until the fire ended their sufferings. He had never witnessed such heroism and wanted to know how it was produced.

A City of Temples and Idols.

took the letter and requested Mr. Perkins to come to his village. Accordingly, one evening the missionary went there with his Catechists. The patron had collected a number of people and was ready to receive the visitors. When they arrived the missionary preached on the life of Christ to a most appreciative audience. They were afterwards kindly entertained by their host.

"The Eastern part of the Dispensary is the Female Department, which is under the charge of Miss M. Root, assisted by two Bible-women. Nearby are the headquarters of Rev. J. S. Chandler, the eldest son of the venerable missionary of the Madura Station. His wife is the daughter of the late Rev. J. Kendall, a grand disciple and teacher, who was connected with the Madura Mission for thirty-eight years. He was universally beloved. Both husband and wife are thus the children of missionaries who were in charge of the station, a fact which speaks well for the interest taken by the children in the spiritual work of their parents. On Monday evenings, the three pastors of the city, mission agents and a number of Christian workers usually assemble, in Mr. Chandler's rooms for prayer and praise and to arrange for the street preaching in four different places, which are regularly occupied every Tuesday.

"Near Mr. Chandler's bungalow is the Training School for Girls, the manager of which, Miss B. B. Noyes, is a daughter of the late veteran missionary, Rev. J. T. Noyes, who was connected with this mission for about forty years. Miss Mary Noyes arrived here last September to work with her sister. Those born in India are better able to bear the heat of the sun than the new missionaries and their tongues turn more quickly to the study of the Tamil language. Besides, they are better able to understand the social customs and religious thoughts of the people. Miss Noyes' school is the highest educational institution for girls and the only school for the training of women in the Madura district. Girls are there taught habits of neatness and usefulness, to lead a pure life, and to make their homes the abode of joy and Christian love."

In the "Otis Hall," a substantial school building connected with the Girls' Seminary, little children who are gathered from the streets soon learn to love their teachers. It is very pleasant to hear these little ones sing their hymns and recite Bible stories and verses. Many of them belong to Hindoo and Mohammedan families. The church itself is pleasantly located. It is known as the "East-gate Church," and was built in 1843. Rev. John Cornelius, ordained in 1871, was the first pastor. He faithfully served the Lord in Madura for forty years, of which twelve were devoted to the East-gate Church. One of our illustrations presents a group composed of the official members of this church. The second pastor of the church (at the extreme right of the group) was lately called from earth. Since his death a "Workers' Committee" has been formed who arrange services, conduct meetings, outdoor work, Sunday Schools, etc.

Besides the East-gate, there are the West and the North Churches in Madura. Mr. James Rowland is the pastor of West Church, a self-supporting institution, now 25 years old and doing excellent work. The North Church was established only two years ago. Most of the church members earn their livelihood by daily work, yet to meet the church expenses, they pay their offerings with great enthusiasm and cheerfulness. Some of these find work in the cotton-mills, where they refused to work on Sundays when urged by the managers of the mill. Having heard an official order to them to persuade their pastor to excuse their keeping the Sabbath, a youth replied: "It is not the pastor who orders us to keep the Sabbath, but the God of the Sabbath; we will leave our work rather than disobey God's commandment." The European was very glad at hearing this brave boy, and said he would permit them to do as they pleased and give them their proper wages, without any deduction for absence on Sundays.

Near the Meanatchy Temple lives a widow who has been under the instruction of the Bible-women for ten years. Her husband opposed her embracing Christianity. Lately the husband died. On the fortieth day, she attended the Evening Sunday Service, though high caste widows do not appear in public before a year passes. She promised soon to confess her faith in Christ openly.

Miss E. Swift's new Training School for Bible-women was opened last year and there are now nineteen women in the school. Many are widows and all are showing the excellent results of their spiritual training.

We are indebted to Rev. T. S. Taylor of the Madura Mission for the very interesting photographs used in the illustration of this article.

TIMELY AID.*

IN all hours of unrest,
When the spirit is distressed,
If disturbed with doubts and fear,
Pray "Thy Peace, Lord," he will hear.
(John 14: 27.)

In all hours of irritation
When there is a combination
Of all evils 'gainst the soul,
"Lord, thy Patience" be our call.
(Isa. 53: 7.)

In the hour of temptation
When the dark solicitation
Unto sin comes to our heart,
"Lord, thy Purity" impart.
(II. Peter 2: 9.)

In the hour of our weakness,
We would call on thee in meekness,
"Thy Strength, Lord" O, give us now,
As before thy throne we bow.
(II. Cor. 12: 9.) C. S. S.

*B. F. Meyer, tells a venerable clergyman, who once when tempted to great irritation, looked up and claimed the patience and gentleness of Christ and since that time it has been his practice to claim from him the virtue of which he felt the deficiency in himself.

THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

Men of other Faiths Tell us how they Regard Christianity and why they Refuse to Become Christians—Hints for Missionaries.

FROM the Parliament of Religions which has just closed its sessions in Chicago two significant and important results have come. First, we have learned from the addresses delivered by representatives of many religions, especially those of Asia, that the leaders of these faiths have generally the same aim as that of the Christian preacher. They are seeking in their way to eradicate sin and vice, to ennoble and purify the lives of men and to encourage kindness, charity and helpfulness. Thus, so far as morality is concerned, they are allies rather than opponents of Christianity.

A second result is that Christians have now learned authoritatively from the representatives of other faiths what are the principal obstacles to the propagation of Christianity in some of the lands to which we send missionaries. The chief obstacle is the inconsistencies of professedly Christian nations and individuals. When these people suffer from the cruelty, injustice, oppression and immorality of professing Christians, they conclude that Christianity is not the transforming and beneficent power that it is claimed to be. It will also surprise some among us to learn from the addresses in the Parliament that Christ is honored and his teachings accepted by many who reject the dogmas and doctrines of the sects. These facts ought to be understood and appreciated by the Church of Christ throughout the world and especially by the friends of missions. The following from among numerous weighty utterances will indicate the attitude of the speakers toward Christianity:

Kinza Ringe Hirai, a Buddhist teacher of Japan declared that Christianity would be given a kindly hearing by the Japanese but for the un-Christian conduct of so-called Christian nations.

Swami Vivekananda of Bombay, India, said, "Sisters and brothers of America, I am proud to belong to a religion that has taught the world both tolerance and universal kindness. We believe not only in universal toleration, but we accept all religions to be true. I am proud to tell you that I belong to a religion into whose sacred language (the Sanscrit) the word seclusion is untranslatable. I am proud to belong to a nation which has sheltered the persecuted and the refugees of all religions and all nations of the earth. I am proud to tell you that we have gathered in our bosom the purest remnant of the Israelites, a remnant which came to southern India and took refuge with us in the very year in which their holy temple was shattered to pieces by Roman tyranny."

"In India there are more than 300,000,000 men and women living on an average of a little more than 50 cents a month. I have seen them for years living on wild flowers. Whenever there was a litttle famine hundreds of thousands died of starvation. Christian missionaries come and offer life, but only on condition that the Hindus become Christians, abandoning the faith of their fathers and forefathers. Is it right? There are hundreds of asylums; but if the Mohammedans or the Hindus go there they would be kicked out. There are thousands of asylums erected by Hindus where anybody would be received. Brethren of America, the crying evil of the East is not religion. We have more than religion enough; what they want is bread, bet they are given a stone. It is an insult to a suffering man dying of hunger to preach to him metaphysics. Therefore, if you wish to illustrate the meaning of 'brotherhood,' treat the Hindu more kindly, even though he be a Hindu and is faithful to his religion. Send missionaries to them to teach them how better to earn a better piece of bread, and not teach them metaphysical nonsense."

Mr. Dharmapala, a Buddhist monk of India, said: "For nineteen centuries you have had Christianity in Europe, but only during the last three centuries have attempts been made to propagate it in the East. The Buddhists have a record to show that the Christian nations of three centuries ago did not do their duty as Christ wanted it done, and therefore Christianity failed in the East. The conditions of our country are different from those of yours. Your great slaughter-house here is a shame and curse to civilization, and we do not want any such Christianity in Ceylon, in Burmah, in Japan, or in China. We want the lowly and meek and gentle teachings of Christ, not because we do not have them now, but we want more of them. I tell you, if you want to make Christianity an influence in the East, you must send there men of gentleness, lowliness, meekness and tolerance. Buddhism had its missionaries before Christianity was preached. It conquered all Asia, and made the Mongolians mild. Its preachers do not go in this grand, fashionable costume of yours, but in the simple garb you see on this platform. They did not go with a Bible in one hand and a rum bottle in the other, but they went full of love, compassion and sympathy. With these attributes they conquered, and they made Asia mild. Slaughter-houses were abolished, public-houses were abolished, but they are now on the increase because of the influence of Western civilization. It is left for you, this younger family of European nations, to change this. You are intelligent, you are free from the bonds of theology and dogma, and I want you seriously to consider that the twentieth century evangelization is in your hands. I warn you that if you want to establish Christianity in the East, it can only be done on the principles of Christ's love and meekness. Let the missionary study all the religions; let them be a type of meekness and lowliness, and they will find a welcome in all lands."

Minas Scherez, editor of an Armenian newspaper, spoke as follows: "Salutations to the New World, in the name of Armenia, the oldest country of the Old World. Salutations to the American people, in the name of Armenia, which has been twice the cradle of the human race. Salutations to the parliament of religions, in the name of Armenia, where the religious feeling first blossomed in the enraptured heart of Adam. Salutation to every one of you, brothers and sisters, in the name of the Tigris and the Euphrates, which watered the Garden of Eden; in the name of the majestic Ararat, which was crowned by the ark of Noah, in the name of a church which was almost contemporary with Christ. A pious thought animated Christopher Columbus when he directed the prow of his ship toward this land of his dreams—to convert the natives to the faith of the Roman Catholic church. A still more pious thought animates you now, noble Americans, because you try to convert the whole of humanity to the dogma of universal toleration and fraternity. Old Armenia blesses this grand undertaking of young America, and wishes her to succeed in laying, on the extinguished volcanoes of religious hatred, the foundation of the temple of peace and concord."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

THE JOY OF THE SEA.

THERE are physical constitutions that will not harmonize with the water; but one-half the things that writers record against the sea is the result of their own intemperance. The sea-air rouses a wolf of an appetite, and nine-tenths of the passengers turn into meat-stuffers. From morn till night, down go the avalanches of provender. Invalids, on their way to Europe for the cure of dyspepsia, are seen gorging themselves at nine o'clock, at twelve, at four, at seven and at ten. Much of the sea-sickness is an insurrection of the stomach against too great instalment of salmon, and raisins, and roast turkey, and nuts, and pies, and an infinity of pastry. One-half the same dissipation on land would necessitate the attendance of the family doctor, and two nurses on the side of the bed to keep the howling patient from leaping out of the third-story window.

Oh, the joy of the sea! The vessel bounds likes a racer on the "home-stretch," bending into the bit, its sides flanked with the foam, and its white mane flying on the wild wind. We have dropped the world behind us.

On the land, when morning comes, it seems to run up from the other sides of the hills, and, with its face red from climbing, stands looking through the pikes and cedars. On the sea, it comes down from God out of heaven on ladders of light to bathe in the water, the waves dripping from her ringlets and sash of fire, or throwing up their white caps to greet her, and the sea-gull alights on her brow at the glorious baptism. No smoke of factory on the clear air. No shuffling of weary feet on the glass of the water-pavement. But him of Genesareth setting his foot in the snow of the surf, and stroking the neck of the waves as they lick his feet and play about him.

But the grandest smile of the sea is, after a rough day, in the phosphorescence that blazes from horizon to horizon. Some tell us it is the spawn of the jelly-fish, and some that it is a collection of marine insects; but those who say they do not know what it is, probably come nearest the truth. The prow of the vessel breaks it up into two great sheaves of light, and [illegible] the beam's-end till the mind falls back benumbed, unable longer to take in the splendor. In one direction, it is like a vast mosaic, and yonder it now quivers the "lightning of the sea." Here it is crystal inlaid with jet; or the eyes of sea-serpents flashing through the hissing waters; or a tall wave robed in white, flying, with long trail, toward the East; or the tossing up in the palm of the ocean a handful of opals, answered by the sparkle on one finger of foam; and then the long-restrained beauty breaking out into a whole sea of fire. On this suspended bridge many of the glories of the earth and heaven come out to greet each other and stand beckoning to ship, and shore, and sky, for all the rest of the glories to come and join them. Historians think it worth recording, that, at an ancient feast, a pearl was dissolved in the wine, and drank by a royal woman; but a million pearls are dissolved at this phosphorescent banquet of the deep, around whose board all nations sit drinking. The stars are to drop like blasted figs, and the sun is to be snuffed out; but when the ocean dies, its spirit will arise in white robe of mist, and lie down before the throne of God, "a sea of glass mingled with fire."

IMPROVED SCHOOLS.

COMPARE the qualifications of teachers now with those who presided over our school boy days. It is a wonder that we know anything. We were gadded, and boxed and pulled by the ears, and stood in the corner on one foot, and kept in after school, and given extra lessons to learn. Some of the teachers, no doubt, were well qualified, but others, I remember, were cross and petulant and impatient and revengeful, and ignorant and filthy. I remember our old teacher used to open the school with prayer, putting one foot on the chair, and his elbow on his knee, and his hand over his eyes, but his fingers wide enough apart to see what went on, and seemed more anxious to note the effect of the prayer in the school-room than the effect of his prayer in heaven. Then the school-house was unshaded in summer weather, and was caught between the loose clap-boards in the wintry blast. We all drank out of one tin cup, and sat on benches without backs. I have not one pleasant memory of all my school days, except that connected with the recess and vacation. Let us rejoice that the Protestant inquisition is ended, and that the educational opportunities of to-day are so far in advance of what they were in our childhood. Still, the largest room in the world is the room for improvement, and we owe the grand men and women who preside as teachers in our schools better apartments in which to train and develop the young. Children are sometimes thought to be dull when they are only asphyxiated. An overcrowded school-room is a warm invitation to scarlet fever and measles and diphtheria. Money put in school-houses is money saved from penitentiaries. The best way to lessen our taxes is to pay more money for the intelligence of the people. There is a style of economy which is the worst extravagance. Good schools tend toward empty almshouses. Knowledge lifts. Ignorance depresses. It is no rare thing to find educated scoundrelism, but to the vast majority of the criminal classes, the writing of their own names is a difficult enterprise. When society knows more, it will behave better. The newspaper column which discusses the school question should be read by every citizen, patriot and Christian.

HAPPY INFIDELS.

MY opinion is that the men who have given up the religion of Jesus Christ are the most miserable beings on earth. They try to make you think they are happy; but their anxiety to impress you in that direction creates suspicion in regard to them. They are just as happy as a shipmaster with compass and chart washed overboard and drifting he knows not whither. Just as happy as that. If a man tells me that he is happy when he knows nothing about his eternal destiny, is not even certain there is any future world, and has no assurance for the future, I know that his statement is in direct antagonism with the truth. There never has been a happy infidel. There never will be. Such people may laugh in apparent glee, and caricature sacred things, and joke about God and defy retribution; but they are a bundle of keen and unadulterated wretchedness. Alas! for this religion of "don't know." Are you immortal? "Don't know." Do you think that the soul, in the future state, will have any relation to the body that dies? "Don't know." Will we recognize each other in the next world? "Don't know." Will the spirit in the future state see its Creator? "Don't know." This religion of "don't know" is made up of a hundred ingredients. The first fifty are darkness and the other fifty are midnight.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

E. A. B., Granby, Que. Whence comes the phrase: "Like oil upon the waters?" It is not Scripture.

Some of our readers may be able to answer the question.

George Latham, Fairburn, Ga. What was Judas' transgression and from what did he fall? (Acts 1:25.)

The passage has reference to the treachery of Iscariot, who sold his Divine Master. His fall from the high office of the apostleship and companionship of the Saviour to the blackest depths of degradation and despair, ending in suicide, was without parallel.

"Reader. Has Satan the power to make a man "tired," in order to keep him from church?

Some men may allege this as an excuse for not attending divine service, but it is a "willing excuse," in other words, a mere pretext. We do not believe Satan has power over a man's limbs, certainly not to the extent of preventing him from doing his duty, if he be so minded. If the man is really willing to attend church, diabolic restraint is powerless to stop him. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." (Jas. 4: 7.)

Mrs. S. N. Norwalk, Conn. Is it wicked for parents to rob their children of the privilege of going forward at their conversion to be baptized? If my parents had dedicated me to Christ in infancy by sprinkling, they would have robbed me of the happiest day of my life.

It need not have been so; you could have been baptized by immersion just the same. The previous rite need not have precluded you from the later one. Thousands of persons have been baptized at their conversion who had previously been baptized by sprinkling. The late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is an instance.

Earnest Inquirer, New York. 1. Does Matt. 24 relate to the Jew, Gentile or Church of God? 2. Will Christ come "as a thief in the night" for his church?

1. The chapter relates to the coming of Christ for the "first-fruits." That is, those members of his church who are one with him and are living for him. Worldly Christians will be left behind to go through the great tribulation which is described in the same chapter. The removal of the first-fruits takes place when he comes into the air, not when he comes to the earth. 2. That coming will be secret as a thief in the night. The other and later coming will be with great glory.

Savington Starrell, Cleveland, O. How did the ancient Jews make their money? Of what did it consist?

Authorities state that from the earliest time, silver was used by the Jews as a medium of commerce, and that a fixed weight was assigned to single pieces, so as to make them suitable for the various purposes of trade. In later times, a distinct allusion to coined money appears in the Apocrypha, where it is narrated in the first book of Maccabees, that Antiochuseth the VII. granted to Simon the Maccabee, permission to coin money with his own stamp. This coin was the shekel made of silver, and bore no head, the Jews being the worshippers of the one only true God; hence idolatry was strictly forbidden in their law. It was impressed simply with the almond rod and the pot of manna. Gold was only used for ornaments.

Jos. A. Underdown, Ozark, Mo., and others. When, where, and by whom was the first prayer-meeting organized?

Prayer is as old as the human race itself, and the first public assemblage for this purpose, however small, occurred at a period beyond the reach of history. The first Christian prayer meetings, however, are mentioned in Acts 16:15, as having taken place at a rural spot, "by a river side where prayer was wont to be made." This was only a few years after the crucifixion of Christ, and at a time when the church was in the early formative stage. But it is quite certain that there were earlier prayer meetings, although unrecorded. In Acts 2:1, the gathering "with one accord" was doubtless for prayer among other spiritual purposes. At the houses of the disciples, in secret places and at their own homes, the apostles and worshippers met for this purpose.

W. H. Dodd, Raleigh, N. C. Can you inform me of the name, author and date of publication of the first Sunday School music book with notes published in the United States.

Mr. Hubert P. Main, the well-known hymn writer and composer, and an authority on hymnology, writes in answer to the above:

So far as I have been able to learn, the first Sunday School music book published in the United States was called "Sabbath School Psalmody," and was issued by Ezra Barrett, Boston, 1828. I had two copies, one as above, and a second edition, copyrighted 1829. Title-page dated 1830. The next I found was "Sabbath School Harp," 1834, by Lowell Mason, Boston. The third, "Union Melodies," 1836, S. B. Pond, New York. Since that time hundreds of collections have appeared.

Carrie, Rome, Ga. I know a young minister who is engaged to a lovely, sweet, accomplished young lady. Their dispositions blend perfectly, and their social standing is equally high. They are devoted to each other, but he continues to put off the wedding day secretly because she is not a professing Christian. Is he doing right? Should he not pay his vows and then let his Christian influence bear upon her?

We cannot say that he is doing right, as his course is weak and vacillating. We do not, however, think the course you suggest would be right. To pay his vow would involve his violating the Apostolic injunction (II. Cor. 6: 14), and the fact of his wife not being a Christian would be a constant hindrance and embarrassment to him in his work. It is not at all certain that she would become a Christian after marriage. The minister is in an unpleasant dilemma as the result of his engagement. His conscience and his inclinations are doubtless in conflict. He probably hopes that he will be rescued by the lady becoming a Christian. If she does not, he will have either to marry her and violate his conscience, or break the engagement and be false to his vow.

John A. Johnson, Peapack, N. J. 1. Where and how did the Apostles of Jesus Christ die? 2. Is there any book giving an account of their lives and deaths?

1. According to ancient authorities and tradition, Peter was crucified at Rome, Bartholomew crucified at Albanopolis, in Armenia Minor; James the Elder (the first apostolic martyr), beheaded; Andrew, crucified in Achaia for refusing to sacrifice to idols; Philip tortured at Hierapolis, from the effects of which he died; Thomas killed by a lance in the hands of persecutors, either in India or Persia, and Simon Zelotes crucified in Judea, under Domitian. John escaped martyrdom, although he is said to have been made to drink hemlock, which proved powerless to kill him. There is a tradition that Matthew was martyred, but it is probably unfounded. He, as well as Nathaniel, and James the Less, seems to have died a natural death. The fate of Judas Iscariot, the betrayer, is notorious. 2. A "Biography of the Apostles" is published in London, which you may be able to order through Fleming H. Revell Company, publishers, N. Y.

Mrs. Cyrus Cole, Athens, N. Y. We have many similar appeals from different quarters and only regret our inability to aid.——Mrs. J. S. Leslie, Bailey, Tex. Write to J. E. Jewett, bookseller, Bible House, N. Y.——Subscriber, Oakesdale, Mich. Any relation, social or otherwise, that encourages habits of dissipation and social irregularities, is to be avoided. If in addition to these objections, there is a distinctly anti-Christian influence, it is clearly to be condemned.——William Skinner, Dallas, Tex. 1. It does not seem to be "a work of necessity," and as such, permissible. If you represent it rightly, it is inexcusable in one who professes to be a Christian. 2. Yes.——J. W. L. Porter, Ogden, Mich. Dr. Talmage preaches without any notes, written or printed.——W. H. Dodd, Raleigh, N. C. What you refer to as the "design" in the centre of the olive wood souvenir, which we sent you, is the natural color and markings of the heart of the wood, and not artificial at all. Some of these convolutions are very beautiful and artistic.——J. C. Atkisson, Milan, Tenn. Consult a reliable physician.——A. B. Keating, Argola, Ala. It probably relates to an incident in the time of the Papal Inquisition, when many converts from the Roman Church to Protestantism became martyrs. Probably some of our readers may be able to inform you as to the authorship of "The Romish Lady."——Mrs. A. J. D. Foster, Glasgow, Ky. Our arrangements for music, being made far in advance, prevent us from complying with your request.——J. A. Spence, Pleasant Hill, Ala. 1. The speeches made at the Congress of Religions will shortly be published in volume. 2. The Korean wonders are doubtless largely legendary or mythical.——John Gowan, Mocksville, N. C. Write to J. E. Jewett, bookseller, Bible House, New York. 2. Four, of whom two are married. 3. Methodist.——Mrs. C. H. Leland, Holliston, Mass. Send back numbers to Isaac M. Washburn, Shrewsbury, Ky.——Sophie A. Hurd, Lancaster, Wis. It is not published in this country. Write to editor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 20 Tudor St., London, E. C.——Mrs. Jane Edwards, Broken Bow, Neb. If Dr. Murdoch be a Presbyterian missionary, write to the Secretary, Presbyterian Board, 43 Fifth Ave., New York.——L. L. Frank, Louisville, Ky. 1. No; under certain conditions it may be entirely proper. 2. No. 3. Probably only a few hours.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE CRADLE OF CHOLERA.

CHOLERA'S reappearance in several European cities renews public interest in the investigations of scientists of the origin of the dreaded plague. The march of the disease has been traced backward along two lines to its sources. It was noticed that it had a religious connection in both cases. Mohammedans and Hindoos were the bearers of the fatal microbes, which produce the malady and the fiercest outbreaks followed their religious gatherings. When the Mohammedan pilgrims return from Mecca and when the Hindoo pilgrims return from the sacred bathing places of the Ganges about Hurdwar, an outbreak of cholera usually takes place in the villages in which the pilgrims live. It is therefore legitimate to infer that it is from Mecca and Hurdwar that the cholera comes. The filthy wells and unsanitary conditions of Mecca have often been described and it appears that Hurdwar is like it, if not worse. Ordinarily, Hurdwar and the adjacent villages have an aggregate population of only thirty thousand souls, but at the great festival more than a million persons from all parts of India assemble there. They go to bathe in the Ganges and to drink of its waters, both acts being regarded as of peculiar sanctity. Day after day they pass in a continuous line through the river, from dawn until sunset, more than five hundred persons being in the water at the same time. At night every space capable of accommodating a human being is filled. On every roof and balcony, in every out-house and hovel and tent, the pilgrims herd as closely as they can be packed. In the morning they swarm at the high building called a ghat, where wide flights of steps lead into the river. The filth on the steps and in the sluggish water, which collects in the little bay at their foot, is indescribable. Specimens of the water at that place have been analyzed and have been found to be full of microbes. It is no wonder that the people who bathe in it and drink it go away with the seeds of the plague in their bodies and afterward die of cholera and infect others. Thus in trying to gain sanctity from the river, they contract the fatal disease and so the river becomes the exact contrast of that river which was seen by Ezekiel and John, which caused everything to have new life wherever it went (Ezek. 47: 9) and gave access to the tree of life which gave healing to the nations. (Rev. 22: 2.)

A Biologist's Discovery.

A scientific correspondent of a New York journal reports that a recent discovery by Prof. Burdon Sanderson destroys the hopes that have been entertained of finding the secret of the principle of life. The dream of the ancient alchemists that eventually they would find the liquid or the gas which would restore youth and perpetuate life through the centuries seemed to some biologists on the eve of realization. Prof. Sanderson, who is regarded as the greatest living biologist, has now, however, extinguished these hopes. He declares that the processes of secretion are not, as is generally believed, attributable to liquid diffusion, but to the specific energy of the cells. In other words, the principle of life is in the human organs and not in anything that can be taken into the body. From the time when the cellular principle of all life was discovered the search for the vital essence has been carried forward with an energy unknown since the days of the alchemists, for the clue to the mystery was believed to have been found. There is now, if the great biologist is right, no use in carrying the investigation further, for the greatest of all mysteries can never be discovered. It is a pity that those who have been so ardently searching for the secret do not go to Christ, who has promised to those who believe in him, not perpetual life here, but the greater boon of eternal life beyond the grave. (Mark 10 : 30.)

A Captive of Affection.

A letter from a Belgian officer now in the Congo Free State contains a pathetic story of friendship. The Belgian forces engaged in suppressing the slave trade became aware that some white man was with the Arabs. When the Arab commander had occasion to communicate with the Belgian force, letters were sent which were evidently not written by any Arab. It was remembered that six months previously, two employes of the Congo State had mysteriously disappeared and it was conjectured that one of them was the writer of the letters. A short time ago, the Arabs desired a conference with the whites and a message was sent to the leader of the Belgian force, appointing a meeting-place. A river ran between the two armies and the conference was to be conducted in shouts across the river. The Belgian officer at once recognized, in the speaker for the Arabs, one of the missing employes. Asking how he came there, he received the reply that he and his companion had been taken prisoners and had been been brutally treated. They did not know from one day to another when they would be killed. The man said that his fellow-prisoner was then sick from ill-usage. The officer summoned a company of his best marksmen and stationed them in the long grass by the riverside. He then told the prisoner to jump into the river and swim across, and the marksmen would take care that no Arab should molest him. The prisoner hesitated a moment and then refused. He said that if he did so the Arabs would revenge themselves on his companion. The officer urged him to secure his own liberty, but he shook his head and they saw him walk wearily away from the river-bank toward the Arab camp. He was going back as he knew, to slavery and death, but he would not purchase his liberty at the cost of his fellow-prisoner. We can admire a man who showed such devotion to his friend, but how little do men think of the love of Christ who while we were yet enemies died for us. (Rom. 5: 10.)

The Cradle of the Cholera.—Pilgrims Bathing in the Holy Pool, Hurdwar, India.

Edible or Poisonous.

As about a dozen persons have died recently in New York from eating poisonous toadstools, under the impression that they were mushrooms, the warning of the Chief of the Agricultural Station at New Haven, Conn., deserves special attention. He says that the tests usually applied to distinguish the wholesome from the poisonous growth, are unreliable. It has been supposed that they could be distinguished by the cap, the ease with which the upper surface could be pealed off and the discoloration of silver if inserted in the pan during cooking. None of these tests, Dr. Sturgis says, are sure. There are but two differences which absolutely determine the character of the fungi. One is the color of the seed, or spores, contained within the gills, under the cap. In the wholesome mushroom they are pink, brown or purple; in the poisonous variety they are white. The second difference refers to the root. If the fungus has a ring about the stem and grows out of a bulbous cup with ragged edges it is certainly poisonous. The general appearance of the two kinds is so much alike that only by the root and the seed can the true nature of the fungus be determined. It is so with spiritual food. Much is now being offered that is injurious, yet it is so like the beneficial that it is often mistaken for it. The safe test is to see if it has its root in Christ or if, as the prophet said, "they speak a vision out of their own heart and not out of the mouth of the Lord." (Jer. 23: 16.)

The Reversible Waterfall.

An interesting phenomenon is described in an article by Gustav Robbe in the current number of Scribner's Magazine. Writing of "The Tides of the Bay of Fundy," he says that the difference between high and low water is so great as to seem incredible to one who has not actually seen it. At Petitcodiac it is no less than seventy feet. At St. Johns, New Brunswick, where the St. Johns River falls into the Bay, the tide often rises twenty-four feet, and it is there that the curious phenomenon of a reversible waterfall exists. There is a beautiful gorge at that point, through which in remote ages the river seems to have forced its way. Between tides the surface of the river and that of the bay are level, and vessels pass easily either way through the gorge. But as the tide rises, the water in the bay is high above the river and at high tide, rushing through the gorge, pours into the river in a beautiful cascade. Then the ebb begins and again there comes a placid interval, when, for twenty minutes, the passage is smooth and tranquil. As the ebb continues, the water in the bay becomes lower, until, at low tide, the river rushing through the gorge at the rate of twenty-five knots an hour, strikes a large rock and, spreading out in graceful curves, falls into the bay. Thus, at intervals of about five and one-half hours, there are waterfalls there, running alternately in opposite directions. An analogous phenomenon is witnessed in Christian work. The man who helps others, from whose soul there flows a tide of blessing, receives blessing into his own soul. "He that watereth is watered also himself."(Prov. 11:25)

A Route for Sunlight.

The captain of the tank steamer Kasbek, now loading at Philadelphia, contrived an ingenious method of solving a difficult problem, while his vessel was waiting for its cargo. A break had been discovered in one of the lowest tanks, in which the steamer carries oil in bulk. It was necessary to have it repaired, but it was a difficult task, which could not be done in the dark. No lamp could be used because of the danger of an explosion, the tanks being full of gas generated from previous cargoes of oil. In this difficulty, the captain determined to make an attempt to get the sunlight down to the hold. He procured a number of highly polished plate glass mirrors and made experiments. After a series of efforts, he succeeded in getting a ray of sunlight reflected right upon the faulty place. In several places the ray had to pass through a manhole less than two feet in diameter, but lenses were placed there, which caught and focalized the ray upon another mirror and so on, from one deck to another, until the faulty place was illuminated. In this unique way the machinists were able to do the work in safety. In all our cities there are dark and squalid places which might be illuminated with heavenly light in a similar way. Sin and misery and early associations intercept God's light from the hearts of the denizens, but they might have it if among them went some who obey the apostolic injunction, and "reflect as a mirror the glory of the Lord."(2.Cor.3:18 R.V.)

BRIEF NOTES.

From our stock of Oxford Teacher's Bibles we have thrown out a case into which a little dust had settled. They are perfect in every respect and are the same as those we used in our Premium Department. We will mail these Bibles, about 500 in number, at One Dollar each to such of our subscribers as may desire to avail themselves of this opportunity.

The number of volumes issued by the American Bible Society during the month of August was 80,024. Since April 1st, 434,308 volumes have been sent out.

It is said that if the United States were supplied with ministers in the same proportion that the heathen world is with missionaries there would be altogether about 275 ministers in the country, a smaller number than there are now in Boston alone.

Dr. Clarence Eberman, formerly of Brooklyn, has received a warm welcome from the Moravian Church at Lancaster, Pa., whose call he recently accepted. The field is a most promising one and Dr. Eberman is hopeful of doing effective work there.

Dr. J. G. Paton, "the Apostle of the New Hebrides," has closed his tour in America. He bade good-by to his many friends at a service in Dr. Charles C. Hall's church in Brooklyn, and thence went to the steamer which is to take him to Scotland, whence he will return to the sphere of labor to which he has given so many years of his life.

Evangelist Harold F. Sayles of Chicago, has been conducting a series of meetings at Deshler, O., with much success. He used the stereopticon with great effect. Crowds came to see the pictures from the country districts and listened attentively to the Gospel addresses. During the meetings seventy-three persons made profession of faith in Christ. The Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. A. B. Wilson is pastor, has received many of them into membership.

Mr. Charles Minor, the English Singing Evangelist, has been holding services in the New York Tombs. The prisoners listened attentively to his sprightly talks and gospel songs. He has also given several delightful talks to the convalescents at Bellevue Hospital. On October 1 he gave his address "From the Stage to the Cross" at Prohibition Park, Staten Island. Dr. Schauffler highly commends his work at the Broome Street Tabernacle. Churches desiring his services can write him at 203 Wilson St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Rev. A. Skoogsbergh, known as "the Swedish Spurgeon," has done excellent work among the Swedes in Chicago in connection with Mr. Moody's work. He has been preaching in the Bethania Norwegian Church to congregations of 1,500 and 2,000. The services have now been transferred to the Moody Church, and continue with unabated interest. Mr. Moody has also the assistance of Henry Varley of London, and Drs. Robertson and Reddell of Glasgow, in addition to his other helpers.

Rev. B. Fay Mills delivered a stirring address at the recent meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in Boston. He declared that as he studied the New Testament he was more and more convinced that the message which the people need to-day is that which John the Baptist proclaimed, which Jesus gave to his disciples and which Paul never ceased to preach, "The kingdom of God has come nigh unto you." Mr. Mills expressed his belief in the duty of carrying out to the letter the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, in giving to them that ask, in resisting not evil, in lending to them that would borrow, in short, in cultivating the spirit of love and renunciation in that discourse.

OVERCOMING OR OVERCOME.

A Sermon Preached in the Clarendon Street Church, Boston, by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D. "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." Rom. 12 : 21.

DR. A. J. GORDON.

HERE is not simply an important text, but also an important principle; conqueror or conquered: victor or vanquished, every one must be. There is no discharge in this warfare and there is no neutrality. Overcome evil, or you will be overcome of evil. You may display a flag of truce, and say, "I do not wish to fight;" but your request will not be heeded. You are in the battle, and overcomer or overcome, which shall it be?

Being Overcome.

I. The secret of being overcome. "Be not overcome of evil." The apostle has just been warning us against wrong states of mind, anger, malice, and revenge. These are to be repressed he says, lest we be overcome with evil. The mind is the man himself, and if you are in a bad state of mind, you are most defeated when outwardly most victorious. Let a Christian whose calling it is to resist not evil, get angry and knock a man down, and really he is himself the one who has been knocked down. The victim of his passion may rise to his feet in a minute or two, but if the Christian gets upon his feet within a week or a month or year, he may count himself fortunate; for the one man has lost his foothold, and the other has lost his character with men, and his communion with God.

It is your own heart that is your greatest foe, O, Christian! If that goes wrong, you are defeated, though outwardly you are the most prosperous and victorious man in the world. Therefore hear the word of the Lord: "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." That is to say, our conduct and character in the world proceed from ourselves as truly as the motion of the watch's hands proceed from the spring which is coiled up within. Temptation cannot hurt us very much from without, unless the heart throws the key out of the window and bids it unlock the doors and come in. Look over your lives and ask how it was that you were overcome with evil at this point and that, and see if it was not the case that your treacherous heart opened the doors and invited the enemy to enter.

The Secret in the Heart.

Jesus Christ was a great teacher on this point. When he saw men all taken up with the business of regulating the externals of life, he exclaimed: "Do you not understand that it is what cometh out of the heart that defileth the man? You may clean the outside of the cup and platter, while within they are full of extortion and excess." As well try to cure a poisoned well by whitewashing the pump through which the water is drawn, as to imagine that one's life can be made right by moral improvement when the heart is unregenerate and unchanged. "Keep your heart with all diligence. Yes: but you cannot do even that much alone. Pray much if you would be safe. "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God; and the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts." Oh wonderful words! "The peace of God shall govern your hearts," the words mean literally, God's holy peace standing as sentinel at the door of every sense; guarding every advance of approach through which temptation might steal in; keeping watch on the tower of hope, until the day dawn and the Lord return to end the battle. This is our confidence and this is our promise. Therefore let us pray daily, "Oh Lord keep my heart for I cannot keep it for thee—deliver me from the Evil One for I cannot deliver myself!"

Heart-conditions have most to do with our [illegible] against such sins as covetousness and worldly lust. If these passions have their way they will determine the life, in spite of all preaching and all practice of a contrary sort. Strong affections determine character.

I was passing the humble cottage of a market gardener some years since, and to my surprise I saw him at work cutting down a most beautiful and luxuriant elm, which grew just on the edge of his land. I remonstrated at such wanton destruction, and he replied: "Yes, I am sorry to do it, sir; but you see I depend upon my garden for a living. And this great tree has been sending out its roots under my little farm and reaching further and further and striking deeper and deeper each year, till now it sucks all the life out of the soil, and leaves nothing for my vegetables; and so I must cut it down, sorry so I am to do so. I must sacrifice a shade-tree or give up gardening." What a parable is here!

The love of money gets possession of some Christian men's heart. It roots itself deeper and more deeply every year in the affections; absorbs more and more of the richest life of the heart, till at length it overtops everything—religion, charity, faith, compassion, hope. These become stunted under its shadow. And some day the Saviour passing that way is as grieved as he was over the barren fig-tree, and exclaims sorrowfully: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven." Good has been overcome of evil: one master-passion has subdued and dried up the sweetest graces and holiest charities of the Christian life. This is a most vital matter for consideration. Never in all her history has the church of Christ been so rich as to-day; nowhere has she ever been so rich as in America. Piles of money mean perils unspeakable to the faith, the humility and unworldliness of Christian life. Look to it every one, whether rich or poor, that ye be not thus overcome and may God give you grace to say: And now the axe is laid at the root of this tree.

Again worldly tastes and inclinations get possession of some Christian. He goes in for fashion and gaiety and Pleasure-seeking.

Ask him what he is doing, and he will say that he is "making the most of both worlds." But soon the wide spreading tree obtains such swing and development, that it is evident that instead of making the best of both worlds, one world is getting the best of him. Faith, hope and charity wither and die within him, and once more you hear the great alternative repeated: "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

Now there is no cure but one—repression and uprooting. "Every plant which my Father hath not planted," says Jesus, "shall be rooted up." Therefore let us look well to what is planted. There is an exotic called charity. Jesus brought it with him from heaven when he came. An eminent church historian declares that he has searched in vain among the hsathen to find any trace of this attribute—Love—pure, unselfish love, coming from the heart of God, and going out without requital to the heart of man. No wonder that Paul in preaching it said, "The greatest of these is charity." This is the plant which our heavenly Father planted. Death cannot pluck it up, the grave cannot chill its roots. It came from heaven to be planted in human lives, and it can be carried back to heaven, developed, enlarged and ripened. Live in Christ by daily prayer and communion, and this will live in you.

But there is another exotic named selfishness. A weed, a tare shall I call it rather? Ask how it first came to be planted in human hearts, and the reply must be, "an enemy hath done it." It was brought from beneath as the other was from above. It is the root of all evil! for all selfishness is sin and all sin is selfishness. Let alone your heart and it will overspread its entire domain. You need not cultivate it; weeds do not require to be nourished or watered. Allow human nature to have its way and this evil principle will overpower all charity, choke all sympathy, shock the life out of kindness and goodness. Let yourself alone, or be let alone of God, and the good in you will be overcome by evil. God forbid that it should be so with any of us.

Overcoming.

II. The secret of overcoming, like the secret of being overcome, lies wholly within. I give it in the words of Scripture: "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world." (1. John 5: 4.) Human nature is not sufficient of itself. A drowning man may grasp his left hand with his right hand, but after all it is self laying hold of self, and both will go to the bottom. What is wanted, is a stronger hand from above, to draw one out of the floods of great waters. And this is what regeneration is; it is the divine laying hold of the human.

In the story of Peter's attempt at walking on the sea, we have a perfect parable of redemption. He saw his Lord walking on the water, and asked permission to try it himself. The Lord said unto Simon, "Come;" and the presumptuous disciple stepped out upon the waves and started to walk to the Lord. But as the wind began to be boisterous, he found himself sinking. Peter's self-sufficiency now gives way to self-despair. He cried out, "Lord save me!" And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand and caught him and said, "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt?" This is exactly what men are always trying to do; to walk on the water with feet adapted only for the earth; i.e., is to do supernatural things with only natural powers; to follow Christ in his divine activity, with only human faculties with which to act. We try it and fail. We get to the end of self and then are saved by Christ.

How beautifully the idea is brought out in the epistle to the Hebrews. "For verily, he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham." It is the same Greek word which is used in the story of Peter. "He took hold of the seed of Abraham." He caught our human nature. When it was sinking in the flood of its own perdition, Christ reached out his hand and seized it. His incarnation was a laying hold of our humanity; and our regeneration is a laying hold of his divinity. This is

The Secret of our Rescue.

As Peter says: "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great promises that by them ye might be partakers of the divine nature having escaped the corruption which is in the world through lust," etc. The flood of perdition, the stream of corruption that was started from Adam's lust and sin in the Garden and has been flowing through the world ever since. You are in it; you were sinking beneath it; but by Christ partaking of your nature, you may be lifted out and saved.

"Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world." Put your finger on this text; hang your confidence upon it as upon a nail fastened in a sure place. Your Adam birth can never save you from the sins of your Adam nature. Only that which is born of God can lift up that which has fallen through sin.

The Apostle John gives us another key of victory over the world. "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God." This is one of the strange paradoxes of the Gospel which puts faith for action. When one asked Jesus, "Good Master, what shall I do to work the works of God?" He replies: "This is the work of God that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." When the frightened jailer of Philippi said to Paul and Silas, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" They replied: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." When John asks the secret of victory, he replies, "This is the victory that overcometh the world even your faith." Thus we see that faith does all, conquers all, gains all. But you may with good reason, ask me to explain this saying of John. How does my conviction that Jesus is the Christ, make me a conqueror over the world? Can one put faith against fact? Can one down with the lusts of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, by simply confronting them with a theological proposition—that of the deity and Messiahship of Jesus Christ? Well!

Put these two texts together for their true explanation of the matter. Christ says: "Be of good cheer,

I Have Overcome."

John says: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." That is because faith links us to Christ, and makes us sharers of all that he is and does. The coupling of the car is a very little thing, and it would seem absurd to say that this coupling makes the train go. But it is so, in precisely the same sense that faith overcomes the world. For by linking the cars to the locomotive, the coupling transfers all the strength and speed of the locomotive to the train. So faith makes me victor over the world, by uniting me with Christ who overcame the world, and makes me partaker of his victory.

Oh, this great enemy self, with its horde of unconquerable lusts and passions—how can I get the victory over it? asks the young man. By faith in Christ, we reply, it is written, "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts" Christ pronounced the doom of these foes on his cross, and though they may still war against us, as certainly as Christ lives, he will make an end of them.

"What matters it," exclaims Martin Luther, though I overcome the Pope, so long as that great pope, self, lords it over me?" But Christ doomed this pope when he died on Calvary. He pronounced his death warrant; "knowing this," says Paul, "that our old man was crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

I cannot close without cheering your hearts by pointing out some of the rewards of overcoming. There are seven such rewards mentioned in the book of Revelation. I have time to dwell only on two. 1. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God." (Rev. 2 : 7.) That means simply Paradise regained for Paradise lost. Our first parents were overcome with evil, and as the penalty they were shut out from the tree of life, while the way was barred by the flaming sword. But access to that tree is now restored. "Blessed are they that wash their robes that they may have right to

The Tree of Life."

Wondrous saying! To eat of that tree, not only permitted, but guaranteed through Christ. Brethren, here we touch "the crown-rights of Immanuel." We shall not be in Paradise by suffrance now, but by equity. He our glorious Redeemer, our mighty kinsman has redeemed the forfeited estate and made it over to us by the title-deed of his blood. As we walk in the Garden of God, and by the pure river of the water of life, we shall not walk abashed as intruders. We may lift up our heads now and rejoice that we are in our Father's domain, having as joint heirs with Christ all the privileges which he himself enjoys. "That they may have right to the tree of life."

2. "He that overcometh and keepeth my words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations, and I will give him the Morning Star." "What is signified by the "Morning Star?" In the 22d chapter of this book it is defined, "I am the bright and morning star," says Jesus. Christ promises then to give himself, to them who overcome. Blessed hope of the faithful! On the cross, Christ gave himself for us; at his coming he will give himself to us. On the cross, he gave himself in humiliation, "his image so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men." At his coming he will give himself in glory, "the King in his beauty," fairer than all the sons of men. This is the sum and crown of all blessedness. Thomas Aquinas, the great theologian says, that he once had a dream in which Christ appeared to him and said, "Thomas, thou hast wrought nobly for me by thy writings; what shall I give thee?" And Thomas replied: "Lord give me thyself, and I shall be satisfied." That is the confession of

A Sincere Disciple.

As Paul said to the Corinthians, "I seek not yours, but you," the consecrated believer will say to Christ, "Lord I seek not thine, but thee." There is a selfish love that desires the goods and gifts of Christ, rather than himself. There are multitudes who want salvation and peace of conscience and the enjoyment of heaven, who care nothing for Christ. To such, the Lord will give neither his gifts, nor himself. We speak with certain contempt of marrying for money—the bride caring only for the millions and nothing for the man. "Wherefore ye are become dead to the law by the body of Christ," says Paul, "that ye should be married to another, even to him that was raised from the dead." But remember that Christ will never be married to any church which cares more for his dowry than for himself. Therefore it is that he puts the cross between himself and us, to prove us whether we love him so much that we are willing to suffer with him, in order to reign with him. If we reign with him, he himself will be our exceeding great reward. On the cross we get Christ for us; from the throne we get Christ in us by the Holy Spirit; at the Coming we shall get Christ with us, in his glory, and we shall see his face and his name shall be in our foreheads.

May the Lord give us that victorious faith by which we shall attain this glorious consummation.

WORK IN SIAM.

Despite the disturbances in Siam and the prejudice against all foreigners which has resulted from the duplicity and wickedness of the French, missionary work continues. Mr. Lewis A. Eaton, of the Baptist Missionary Society, speaks hopefully of the prospects, especially among the Chinese residents at Bangkok. He says: The missionary in his work is brought in contact with all classes of Chinese in the public services, and holds forth to them the word of life. He often receives their consent to listen to him while he reads and explains a portion of Scripture or a tract, and oftentimes their inability to read gains an entrance for the truth into their hearts.

MR. MOODY'S CHICAGO CAMPAIGN.

BY REV. H. B. HARTZLER.

AMONG all the great objects of interest in Chicago at this time, not the least is the remarkable evangelistic movement inaugurated by Mr. D. L. Moody. Perhaps the most remarkable and certainly the most striking and gratifying feature of the whole movement is the almost incredible extent of its constituency. Tributary streams of sympathy and aid are flowing into this great reservoir from every part of our land and other lands beyond the seas. There are living nerves of close connection between this centre of prayer and effort and millions of praying people, constituting a prayer union in evangelistic labors, the like of which has never been known. Thousands of churches, Christian associations, Endeavor Societies, Sunday schools and other Christian organizations, have been drawn into the mighty fellowship of the movement. The results of blessing yet to come from this world-wide fellowship of sympathy, prayer and effort are in calculable.

It has already come to pass, as Mr. Moody hoped and prayed, that souls here converted and Christians quickened, "from all parts of the world, are carrying the fire back with them to their homes." It will be a startling surprise to many to learn how large a proportion of the fifty thousand people who listen to the Gospel every Sunday in the evangelistic meetings consists of World's Fair visitors. Mr. Moody has on several occasions tested the question in his congregations. It was found that of a congregation of some 3,000 souls in the Haymarket Theatre, all save about 200 were from abroad, and of a congregation of 2,000 in one of the churches, only about 100 were Chicagoans! In some of the immense congregations nearly every State in our Union is represented, as well as lands beyond the sea. Well may Mr. Moody speak and pray for ten thousand holy conflagrations to be kindled over the face of the earth from the fire carried away in quickened hearts from these meetings.

Sunday, September 17, was a memorable day of the campaign. On the evening of that day as the evangelists, one by one, came into headquarters office at the Bible Institute and with shining faces reported the work of the day, Mr. Moody broke in with thanksgiving—"Thank God! Thank God!" He said it was the best day of all the four and a half months' campaign, and the best Sunday he had experienced in Chicago. "It was a day of great grace and blessing. There was more melting Divine power in every one of my meetings than ever before. The people just melted down under the power of God."

As usual, in some of the places the overflow of people was great enough to have filled other large halls with hungry-hearted hearers. Not less than sixty-four different meetings were held in forty-six places during the day, with a carefully estimated aggregate attendance of from 62,000 to 64,000 hearers, which is about 10,000 more than any previous Sunday. Among the important centres of operation now occupied, in addition to the nine large churches and the five large tents, are the Central Music Hall, where daily meetings are held from 11 to 1 o'clock, addressed by Mr. Moody and Dr. John McNeill, and others; the Haymarket, the Standard, the Columbian Sunday School building, the Hotel Epworth Tabernacle, the Hotel Endeavor Tabernacle, Holmes Hall, Institute Hall, and the Bible Institute. No more successful soul-saving work has ever been done in Chicago than that which is being done in the theatres, halls and tents. It is astonishing how the "lapsed masses" and the "lost masses" are laid hold of in these places.

PEOPLE AGAINST PRIEST.

Writing of his work in the Syrian Mission to the Church at Home and Abroad, Rev. F. W. March thus describes an incident of a recent tour: At Jibrail, near Beinu, I was spending the evening at the sheikh's house, when the village priest came to call on me. He was in a very bad temper and complained bitterly of our teacher and the school, saying that the children no longer attend church. I asked the teacher about the matter and he said it was quite true; the children had studied the Bible and heard it explained, and of their own accord had decided that the Greek Church was wrong and that they would have no more to do with it. The parents of the children, moreover, sympathized with them. Then followed an angry discussion between the priest, the sheikh and others present, in which the priest was quite alone in his views. They laid down the law to him to the effect that the school was a good school and should remain; that religion was a matter touching the conscience of every man, and that whoever wished to become a Protestant was perfectly free to do so.

PASSING AWAY.*

THE sound of the Gospel is passing away:
The days of probation are ending.
Oh, who will return to the Saviour to-day,
While the prayers of the saints are ascending?

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
Long, long has it lingered around us;
How sweet, when in childhood it taught us to pray:
Alas! we're to-day where it found us!

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
It rose on the wings of the morning;
When my holy sire, bid his family pray,
And left them in tears his last warning.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
The sound that enraptured my mother;
It fell on her ear like a sweet seraph's lay;—
Now, falls on the ear of another.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
The offers of mercy are closing,—
Ten thousand are gone, who've refused to obey,
And are under tombstones reposing.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
Soon, soon shall its warning be over,
And graves hold their dead 'till the great judgment day
Shall the doom of creation be over.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
It rose on the four wings of heaven;
Creation now dawns with millennium day,
And the world's final warning is given.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
Oh, God! sound its last notes in thunder;
Let peal after peal rouse the sinner to-day,
To flee from the wrath he is under.

The sound of the Gospel is passing away,
And bringing the saints into glory.
Hail! mighty Redeemer; Oh! where shall we stay
And shout hallelujah before Thee.

THE YEAR-DAYS.

Why a Prophetic Day is Believed to Indicate a Year of Actual Time

BY S. ARTHUR BLACKWOOD.

THE principle of calculating the length of periods in prophecy on the scale of a day to a Jewish year of 360 days, a month thirty years; and 1260 days, or 42 months, 1260 years, is based on the following grounds:

1. In a symbolic prophecy it would clearly be incongruous, or out of keeping with the rest of the revelation if, while all the events prefigured therein were conveyed by means of hieroglyphs, the chronological periods contained in it were described by literal terms. It is, to say the least, a reasonable assumption that the same method would be employed in both cases.

2. Such a method would be specially adapted to secure the double object of the prophecy, viz., to conceal while revealing, and to reveal while concealing. This was essential to the evident purpose of God that the Church should be kept in a state of constant watchfulness and expectation of her Lord's return. Yet he knew himself, as we all know now, that nearly two thousand years would intervene between the departure and the return of the Lord Jesus Christ. To have stated this plainly in the prophecy which foretold in enigmatical language the history of that long interval, would at once have deprived the early Christians of the incentive to watchfulness; for they would naturally have argued that there could be no possible advantage in watching for an event which Christ had told them could not occur for many centuries. By employing a hieroglyph, the meaning of which would not be, and, indeed, was not, apprehended for a very long time, to describe the periods which were to be the measure of certain events in history, the truth was revealed, as by all other symbols in the Apocalypse, and at the same time concealed from those whose watchful condition of soul depended upon their being ignorant of the duration of this dispensation.

3. Taking, then, for granted, that in order to attain these two objects—namely, the harmonious principle of construction, a composition of the prophecy (that is, by the uniform employment of symbols) and the concealment from those from whom it was important to conceal the length of the dispensation, the next position to be established is that of the suitability of the symbol used to denote chronological periods. Now it is clear that the symbol must be on the same scale as other symbols employed. The scale observed in the Revelation is a minature one. A great empire is represented by a wild beast, a kingdom or dynasty by a horn, the Church by a woman, and so on. To have adopted a totally different scale in describing periods of duration from that employed to denote the events occurring during such periods would evidently been a complete violation of the harmony of the book. The scale must be proportionate; and to signify a year by a day, or its 360th part, is the employment of the same minature scale of representation which applies to the scenery of the great drama. The period of the lesser revolution of the earth, a day, is used as the symbol of the greater, a year.

4. The use of a day to represent a year was one which could be gathered from other Scriptures. Thus we find that the sentence on Israel in the desert ran as follows:—"After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." (Num. 14:34.) As the twelve men were types of the twelve tribes, so the forty days were typical, a representative of the forty years. Again, Ezekiel is commanded to enact a type, to become himself a living emblem of the house of Israel, by lying first on his left side for three hundred and ninety days, and then on his right side for forty days (Ezek. 4:4). The prophet was a type of the nation, his recumbent position a type of its degradation; and as he was a minature emblem of a large nation, so the days were a brief emblem of a long period. Therefore it is said to him, "I have appointed thee a day for a year, a day for a year." Once more, if not absolutely as certain, it is extremely probable that our lord adopted the same symbolic kind of expression when announcing "that fox" Herod the duration of his ministry, which was three years, he says: "I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected. I must walk to-day and to-morrow and the day following") Luke 13:32, 33). It certainly was not literal days that our Lord meant. Did he not employ the term in the typical or symbolic sense?

CHRISTIAN COURTESY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 22. Rom. 12 : 10-15. Philippians 2 : 2-5.

WHAT the difference between a gentleman and a boor is, many have attempted to define. Some have thought that it consisted in wealth and that a gentleman is one who does not work for his living, while he who does work is not a gentleman. Others have contended that the difference is in dress and that loud and showy clothes, as much as shabby clothes, indicate that the wearer is not a gentlemen. Not quite so superficial is the idea that a gentleman may be known by his manners. If he knows how to behave at table and in social gatherings and is not guilty of rudeness, or incivility, there is a presumption that he is a gentleman. In some circles of society there is an unwritten, but clearly defined code of laws, to transgress any of which involves the penalty of being branded as, "no gentleman." It is "bad form" to do this or that, or to neglect doing some other thing. All these distinctions, however, are extraneous to the man, himself. Napoleon said, "If you scrape the Russian, you will find a Tartar" and if a man with fine clothes and elegant manners be stripped of them it is possible that underneath may be exposed a very mean, contemptible creature, to whom it would be absurd to apply the title of gentleman. The meanest motives may impel a man to acquire these outer distinctions, which give him a place in society, while he continues at heart vulgar and ignoble.

Infinitely more radical is the Apostle's idea of true nobility. The man who lives up to it cannot fail of being a gentleman in the true sense of the word, though he be the poorest of the poor and has not the faintest conception of the etiquette of society. Such a man is of necessity a good citizen, a good servant or employer, and a good neighbor. He inspires respect; he can be safely trusted; he injures no man and helps many; and those who know him best have the highest regard for him. There is no need for such a man to study how to fulfill the laws of social life, he does spontaneously the things which lie at the foundation of social duty. The disposition inculcated in both the passages chosen for the topic is a motive spring, which produces harmonious action. It is the extirpation of selfishness in all its forms, and the cultivation of love and kindness. Thus Christian courtesy differs from ordinary social courtesy in being deep seated. It springs from the heart. There evil is abhorred and good entertained. Pride, vanity, conceit, jealousy, envy, ambition—all the vile crew which bring misery to every man who harbors them in his breast and make him a plague in society, are banished. In their place are the humility that prefers others for honorable positions, the magnanimity that does not retaliate, but renders blessings for curses, the sympathy that rejoices with those who rejoice and weeps with those who weep and the helpfulness that looks not on personal interests, but on the needs of others. A society composed of such men and women would have attained the highest civilization. When we realize that it was "this mind which was in Jesus Christ," we pray with all earnestness, Let thy kingdom come."

A STATE SUPERINTENDENT'S WORK.

An excellent suggestion to State Superintendents of Christian Endeavor comes to us from Mr. W. G. Bell of Austin, Texas. Our C. E. friends of that state have appointed a [illegible] the purpose of extending the work. Mr. Bell, [illegible] letter printed which he is mailing to every pastor in his district, making inquiries. Among the questions are the following: "Have you a Young People's Society, connected with your church? If you have none, would you like to organize one? Are there any Christian Endeavor Societies in your town? If so, would you kindly [illegible] presidents?". The letter concludes with an offer to pastors who have no society of assistance in organizing one and a cordial invitation to the District Convention. Mr. Bell says that the results of this appeal have already been very encouraging and he recommends the plan to any superintendents who have not yet tried it

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

At the recent conference of Missouri, seventy Leagues were represented, with an aggregate membership of 2,358.—The American University, of Washington, D. C., has received a gift of five hundred dollars from a League on the Pacific Coast.—It is expected that at the next general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the League will be fully organized with a League journal, a General Secretary and a Board of Counselors.—At the Indiana State League Convention a total of 701 chapters reported. Of these, 479 were Senior and 222 were Junior. The total membership was given at 39,467. The male membership is 16,350, and the female 23,117. The State Secretary said that the duties of his office had involved his traveling 12,300 miles.—There are more than seventy members of the League at Singapore, Malasia.—A cabinet meeting of the League is to be held immediately on the return of Bishop Fitzgerald from his Southern tour, probably in February.—Ten chapters have been organized in Italy. The constitutions are in Italian and a special pin is being made to properly initialize the Italian name for the League, Lega Epworth.—The Chadron District of Northwest Nebraska, although containing a Methodist membership of only 1,689, has 22 chapters, with an aggregate membership of over 600. The numbers are double what they were a year ago.—A chapter has been organized in Mexico and named Epigmenis Monroy, after the famous martyr of the Methodist Episcopal Mission.—The books for the reading course are now ready. They meet with general approval this year, although in some quarters the wish is expressed that a wider range of subjects had been covered.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

The third annual convention of the Baptist Young People's Unions of Colorado, will be held Oct. 10, in the Calvary Church, Denver. As many eminent ministers will be in the city attending the State Convention, a very profitable time is expected.——The Baptist Young People's Union at Milwaukee at its last meeting elected the following officers: President, E. W. Drake; Vice-President, E W. Bond; Secretary, A. O. Rittman; Treasurer, H. Miller. The executive committee is Arthur Bradley, Fred Dixon, Frank Moody, Edward Ellis, A. M. Miller and B. Favorite. Max Hintz is chairman on visitation.——The Brooklyn Unions have decided to continue the work at the Bethel Mission. They have sole charge of furnishing workers and paying all expenses except the rent, which is defrayed by the Church Extension Society. Mr. John Hooper will preach there on Sunday and Wednesday evenings, succeeding Mr. Norman W. Keyes, who has been called to another field. A lady missionary will also be employed in house-to-house work. It is proposed, if the funds are contributed, to establish an Industrial School and a Reading-room.——Leaders have been found for the three Christian Culture Courses. Professor Ira M. Price, and Dr. David Spencer, of Racine, Wis., will conduct the Bible Readers' Course; Mrs. Sophia Bronson Titterington, the Missionary Course, and Mr. Vedder, the Sacred Literature Course.——A profitable meeting as to both its spiritual and financial results took place a few days ago in the offices of Mr. Frank Harvey Field, in New York. President Chapman was in the city and gave a short talk about the prospects of the Union and its needs to a small company of friends, hastily invited to meet him. Among them were: Gen. T. J. Morgan, Dr. A. S. Hobart, H. C. Vedder, Rev. W. J. Sholar, Rev. J. G. Ditmars and Professor Hale. Pledges of help were given which were very encouraging to the President of the Union.

THE DES MOINES Y. M. C. A.

On this page is a picture of the handsome building now occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association of Des Moines, Iowa. The Association has just attained its majority, having been organized in 1872. It has a membership of 544, of whom 171 are on the active list. It has a well selected library of about five hundred volumes, a reading room and a spacious and well-equipped gymnasium, with baths, etc. The new building covers an area of 70 by 120 feet, and is centrally located. Its total cost, with the lot on which it stands, was nearly a hundred thousand dollars. So energetically, however, have these young men worked, and so liberal has been the response to their appeals, that the amount paid and the pledges given make an aggregate only ten thousand dollars short of covering the whole amount.

A KING'S DAUGHTER'S EFFORT.

A noble effort is being made at Bessemer, Va., by Mrs. John A. Pettigrew and her sisters in the Order of King's Daughters. There is no place of worship in that district, not even a Sunday School room. The King's Daughters are working hard to erect a modest building which might be used for divine service as a union church of all denominations. They are a small band, but they are earnest of purpose and will surely succeed. Mrs. Pettigrew thinks that if members of the Order in other cities were made aware of the existing spiritual destitution and the effort being made, they would possibly be willing to send some help for the erection of the King's Daughters' church.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN THE GERMAN ARMY.

A strong testimony to the value of the Young Men's Christian Association is given by Count A. Bernstorff. In an article by him in the Young Men's Era, he says: The mission to the soldiers is a special feature of Young Men's Christian Association work in Germany. There are two distinct factors in connection with this work which operate very much in our favor. One of them is that our government is just a little afraid that the soldiers may imbibe the socialist sentiment and teachings which are being assiduously spread through the country. Owing to this they are glad to have religious influences spread among them and anything which will absorb their attention. In the second place, we have a most excellent officer in Berlin—the chief of the army chaplains. He has displayed admirable judgment in the choice of under chaplains, and exercises great influence over the soldiery. His sympathies are enlisted in our behalf with very marked and gratifying effect. Through his efforts many of the soldiers are brought within the influence of the association. Many of the officers also interest themselves in the work, especially in the temperance movement and in the organization of Bible classes and are thus brought under spiritual influence. When some are interested others come and thus the circle widens. A class of men among whom we have been enabled to do good work are the orderlies or officers' servants. Special services are held in the association building afternoons and evenings and are well attended. Some of these services are religious and some of social nature. But on the whole, I think, the Bible classes are the chief centres of interest.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavor Committee of the Presbytery of St. Paul, Minn., has arranged for the benefit of the Endeavor Societies throughout the presbytery, a very attractive course of lectures.

Endeavorers in Denver have established a free employmeht bureau in the basement of a church, were some of the society are constantly on hand. The Societies in the city have passed resolutions urging the Mayor and police to close the gambling houses.

The young people of all churches are asked to join in prayer on Oct. 12, for the 10,000,000 young women of this conntry, of whom not more than half are Christians. This Day of Prayer has been observed by the International Young Women's Christian Association for several years.

The Epworth League of Burlington, Kans., heard that the property of an aged Methodist minister was to be sold for taxes. Knowing that, if it was sold, the minister and his venerable wife would be homeless, the League proposed to redeem it if the money could be raised. A committee was appointed to carry the project through.

The project of erecting an Epworth Home on the camp-meeting ground at Lancaster will be carried out. At the recent convention instructions were given to a committee to raise, $200 to add to the $230 already raised to build the home. A great many of the leaguers are enthusiastic over the prospects of having headquarters of their own on the camp-ground before the next meeting.

The date of the Cleveland C. E. Convention of 1894 is fixed for July 11–15. One of the interesting features will be the awarding of certain diplomas, twenty-five of which will be given to societies reporting the largest number of pledged proportionate systematic givers in their membership. Twenty-five more will go to the societies forming the largest number of societies during the year, and a banner will be given to the local union that gains the greatest number of societies during the year.

As a result of the suggestion that juniors in the Christian Endeavor Societies of America should write to Australian juniors, one society in Adelaide received sixteen letters in one day. The Golden Link of Australia urges regular early Sunday morning Christian Endeavor prayer meetings. "Only a few, the more earnest ones, will attend," it says, "but for spiritual refreshing and power you will find no meeting equal to this. The self-denial involved will not only give a zest to that particular meeting, but will carry its sweet reward into all the the subsequent services of the day."

From the English Year-Book of Y. M. C. A.'s issued from Exeter Hall, we learn that in the British Isles the movement is represented at 843 centres, has 597 associations reporting, and (approximately) 87,464 members. As compared with last year centres have decreased by three, but members have increased by about 3,500. In ten years associations, membership, and current income have more than doubled, while the number of associations occupying buildings which are their own property has more than quadrupled. Some twenty-six other countries are accounted for in the report.

Laplanders at the Fair.

A Colony of Queer Little People who come from Afar to see Our Western Wonders.

AMID the many picturesque features of the Midway Plaisance at the World's Fair, there are few that attract a larger number of interested spectators than the Lapland Village, whose deminutive people have come from a country, bleak and unlovely, to swell the grand panorama of nations and peoples at the greatest of all world-pageants. Their village lies to the right on entering the Plaisance at Cottage Grove Avenue, and there the little colony, under the chieftainship of a dignified Lapp, known as "King Bull," have passed a very pleasant and profitable summer, notwithstanding the severe climatic change from an almost Arctic country to a temperature sometimes semi-tropical. They number about twenty-five or thirty in the settlement, and this includes seven Swedish singing girls from the ancient province of Dalecarlia. Very quiet and peaceable are these Lapps; indeed after listening to the clatter and jargon in some of the other villages, one cannot help being struck with the stillness of the Lapland settlement, which is broken only by the occasional jingling of the deer-bells or the soft crooning of some Northern mother, as she hushes her baby to sleep.

The Lapps are veritable nomads—like the Arabs—and are ever moving. Likely enough, it is a novel experience for them to be stationary as long as they have now been, at Jackson Park. Their wandering habits, however, do not seem to interfere with their health, for they are probably the longest-lived people in the world. "King Bull," who is somewhere between 70 and 80 years of age, seems to be less than sixty, while his wife, who is ninety-three, looks quite as young as he. She is a very clever woman and a devout member of the Lutheran Church, an official of which accompanies the party. In the illustrations on this page some glimpses are afforded of life in the Lapp village. The two tepees, or tents, shown in the first picture are very different structures, the lighter one, composed of dog-skin or the hides of reindeer, being for summer use, while the stouter structure, which is heavily sodded and built quite to the ground, is a winter tepee. As in Indian tepees, the fire is built in the middle of the tent and the smoke escapes through the roof. Another illustration shows "King Bull," who is about to take a sled ride with his wife. The companion or guide who accompanies them, wears the "skis," or snow-shoes common to all the Arctic people. "King Bull's" reindeer are specially cared for, and he imported a large quantity of "Iceland moss" from Norway and Lapland, this being their principal food. In still another picture a Lapp mother in the national dress is seen rocking her babe to sleep, the cradle being swung from a tree branch. There is something delightfully simple and rustic about this little group which recalls the "Dream Tree" of the quaint old German nursery, "Schlaf-Lied," or "Slumber Song." The last of the illustrations is a portrait of a typical Lapland maiden of seventeen years.

These people vary in complexion from a swarthy copper hue to yellow, and their hair from auburn to a bluish black. The Lapps have a rather dreary country, it is true, but in the month of May it is a land full of buds and blossoms and flowers. In July their fishing and hunting season begins, fruit is ripe, mosquitoes are every-where in the lowlands, and the rivers and streams are in flood. In the month of October the great reindeer hunts are inaugurated and the men begin to lay up their family store of winter meat. In December the bears and the wolves become the game of the hunters. The Lapps are in the main a frugal, temperate people. Their chief food consistes of meat, fish, rye and barley cakes and milk, and the doors of their njallas (houses) are always hospitably open to the stranger. In all they number probably less than 30,000, and are distributed over Norway, Sweden, and Finland.

Manhood's Foundation.

"Truth, my son, is the only foundation on which manhood can be erected," writes Bishop Dudley; "for otherwise, no matter how beautiful the upper stories may be, and no matter of how good material they may be built, the edifice, the character, the manhood, will be but a sham which offers no sure refuge and protection to those who seek it, for it will tumble down when the trial comes. Alas! my boy, the world is very full of such shams of manhood in every profession and occupation. Now I want you to be a man, and that you may be that, I want you to be first thoroughly true. I hope you would scorn to tell a lie, but that is only the beginning of truthfulness. I want you to despise all sham, all effort to seem to be otherwise than you are."

A New Hebrides' Bride.

In his autobiography Rev. J. G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides gives this amusing description of a native bride's first visit to church.

"Nelwang, (the groom), came first, after all the worshippers were seated, dressed in shirt and kilt, grasping determinedly his tomahawk, an unusual accompaniment certainly of public worship. In a few seconds Yakin (the bride), entered. Yakin resolved to show the extent of her Christianity by the amount of clothes she could carry upon her person. She had some idea of state occasions, and appeared dressed in every article of European apparel, (mostly portions of male attire) that she could beg or borrow. Her bridal gown was a man's drab-colored, great-coat, buttoned tight above her native grass skirts, and sweeping down to her heels. Over this she had hung a vest, and above that again, most amazing of all, she had superinduced a pair of men's trousers, drawing the body over her head, leaving a leg dangling gracefully over her shoulders, and streaming down her back. Fastened to the one shoulder, also, there was a red shirt, and to the other a striped shirt, waving about her like wings as she sailed along. Around her head a red shirt had been twisted like a turban and her notions of art demanded that a sleeve thereof should hang aloft over each of her ears. She seemed to be a moving monster, loaded with a mass of clothes. The day was excessively hot, and the perspiration poured down her face in streams. Nelwang looked at me, and then at her, smiling quietly, as if to say. 'You never saw, in all your white world a bride so grandly dressed!'"

A MISSIONARY DOLL.

RUTH MARIE SITES, writes entertainingly in The Heathen Woman's Friend about the travels of a missionary doll. She says: Marion Augusta Bell, one of the daintiest little doll babies that came out in the Baltimore box, has just this moment started out for her missionary labors, and I feel impelled to write you about her, that the sender may thus hear where her gift has gone. It is a long trip from Eastern Maryland to Foochow, China, but Marion Bell made it in safety, and when we removed her careful wrappings we were charmed with her neatness and beauty. Everything, even to the underclothes with tiny buttons and neat buttonholes, proved that a dainty somebody had gotten her ready. Marion Bell has gone to supply one of the special cases. In a large and elegant Chinese house lives a wealthy official tax collector (Mr. Pang), with his two wives, a daughter and son, and innumerable servants. One of her servants appeared with an urgent invitation that I dine with Mrs. Pang on Thursday. As to the feast, suffice it to say that it was the most elegant it has been my privilege to enjoy in China. First, sharks' fins, then pigeons' eggs, birds' nests, and more of equal fame. And they were good, too, really. At first I tried to count the courses, but gave up in despair after we approached the twenties. Almond tea accompanied the dessert, and finished the long list of dainties. The conversation was as varied as could be in any land, and constantly intermingled with pleasant urgings from the hostess, as "Eat more;" "I have prepared nothing worthy to enter your mouth;" replied to by the guests with, "I alone have done all the eating," "To-day, what fortune is mine to taste such dainties," "I need eat no more for three days," "I have put you to heavy expense to-day," and the like.

But to me, the most interesting part came after dinner, when we went into the apartments of Mrs. Pang, number one, and there met her two children. The baby boy, five years old, is a little beauty, and as bright and clever as I ever saw a child. But what of his sister? A sweet-faced, patient girl of fifteen, whose life is lost in the constant presence of incurable disease. Some spinal affection has bent her poor little back, and dwarfed her till she stands little higher than a child of eight or ten. Life has little sunshine for her. She cannot read a word; has no music, or drawing, or painting—nothing to entertain or amuse her but a bit of embroidery, and her little strength will not permit her to do much of that. And to her has gone our doll, the bonny Marion Bell.

Fruitful Obedience.

The strength of opening manhood is never so well employed as in practicing subserviency to God's revealed will; it lends a grace to religion, and produces an abundant harvest.

CHAPTER XI.

CONFIDENCES

"AND so, Guy, you are really going?" said Norman Conway who, with his sister Joyce had invaded Guy's pleasant little "den," which opened from his bed-room and was carefully kept at the same temperature. "Glad to see you looking more like yourself again. You have had rather a sharp attack by all accounts."

"We have been so sorry," said Joyce, her bright eyes alight with frank sincerity. "We have missed you so much. Everybody is so sorry you have to go away."

"Not sorrier than I am myself," answered Guy, though he smiled as he spoke. "Please sit down by the fire and make yourselves comfortable. The others will be in by-and-by."

"We came chiefly to see you," remarked Norman, as they gathered round the fire; "we heard that you were out of your room again. We wanted to see for ourselves that you were on the high road to recovery."

Guy was always very grateful to anyone for liking him. He could not always help fancying that he was not really one of his aunt's family, and that people might look upon him sometimes as a sort of interloper. But he loved them all so much—more so than ever now that he had deliberately elected to sacrifice much worldly prosperity for their sakes, and it was an effort to him to break the brotherly and sisterly tie which bound him to this household. And so when he found himself looked upon as one of the family by others, and missed from the circle when he was absent, he felt very pleased and gratified, and more so than ever when it was Joyce who so spoke.

Joyce was some day to be Monk's wife—of that Guy had made up his mind, and no thought of disloyalty to his cousin was allowed to mingle with his admiration for the girl who possessed a fascination for him that he could not entirely shake off. He sat and looked at her now, as she chatted to him of everything that had taken place whilst he had been shut up, and he pictured her at home in this very house, and the thrill which ran through him was curiously compounded of pain and pleasure and pride. But at least there was no envy mixed with the inevitable pain, and Guy told himself that no one would more rejoice in Monk's happiness than himself, and he did not overrate his own strength of will and generosity in so saying.

"Will Monk go with you?" asked Joyce presently, and he thought he detected the least shade of anxiety in her glance.

"I think not. At least if he goes out with me, it will not be to stay. I shall pack him home again when once I have settled down. He is not really fond of foreign life and travel, though he is a little bit bitten by the mania just now—or thinks he is. But his place is here, but he must not be away for long."

There was undeniable gladness in the girl's eyes as she heard this. "O, I am so glad we shall not lose you both—some people thought you would never go alone, and we wondered if Monk would be your companion. He will miss you very much."

"Yes, though I have not been much of a companion to him lately, and I hope other people will make it up to him when I am gone."

"Are you going to Spain?" Norman asked. "I see all these books are more or less Spanish in character."

"Yes, I have settled to try Seville. I have a great dislike to the idea of the Riviera. If I go anywhere, I should like it to be farther afield. And I should not be surprised if Fulk came with me. He has never had any respite yet from his studies, and he is so well ahead with his work that he can afford a few months' holiday. He wants to go to Spain—thinks he can get wrinkles about obscure diseases rarer over here—or pretends he does—and he has rather set his mind on being my comrade. I should be very glad if he did come. It would be only half the exile if I had a chum with me; and Fulk is no end of a good fellow when you get below the crust, though as different from old Monk as chalk from cheese."

"Well, it would be much better to have somebody to take care of you," said Joyce.

"So it is an exile, is it?" questioned Norman.

"Well, I don't know if I ought to say so: but I hate the thought of it all. I had made up my mind to something different, and one does not care to have to change all one's plans: but I ought not to complain, and if it sets me up again it will be worth the bother of the time wasted. I can't imagine anything more humiliating and tiresome than to be in a chronic state of having to take care of oneself, and to be afraid of all kinds of foolish things."

"Such as getting locked up in churches," laughed Joyce. "O Guy, it was silly of you."

Norman, however, looking at Guy's delicate features, bright eyes, and the hectic color on his cheeks, wondered if he would ever reach the stage where care was no longer essential, and felt more sorry for him than he would have cared to say.

At that moment the door opened, and the riding party came in, Joyce caught the bright look which flashed into Monk's eyes as he saw who were Guy's companions, and he came and leaned over his cousin's chair, and looked at Joyce. "I'm glad you have been to cheer him up. It's hard lines for him to have to go away, is it not?

"Very," answered Joyce quickly. "We are all so sorry—we shall miss him so much."

"But Joyce and I have been agreeing that it will only make matters worse for you to go too," said Guy looking up with an arch smile. Such two important people as you and I cannot possibly be spared at once. So now that Joyce has added her testimony to mine, you must stand convinced, old fellow. We will tell your mother that it is all settled to her satisfaction."

Norman, meantime, was talking to Yolante, who never looked better than when dressed for the saddle, of which fact she was very well aware. "You will miss Guy when he is gone," he remarked.

But Yolante smiled rather sarcastically as she removed her hat and veil, and laid her head back against the cushioned chair. "To tell the honest truth, I do not profess such great enthusiasm over cousins—and I consider invalids rather a bore. Very unfeeling, is it not? But I shall be very glad when Guy is safely away, in a place that suits him better. And it will do him a world of good to be shaken out of his home-bred ways. He is worse than any of our own boys who have a real right to be here—" and then, do as she would do to prevent it, Yolante could not help stopping short and coloring crimson.

Norman observed this—indeed, though he never appeared to be taking much notice of what passed about him, there were very few things that escaped him—and though he could not account for the sudden confusion, he made a mental note of it. Yolante turned the conversation pointedly, and commenced upon another subject.

"We are going to town soon—very soon after all this travelling fuss is settled. I want a good long season, and mamma intends Cissy to come out, though she does not care to, and she is quite young still. I shall be so glad to get back to London. I think the country has been a little disappointing."

"Ah, just so—you require a wider field. Life down here is little better than stagnation to a nature like yours. For my own part I am afraid stagnation suits me. I have been marvellously contented here of late."

It was never thoroughly understood by more than one or two in the house how nor why Monk suddenly abandoned his half-formed intention of accompanying Guy abroad, and left Fulk have his own way in the matter: but the decision was received with great satisfaction, and allowed on all hands to be the best.

What passed between the cousins themselves upon the subject no one ever knew: but it was very plain that it was no diminution of the affection which bound them together, that resulted in this agreement to part. The tie was if possible stronger than before, and Guy would not let himself think of the moment when he should hold Monk's hand in his for the last time for so long.

"I should like one thing," he said one day, in answer to an inquiry from Mrs. Dangerfield, who had grown more gentle and tender in her manner of late. "I should so like to see my old nurse again."

Mrs. Dangerfield started slightly. "Your old nurse, Guy? Whom can you mean? One of the nurses you have had in my house?"

"O, no," answered Guy smiling. "Why, Monk and I never considered ourselves in the nursery since I came to be with you. I mean the old nurse who was with my mother up till within a year of her death. Martha Liston she was then—"

"But she is not here—she has emigrated," Mrs. Dangerfield interrupted with sudden sharpness. "Your mother spoke of her once or twice. She told me so."

Fulk, who alone was present when Guy made this request, raised his eyes from his book, and saw that his mother's face had grown suddenly pale. Much surprised, he listened attentively to what followed.

"Yes, but she has come back—she is living quite near. I have seen her often. She married one of the Stapletons out in Canada: and they have come home to spend the rest of their lives with his people."

Mrs. Dangerfield's lips were dry—her face was livid. She seemed to divine this, and took up a hand-screen to shield herself.

"Why did you not tell me this before?"

"I hardly know. I think chiefly because you have good cause for disliking the Stapletons. It was a curious coincidence, was it not, that she should come back here? Are you sure you did not know? Did she not tell you?"

"Tell me? Why, I have never seen or spoken to the woman. I never should upon principle hold any communication with the Stapleton family. I am very sorry: but if you knew the way that family has insulted my dead husband, you would not be surprised."

Guy was disappointed, for he knew there was no chance of his seeing Martha unless she could come to him, but he forbore to press this point. Perhaps after all it would be safer for her to stay away. She might make some revelation to the family which would lead to trouble and complication. So Guy and Fulk started for Spain and Monk and his mother and the family went to London for a season of fashionable life. It was a time of triumph for Yolante and of genuine pleasure to the others.

But when the rush and the excitement of the London season were over, and they were back in their country house once more, Mrs. Dangerfield who had been puzzled by remarks that Yolante had dropped inadvertently from time to time felt that she could go on no longer in suspense, she must know the truth, however bad. She could no longer endure the suspicion that some other hand held her secret, and that a mine might be sprung at any moment under her feet.

"Yolante," she said suddenly, when her daughter chanced to come to the library one day for a book, and they two were alone together, "Yolante, we cannot go on like this much longer—it is killing me, and hurting you. Tell me plainly what you know and how you know it."

The girl looked steadily at her mother. "Will it not make it worse if I do?"

"Yolante, tell me what you know—and, above all, who told it to you."

"No one told me. I saw it all for myself, the girl came forward, and loosening the spring of the secret drawer, which flew open at her touch. "It was I who accidentally discovered those papers—I who was the means of your discovering them, because, after I had read and put them back, I did not properly fasten the drawer: and it was I who saw you read and burn them—and I was quite certain by the way you did it, and by the way you took it, that it was not the first you knew of the matter."

Mrs. Dangerfield sat silent a moment with her head bowed on her hand. Then she looked suddenly up. "And what would you have done in my place?"

"I think I should have done as you did."

"Then you do not condemn me?" the mother spoke humbly to her child.

"No," cried Yolante hotly. Mother, you did quite right to burn those papers—I was glad to see you do it. Now let us think no more about it. Nobody knows but our two selves, and we can keep our counsel."

"No one knows of those papers, Yolante: but there is one who knows Guy's real age—and that is why I live in constant dread. She does not know, it seems, how much depends on that, or she would have made it public long ago: but the truth might leak out at any moment, and if it became generally known—"

Yolante clasped her hands and her face flushed hotly. "O, mother, I had not dreamed of that. Who is the woman, and where is she to be found?"

"She is that old nurse of whom Guy once spoke, and by some terrible coincidence she has married the Stapleton, who emigrated, and has now returned to live within a mile of the house, amid the very people who have always hated us and cherished the belief that Guy's son—your Uncle Guy's, I mean, of course—would be master here one day. They have not got the rights of the matter yet, or we should have heard of it. Most likely they do not know how the will was worded, and even if they knew that Guy was the elder it might never occur to them of any moment: but there is always the risk that they may hear or tell something which may serve to set the whole question in a new light, and then—"

"Then we shall all be ruined and disgraced."

Yolante spoke in a whisper, but Mrs. Dangerfield lifted her head, and the proud hard look returned to her face. "No, that need never be so—for no one in the world knows that we are acquainted with the true facts in the case. In that fact lies our safety. People will pity, but they cannot blame us. There is no particle of evidence to show that we knew more than Guy himself, who has told us the date of his birth three months too late. And now, Yolante, let us talk no more of this. It is a subject that can only be painful to us both, and I only wish that you knew nothing. You are too young to be weighted with such a secret."

Meantime, whilst this interview was taking place in the house, Monk was engrossed in a matter closely connected with that happiness which was being so eagerly canvassed between his mother and sister. He had gone out that day with his fishing tackle: but the water had been too clear and blue for success, and the fishes were shy of the bait when they could see all too clearly the trap set for them. Even now Monk had not got over the unsatisfactory feeling of having to go about alone. He missed Guy as much on these occasions as he had done during the first weeks of his absence, and he was eagerly looking forward to his return: but that would not be just yet, for he and Fulk would not be home at earliest before September. However, Guy was well and strong again, and that was the main thing, and no doubt Geoffrey was right in thinking that it would do him good to live for some time in dry air, and to knock about the world a little before coming home to settle.

Meantime Monk had to make the best of his solitude, which he did by walking constantly over to the Grange to see Norman, as he said, to get him come out with him. He was almost as much at home by this time in Lady Conway's house as in his own, and everybody knew, perhaps, except himself, what was to be the end of that intimacy.

And when he took his rod and line out that sunny day, it was more with the idea of dreaming of Joyce than of filling his basket, that he went forth. And what place could be better for the indulgence of his bright dreams than the whispering woodland, with its myriad voices of hope and promise?

And when he had plunged into the woods to indulge his thoughts quite uninterrupted, what should he see sitting in that favorite dell of his, but the figure of a young girl in a white morning dress, and who should that young girl be but Joyce herself?

"O, Monk—how you startled me. I have never seen anybody in these woods before at this time of day."

"I was thinking about you, Joyce," said Monk, as he took a seat beside her on the fallen tree-trunk.

"How kind of you—I hope you were thinking something nice."

"At least they were very pleasant thoughts for me," answered Monk steadying his voice which had an unaccountable tendency to tremble. "I was thinking what life would look like if you were by my side to share it."

He stopped suddenly short as if afraid he had said too much, and then as she did not speak he looked into her face, and something he saw there gave him courage to proceed.

"Joyce, dear, I do love you with all my heart. Will you let me try to show you how much that is?"

For a moment there was still silence, and then a little warm hand was slipped into his, and his fingers closed tight over it.

"O, Monk, dear, I don't know if I may make promises without leave, but if I may, I should like to belong to you better than to anybody in the world."

Miss De Broen's Visit.

The Brave Christian Lady who was the first to Carry the Gospel to the Communists of Paris, Comes to America—Her Twenty-two Years in Belleville.

VERY bright and smiling, with the tint of health in her cheeks, and the gentlest of voices, a lady entered the editors' room in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, one day last week. She had just crossed the ocean, on a brief vacation, after something over twenty-two consecutive years of missionary work in a foreign land. In the course of a twelve-month many missionaries visit THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, some from far distant China, others from India, Ceylon, Burmah, Africa, Siam, Korea, South America and frigid Alaska. Those who have been working for the Master in tropical lands come here pale and worn with arduous duties, their faces darkened by the sun and their bodies wasted by the rigors of the deadly equatorial climate. Few, indeed, escape more or less physical suffering and privation in such service. But the bright-faced woman in question, despite labors that would have worn out strong men, is to-day as full of godly energy and zeal as when she enlisted in the army of Jesus over two-score years ago.

MISS DE BROEN.
Founder of the Belleville Mission, Paris.

Miss De Broen, the founder and head of the famous Belleville Mission in Paris, is not a stranger to many of our readers. From time to time, her grand work in the slums of the most brilliant and most wicked of European cities has been described in these pages; and now, for the first time, we have the story of her remarkable experience from her own lips:

"I was with Mrs. Pennifeather in England," she said, "getting things ready for the French soldiers. Suddenly a voice seemed to say to me 'Go to France.' I fell asleep with it ringing in my ears, I woke with it and it followed me. This was at the beginning of the Franco-German War, 1870–71. I received an invitation from friends, asking me to accompany them to France on a missionary tour; but I refused, being anxious to attend the Mildmay Conference which was to take place in a few days. No sooner had my letter been posted than I felt very uncomfortable, because I had taken the answer into my own hands without asking God's guidance. This was in the beginning of June. I resolved to go and ask my friends if they could send me to the station, and they did so. I arrived at my destination before my letter.

"When I saw Mrs. Alsop, the lady who invited me to go abroad, she told me that in a fortnight they would be joined by other friends, and if I liked, I could then travel with them after the Mildmay Conference, but again the Spirit of God seemed to strive with me and I felt it my duty to start at once. So I went to Paris.

"This was the beginning of the mission. One day we visited the cemetery of Pere La Chaise. We arrived at a spot where we saw a crowd of women and children in a most excited condition, holding up their hands toward heaven and swearing revenge before God and man. When we inquired what had happened, we were told that during the previous night about 600 Communists, men, women and children, had been shot. These were their relatives, standing by the graves to pay the last respects of love. Some brought flowers, others a cross with a name on it, and others only a slip of paper with "Revenge" written on it. All the dead were put into three common graves. One poor woman had lost her husband and son. I heard her violent expressions of revenge and sorrow, and though my heart seemed to long to say a word of comfort to her, I was very timid, so I asked the Lord to give me courage, which he did. In handing her the Gospel of St. John, and while laying my hand on her shoulder, I told her, though she had lost everything dear to her on earth, she had not lost one thing, and that was the love of God in Christ Jesus. The message of God's love seemed to magnetize the poor, sorrowful heart and she looked at me with a quiet expression, so different from what it was before, and asked 'Can it be that God can care for me?' Seeing the result of that message of love I felt as if the Lord told me to bring the message to others, and consequently decided to stay in Paris, instead of going with my friends to the provinces to begin work there. On returning to our hotel, I told my friend, Mrs. Alsop, of my decision, and she was alarmed and objected, thinking probably that I had been sunstruck. At that time, even soldiers would not go in the streets of Belleville except in detachments of 300 or 400. 'There is no money to begin such work as you wish,' Mrs. Alsop said. I replied that if God had put this thought into my heart, he would send the money. Two days later, two gentlemen belonging to the Society of Friends, came to our hotel. They had been sent out to Sedan to distribute large sums of money among the farmers for seed for corn. A small surplus was left which the committee had decided to use for relief purposes in Paris, so they gave the money to Mrs. Alsop and she handed it to me. That money went towards the payment of sewing-classes for the winter; but since that time I have been solely responsible for all the expenditures of this extensive work

"My first Gospel meeting consisted of only three women, but in less than two weeks we had more in attendance than we had room for. Soon they learned to love the Word of God. They asked me to establish a day school, and to teach their children the truth, and so the 'Iron Hall' was built. During the first six months of the Belleville Mission, I often felt like a mere atom among the multitudes, and more than once I decided to leave Paris, but the Lord strengthened my weakness and said: 'Why don't you pray for more workers?' which I most heartily did. One Sunday afternoon, while I was listening to a most spiritual sermon by the late Rev. Barton Hart of Rue Royale, he informed his congregation of a letter written to him by a gentleman in England who desired prayers. The letter stated that the writer and his wife, on returning from their holiday trip in Switzerland, had passed the month of August in Paris and were greatly impressed with the need of evangelical work there, but the writer saw so many difficulties before him that he believed it was not the will of God that he should come. This letter was from Rev. Mr. McAll, and with hearty rejoicing, I recognized it as an answer to my prayers. I at once wrote to Mr. and Mrs. McAll, telling them how great my soul's cry had been for more laborers. When they arrived in the winter time, I had the privilege of finding them lodgings, as neither of them spoke French. Their intention was not to work in Belleville, or in any particular district, but throughout the whole city. They lived in Belleville and had four stations amongst the workmen of Paris, one being at Belleville. At every point, a distinct work, entirely apart from the Belleville Mission and with a distinct organization, was carried on. The two had nothing in common.

"Very soon I opened a Day School, and also a Medical Mission—the first one in France for many years. This I did with the generous help of the Medical Missionary Society of Edinburgh, which granted me the salary of a doctor for two years. From a small beginning the annual expense of the Belleville Mission now amounts to nearly $15,000 a year. These expenses include the support of out-stations, salaries of evangelists, doctors, teachers, nurses, medicines, rent, sewing-classes and various other matters."

From the beginning, Miss De Broen has been an honorary worker, receiving no compensation whatever, but devoting her entire time, energies, and income to this labor for the Lord. The buildings in the Belleville Mission consist of the Orphanage, a large four-story and attic structure, capable of sheltering twenty-six orphans and in which Miss DeBroen herself lives with the workers; and the "Iron Hall," in which medical consultations, Gospel meetings, sewing-classes, night school, prayer meetings, temperance meetings and other meetings are held. At 205 Rue Saint Honore, there is a free Reading-Room for French and American visitors, and also a Temperance Restaurant and Inquiry Office. During the twenty-two years since the founding of the Mission in 1871, fully 1,000,000 persons have attended in various capacities, some receiving medical treatment, others tuition, and still others coming to sewing classes, and as inmates of the orphanage, etc. These are in addition to the Gospel meetings, the total attendance at which would aggregate a very large number indeed.

In connection with Miss De Broen's Mission, it is very important that those readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the friends of the work in this country who have followed the history of her Belleville Mission since the beginning, should understand that it has stood alone, connected with no other mission and deriving support from no other source than donations and voluntary subscriptions. Friends in England and America have sent their contributions to Miss De Broen year after year, for the support and extension of the work, but there were many who mistakenly identified the Belleville Mission with the work of another mission in Paris. This has given rise to confusion and to a diversion of resources which has been very prejudicial to the Belleville Mission and owing to this same cause the contributions to the Belleville Mission for a number of years have fallen considerably below its expenditures. This has occasioned surprise to many who have been stanch supporters of the Mission and who have been highly appreciative of the noble work it was and still is doing in Paris. One of the results of the depleted finances has been that Miss De Broen was compelled, during the past year, to discontinue the Medical Mission.

The highest endorsements have been received by Miss De Broen commending the Belleville Mission. Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, writes: "I have seldom met one in whom I feel a deeper interest. Her work has been wonderfully blessed of God, and ought to have a warm place in every Christian heart." Dr. Morgan, of the Church of the Holy Trinity, of Paris, writes: "It will be a pleasure to me to aid your work by an offering." Mr. Henry C. Mabie, of Minneapolis, writing to the Baptists of America, says: "It is with special pleasure that I give my testimony in favor of the wide-spread, evangelical and Christ-like and effectual work of Miss De Broen, which she has carried on for seventeen years in Belleville, Paris." Mr. D. L. Moody, the celebrated evangelist, says in a letter: "From the first, I formed the highest opinion of Miss De Broen, an opinion which no way changed, the more I saw her." These are taken from a large mass of similar cordial testimony.

Miss De Broen's visit to this country is for the furtherance and interest of her work in Paris. It is proposed to establish auxiliaries of the Belleville Mission in a number of American cities, including New York, Boston, Baltimore, Chicago, and others, and also several in Canada. She can be addressed to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Proctor's Monument Unveiled.

Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage's Address at Professor Richard A Proctor's Reburial at Greenwood, Tuesday, October 3d, 1893

WHEN Proctor, the famous astronomer and author died in New York City about five years ago, where he had no relatives at hand, Rev. Stephen Merritt generously gave space in his own family vault in Greenwood Cemetery where the mortal remains of the distinguished scientist have since reposed. A newspaper recently called attention to the fact of the unmarked grave, and Mr. George W. Childs, the millionaire philanthropist, purchased as suitable grave in Greenwood and erected a beautiful monument which was publicly dedicated on Oct. 3d, with appropriate ceremonies; the reinterment taking place on that date. Rev. Dr. Talmage, who had been invited to deliver the oration, spoke substantially as follows:

Fifty-six years ago in Cheyne Row, London, that street to be famous for all time as the residence of Thomas Carlyle, the monarch of English literature, a child was born and took the name of Richard Anthony Proctor. Starting life with an independent fortune, which put within his reach highest university attainments, coupled with all the advantages of extensive travel, he passed through one gate of knowledge after another, and from great to greater altitudes in scientific attainment, until, in the collapse of a New Zealand banking corporation, all his investments were swamped, and, instead of a fortune to draw upon, he had nothing left except a liability of sixty thousand dollars to draw upon him. But reversal of fortune is only arousal and inspiration to a man like Professor Proctor. His pen and telescope now became the means of achieving a livelihood, as well as of reporting the behavior of the heavenly bodies, for be it known, not for the encouragement of other adventurous youth, but as a matter of history, that while yet a college boy, he had met a fair young Irish girl, with large brown eyes and curls beautiful enough to lasso almost any susceptible nature, and after a week's acquaintance, called in clerical aid to emphasize the fact that they took each other "for better or for worse, till death did them part." So that by the time he had passed on to the great financial exigency of his life, a small constellation around him in his own household was to him of quite as much importance as the constellations above him. Concerning the struggles through which he passed before gaining the appreciation that his services deserved, I will not speak, except to say that, in his life, as in the life of most of those who have achieved scholastic or scientific or financial success, there was an Iliad of woes. The ladder of worldly achievement is of slippery rung and hard to climb, and but few reach the top and most stop short of half way. But Proctor was great in hard work. His study hours were from eight in the morning till noon, and from three o'clock to six in the afternoon, and from eight at night to two and three o'clock in the morning: with such habits of work, combined with talents splendid and phenomenal, we do not wonder that he has now standing on the shelves of personal and city and national libraries such books as, "Saturn and its Systems;" "Myths and Marvels of Astronomy;" "Other Worlds than Ours;" "The Border Land of Science;" "The Universe and the Coming Transits;" "Light Science for Leisure Hours;" "Flowers of the Sky;" "Constellation of the Seasons;" "Old and New Astronomy;" and in all fifty-seven books, while if from magazines and newspapers his contributed articles were gathered, they would make a library of themselves. He made a geography of the heavens; he charted three hundred and twenty-four thousand stars. What a eulogy upon work, hard work, unrelenting work, triumphant work, was that man's lifetime. The curse of the world is genius allied to idleness. It excites high expectation only to disappoint it. But genius, as in this case, allied to industry produces Newton's "Principia," Shakespeare's dramas, Virgil's "Georgics," Bacon's "Novum Organum," Dante's "Divina Commedia," and Richard Anthony Proctor's New Theory of the Stellar Universe. Not only was this friend, whose going away was an international lamentation, great with his pen, but just as great with the voice, for which of our A[illegible] eloquence? In one American tour, he gave one hundred and two lectures, and in another tour one hundred and forty-two lectures. He, with our own Professor Mitchell, whom we nick-named "Old Stars," did more to popularize astronomy than any two men that ever lived. Other lecturers on astronomy have stunned us with figures of millions and billions of miles and the weight and periphery of worlds, and we came out of the lecture hall as bedazzled and confounded with stellar habits and stellar eccentricities and stellar catastrophes as the people were on the night of the star shooting in 1833, when all the heavens seemed unhinged. But Professor Proctor by illumined apparatus appealing to the eye and explanations appealing to the ear, lifted audiences into an intelligent understanding about the life and death of worlds, rung them like silver bells, put them into bloom as the hanging gardens of the sky, entranced and awed and melted multitudes, who went home, saying in prayer as they went: "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained, what is man that Thou art mindful of him or the son of man that Thou visitest Him." Proctor opened new windows in heaven, and swung back doors that, for the masses of the people, had always been bolted.

Let it be known that this man died a martyr to science. Over-work left him with physical strength so reduced that malarias easily filled his system with aches and pains, and an exhaustion which a mighty epidemic sweeping by had but to touch and see him expire. To his bereavements, many and quick in succession, and to frequent lack of appreciation for exalted work, which only genius like his own could rightly estimate, were added illnesses that made his burdens heavier, but never induced him to unload them. We crown a martyr to-day. That is the meaning of this sculpture. That is the meaning of these garlands. That is the meaning of this reverential assemblage. That is the meaning of the anthems to-day chanted.

And now this transference from tomb to tomb is no disturbance of the dead, but it is as when we enter the room of a sleeping brother, and say: "Come! We have another room for you in another part of the house. We have fitted it up especially for you. Come, brother, and lie down on this better pillow!"

Sweet is the slumber beneath the sod,
While the pure spirit is resting with God.

It is appropriate that the change of sepulchres be made and this beautiful shaft erected by one whose generosity is constantly being shown toward the living and the dead. He is the glory of American journalism, putting on pensions those who have grown old or fallen sick in his service. To his magnificent hospitality to the living, he adds his hospitality to the dead. All the land honors him. Coming generations will bless his name. Synonym for everything gracious and kind and pure and magnanimous and splendid, the name of George W. Childs. God bless him, is my prayer, and the prayer of millions on both sides of the sea.

While to-day, in this monument, journalism honors astronomy, over this grave also let Science and Religion cordially grasp hands. In these latter days attempt has been made to divorce them, but "whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." Coadjutors have science and religion always been, though irreverence on the one side and bigotry on the other have sometimes denied it. In many German cathedrals there is an organ at either end of the cathedral, and these instruments majestically respond to each other, and it is Organ to Organ and Overture to Overture and Grand March to Grand March. So, in this great cathedral of the universe, science and religion respond to each other in glorious accord.

The same Divine Being whose blessing Professor Proctor tenderly invoked at the close of nearly all his letters to his household is the God whose mercy we now invoke, as, gathered this autumnal day, amid the falling leaves, to uncover this monument to the memory of the great scientist, we seek for Almighty comfort to descend on the hearts that still bleed over his bereavement. The quaint words, which, among the Scotch Highlands, are often sung on the way to the grave of someone greatly honored and beloved, are very appropriate now:

Neighbor, accept our parting song,
The road is short, the rest is long;
The Lord brought here, the Lord takes hence,
This is no house of permanence.

On bread of mirth and bread of tears
The pilgrim fed, these checkered years:
Now undoor world, shut to the door,
Thy guest is gone forever more.

Gone to the land of sweet repose,
His comrades bless him as he goes;
Of toil and moil the day was full,
A good sleep now, the night is cool.

Yea village bells, ring softly, ring,
And in the blessed Sabbath bring;
Which from this weary work-day toyst
Awaits God's folk through Jesus Christ."

When you're Rubbing over your washboard, in that painful, old-fashioned way, these are some of your positions. Just try these motions, up and down, without the tub. That will prove how hard they are. Then try Pearline's way of washing.

That will prove how needless and absurd they are. Without the washboard and the rubbing on it, and without bending over the wash-tub or bobbing up and down over it—you save the wear to your clothes and the work for your back. That's Pearline's way. Directions on every package.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 390 JAMES PYLE, New York

His First Sermon.*

THE sermon was one in which he had dwelt largely on the different isms of the day, and refuted them with somewhat of Scripture and much of theology. It was both strong and scholarly, but to Aunt Hannah's mind there was something lacking. Her soul thirsted for more of the sincere "milk of the Word" whereby to gain strength for the bearing of life's every-day burdens and the meeting of its various vicissitudes in a proper spirit and manner. Strong theological meat was desirable for those to whom it was adapted, but few of his listeners would be called upon to combat a long list of heterodox dogmas. They were mostly plain, practical common-sense people, and like himself, would be most benefited by that practical teaching which would tend to build them up in the inner life, and lead them closer to the loving heart of the heavenly Father.

Robert finished and then, somewhat complacently, tilted back in his chair with his hands clasped behind his head, and waited for remarks.

And they came:—"Well, my boy, that's a strong sermon. It's full of good points rounded by grand rhetorical flourishes, and I'm proud of it, but for myself, I'd like one with more of Christ in it. Say what thee will, this is the crying need of the world to-day—Christ a Saviour, a helper and a burden-bearer."

Little more was said and soon Robert went to his room. He went to bed, but not to sleep. The remarks had wholly unsettled his mind with regard to his morning's sermon. He felt that his choice had been made with reference to human rather than divine approbation and he was humiliated by the thought.

That was to him one of those test hours through which great souls pass, when they are emptied of self, and out of whose experiences they come forth, ready in a humble way devoid of self-seeking, to go forth to do whatever comes to hand for God and humanity, be the service humble or exalted, as did Peter after he had seen the vision, and Paul after he had listened to the assurance—"My grace is sufficient for thee."

More of Christ—the crying need of the world to-day—Christ a Saviour, a helper, and a burden-bearer—that thought took hold upon his mind with a life-long grasp, and sank into the depths of his soul as a motive power.

Its influence was afterwards felt in many a settler's cabin, and men with grimy hands and unshaven faces suppressed the oath and hastened to brush away the unbidden tear, as, in their soiled working garments, they stood with uncovered heads and listened attentively to the touching story of Christ the burden-bearer.

THE ARRESTED SUN.†

THE stupendous miracle of the day consisted in the arrest of daylight. It is obvious that Joshua 10: 12–15 is a quotation from the "book of Jasher. This is clear, because verse 15 is duplicated with verse 43; and the style is altogether different from the majestic roll of the historian's prose. But there is no reason to believe, with some, that these verses give us only a metaphorical account of the fight, and of the thoroughness of the victory; as though the poet would say that in one day Israel did the work of two. Beneath the veil of poetry, so gravely interpolated by the historian, there must be a reference to a marvelous and miraculous episode.

We place no limit to the divine power. He who made all things is the Monarch of all. It is indeed easy for him to impose his will on nature, man, or human will. The miracle of the resurrection is so stupendous in the raising of our human nature, incorporate with the divine, to take its place in the heart of the forces of the spirit-world, that we need not hesitate to accept any well-accredited marvel. Nor should we scruple to believe that God could make the clock of the universe stop, if it were necessary that it should do so.

But it is not necessary to believe that he did this. No doubt here, as elsewhere, Scripture uses the language of ordinary human life. By some process, the laws of which are at present unknown to us, but of which we get glimpses, in refraction, in the after-glow of sunset, in the fantastic appearances familiar to travelers in high latitudes and amongst the loftiest mountains—God was able to prolong the daylight until Israel had made an end of slaying their foes, with a very great slaughter, so that only a decimated remnant entered into the fenced cities. The how is not material to our present purpose.

Corticelli Filo Silk.

These goods are adapted to a wide range of Art Needlework. For light and delicate embroidery use the thread singly; for heavier work use two threads in combination. Filo Silk is very loosely twisted, and should always be bought on spools, which keep the silk clean and prevent shop wear and fraying. In this way you save time and money, by avoiding waste and inconvenience, at the same time improving your work manship.

Florence Home Needlework for 1893 is now ready. The subjects are Corticelli Darning, Corticelli Drawn-work and Reeling Raw Silk as seen at the World's Fair. Crocheted Lamp Shades, Embroidery and Pillow Lace are also described. Send 6c., mentioning year, and we will mail the book; 96 pp., 87 illus.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

"BEHOLD THE MAN!"

The "Ecce Homo Arch," the Memorable Scene of Pilate's Weakness, When he Delivered the Saviour to the Multitude.

JERUSALEM is truly a city of sorrowful memories. In whatever direction the inquiring traveler turns, he is confronted with some reminder of the long-vanished past, that tells him of dark tragedy, or else of joy that was turned to bitter grief. Not a hill or valley around Zion, not a street or corner of the city itself, is without its gloomy history. These memories seem to come in troops upon the traveler, as he threads the devious windings of the narrow, dingy thoroughfares. Memories of ancient wars and warriors, of conquering Roman and Saracen, of brave Templar and gallant Crusader, of Maccabbean prowess and of Israelitish glory and magnificence. There are memories, too, of cruel kings and a malign priesthood, of armed men-slayers, who went about watering the city pavements with the blood of their victims, and, above all rises the face of One who "suffered as no man suffered,"—Jesus the Innocent. Next to Calvary and Gethsemane, one of the most mournful reminders of the cruelties He endured at the hands of a rabble inflamed by the fiercest of all passions—religious hatred—is the place shown in the illustration. Tradition declares that it was under this arch that the Saviour was scourged by the soldiers and abused and vilified by the mob, who were hounded on by the priests, and that it was on the narrow parapet above the arch that Jesus was led out and shown to the people by Pilate with the memorable words: "Behold the Man!" (John 19: 5.) It is exceedingly probable that the event the Evangelist describes took place in some such prominent position, where it could be witnessed by the multitude.

Looking at the picture, one can conjure up the scene anew. The scourging had ended and Pilate was about to formally deliver Jesus to a military officer who was authorized to conduct Him to the place of crucifixion. Half-clad, bleeding, with painful, labored steps and sorrowful mien, yet with the divine glory reflected in His face, the Saviour of the world was exposed to the derision and contumely of the dense crowd that packed the narrow street. Pilate was but half-hearted: he lacked the courage to do what his conscience prompted and save the victim, and he was impelled to give assent to the condemnation of the innocent to appease the people and the priests, and because the Jews had intimidated him by threatening to accuse him to Tiberius. In his heart he felt convinced of the innocence of the accused, and this conviction was deepened by the humane urgings of Procla, his wife, who had been divinely warned in a dream. "Behold," he said, as he stood beside the scarred and bleeding Jesus, facing the multitude, "I have brought Him out to you again, that you may know once more that I have found no fault in Him. Behold the man!"

The Governor, however, was not a match for the crafty priests who had sworn that Jesus should die and Pilate, giving up the struggle at last, solaced himself with the reflection that, after all, it was the Jews themselves who demanded the sacrifice. He therefore returned to his palace, while the Saviour of the world was led by the Via Dolorosa ("Way of Sorrow"), to the Damascus Gate and death on Calvary.

The "Ecce Homo Arch" springs from a solidly-built tower on the eastern side of the Government buildings, which form the present fortress and arsenal of Jerusalem. It is generally believed to occupy the site of the "palace" spoken of by Nehemiah the prophet. So greatly changed is the Jerusalem of to-day from the city of the Saviour's day, that even the lines of the ancient streets have largely disappeared and can be traced only by excavating through deep beds of rubbish. In the general demolition, by the Romans, the prominent buildings were included. It is believed that the arch now known as the Ecce Homo Arch is really of the time of Hadrian, and that the original structure must have been a triple arch, the largest being in the centre. Only this central arch is now standing, and not altogether intact, a portion of it being built into the "Church of the Sisters of Zion," on the right. Before reaching this arch, the pilgrim along the Via Dolorosa passes the traditional spots where Simon of Cyrene took up the Cross, where Jesus fell under the burden, where Lazarus of Bethany dwelt after being raised from the dead and where Dives, the typical rich man of the Scripture, dwelt. That which was formerly the site of Pilate's Judgment Hall is now occupied by the official residence of the Pasha of Jerusalem, at the Turkish barracks. It is said to be identical with the old Tower of Antonia, although the building is comparatively modern. The whole city was rebuilt after the Romans demolished it, the old stones being largely used in the construction.

In the season of the pilgrimages and particularly when the city is crowded by devotees from all parts of the world, gathered for the Easter festival, the Via Dolorosa is visited by multitudes, who reverently tread its winding passages from the Judgment Hall to a point opposite the traditional site of Calvary. These pilgrims present a remarkable picture as they pause to view the points which tradition associates with that last earthly journey of Jesus the Innocent.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

HELPFUL CHURCHES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Psalms 20: 2: "Send thee help from the Sanctuary."

IF you should ask fifty men what the church is, they would give you fifty different answers. One man would say, "It is a convention of hypocrites." Another, "It is an assembly of people who feel themselves a great deal better than others." Another, "It is a place for gossip, where wolverine dispositions devour each other." Another, "It is a place for the cultivation of superstition and cant." Another, "It is an arsenal where theologians go to get pikes and muskets and shot." Another, "It is an art galley, where men go to admire grand arches, and exquisite fresco, and musical warble, and the Dantesque in gloomy imagery." Another man would say, "It is the best place on earth except my own home. If I forget thee, O, Jerusalem! let my right hand forget her cunning."

Now, my friends, whatever the church is, my text tells you what it ought to be; a great, practical, homely, omnipotent help. "Send thee help from the sanctuary." The pew ought to yield restfulness to the body. The color of the upholstery ought to yield pleasure to the eye. The entire service ought to yield strength for the moil and struggle of every-day life. The Sabbath ought to be harnessed to all the six days of the week, drawing them in the right direction. The church ought to be a magnet, visibly and mightily affecting all the homes of the worshippers. Every man gets roughly jostled, gets abused, gets cut, gets insulted, gets slighted, gets exasperated. By the time the Sabbath comes, he has an accumulation of six days of annoyance, and that is a starveling church service which has not strength enough to take that accumulated annoyance and hurl it into perdition. The business man sits down in church headachey from the week's engagements. Perhaps he wishes he had tarried at home on the lounge with the newspapers and the slippers. That man wants to be cooled off, and graciously diverted. The first wave of the religious service ought to dash clear over the hurricane decks, and leave him dripping with holy and glad and heavenly emotion. "Send thee help from the sanctuary."

In the first place, sanctuary help ought to come from the music. A woman dying in England persisted in singing to the last moment. The attendants tried to persuade her to stop, saying it would exhaust her and make her disease worse. She answered, "I must sing; I am only practising for the heavenly choir." Music on earth is a rehearsal for music in heaven. If you and I are going to take part in that great orchestra, it is high time that were stringing and thrumming our harps. They tell us that Thalberg and Gottschalk never would go into a concert until they had first in private rehearsed, although they were such masters of the instrument. And can it be that we expect to take a part in the great oratorio of heaven if we do not rehearse here? But I am not speaking of the next world. Sabbath song ought to set all the week to music. We want not more harmony, not more artistic expression, but more volume in our church music.

Now, I am no worshipper of noise, but I believe that if our American churches would with full heartiness of soul and full emphasis of voice sing the songs of Zion, this part of sacred worship would have tenfold more power than it has now. Why not take this part of the sacred service and lift it to where it ought to be? All the annoyances of life might be drowned out of that sacred song. Do you tell me that it is not fashionable to sing very loudly? Then, I say, away with the fashion. We dam back the great Mississippi of congregational singing, and let a few drops of melody trickle through the dam. I say, take away the dam, and let the billows roar on their way to the oceanic heart of God. Whether it is fashionable to sing loudly or not, let us sing with all possible emphasis.

We hear a great deal of the art of singing, of music as an entertainment, of music as a recreation. It is high time we heard something of music as a help, a practical help. In order to do this, we must only have a few hymns. New tunes and new hymns every Sunday make poor congregational singing. Fifty hymns are enough for fifty years. The Episcopal Church prays the same prayers every Sabbath, and year after year, and century after century. For that reason they have the hearty responses. Let us take a hint from that fact, and let us sing the same songs Sabbath after Sabbath. Only in in that way can we come to the full force of this exercise. Twenty thousand years will not wear out the hymns of William Cowper, and Charles Wesley, and Isaac Watts. Suppose now each person in this audience has brought all the annoyances of the last three hundred and sixty-five days. Fill this room to the ceiling with sacred song, and you would drown out all those annoyances of the three hundred and sixty-five days, and you would drown them out forever. Organ and cornet are only to marshal the voice. Let the voice fall into line, and in companies, and in brigades, by storm take the obduracy and sin of the world. If you cannot sing for yourself, sing for others. By trying to give others good cheer, you will bring good cheer to your own heart. When Londonderry, Ireland, was besieged many years ago, the people inside the city were famishing, and a vessel came up with provisions, but the vessel ran on the river bank and stuck fast. The enemy went down with laughter and derision to board the vessel, when the vessel gave a broadside fire against the enemy, and by the shock was turned back into the stream, and all was well. O, ye who are high and dry on the rocks of melancholy, give a broadside fire of song against your spiritual enemies, and by holy rebound you will come out into the calm waters. If we want to make ourselves happy, we must make others happy. "Mythology tells us of Amphion, who played his lyre until the mountains were moved and the walls of Thebes arose; but religion has a mightier story to tell of how Christian song may build whole temples of eternal joy, and lift the round earth into sympathy with the skies. I tarried many nights in London, and I used to hear the bells, the small bells of the city, strike the hour of night—one, two, three, four, and after they were done striking the hour of night then the great St. Paul's Cathedral would come in to mark the hours, making all the other sounds seem utterly insignificant as with mighty tongue it announced the hour of the night, every stroke an overmastering boom. My friends, it was intended that all the lesser sounds of the world should be drowned out in the mighty tongue of congregational song beating against the gates of heaven. Do you know how they mark the hours in heaven? They have no clocks, as they have no candles, but a great pendulum of hallelujah swinging across heaven from eternity to eternity.

Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our God:
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad.

St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

Again I remark, that sanctuary help ought to come from the sermon. Of a thousand people in this or any other audience, how many want sympathetic help? Do you guess a hundred? Do you guess five hundred? You have guessed wrong. I will tell you just the proportion. Out of a thousand people in this audience there are just one thousand who need sympathetic help. These young people want it just as much as the old. The old people sometimes seem to think they have a monopoly of the rheumatisms, and the neuralgias, and the headaches, and the physical disorders of the world; but I tell you there are no worse heartaches than are felt by some of these young people. Do you know that much of the work is done by the young? Raphael died at thirty-seven; Richelieu at thirty-one; Gustavus Adolphus died at thirty-eight; Innocent III. came to his mightiest influence at thirty-seven; Cortez conquered Mexico at thirty; Don John won Lepanto at twenty-five; Grotius was attorney-general at twenty-four; and I have noticed amid all classes of men that some of the severest battles and the toughest work comes before thirty. Therefore we must have our sermons and our exhortation in prayer-meeting all sympathetic with the young. And so with these people further on in life. What do these doctors and lawyers and merchants and mechanics care about the abstractions of religion? What they want is help to bear the whimsicalties of patients, the browbeating of legal opponents, the unfairness of customers who have plenty of fault-finding for every imperfection of handiwork, but no praise for twenty excellences. What does that brain-racked, hand-blistered man care for Zwingle's "Doctrine of Original Sin," or Augustine's "Anthropology?" You might as well go to a man who has the pleurisy and put on his side a plaster made out of Dr. Parr's "Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence."

While all of a sermon may not be helpful alike to all, if it be a Christian sermon preached by a Christian man, there will be help for every one somewhere. We go into an apothecary store. We see others being waited on; we do not complain because we do not immediately get the medicine; we know our turn will come after awhile. And so while all parts of a sermon may not be appropriate to our case, if we wait prayerfully before the sermon is through, we shall have the divine prescription. I say to these young men who come here Sabbath by Sabbath, and who are going to preach the Gospel, these theological students—I say to them, we want in our sermons not more metaphysics, nor more imagination, nor more logic, nor more profundity. What we want in our sermons and Christian exhortations is more sympathy. When Father Taylor preached in the Sailors' Bethel at Boston, the jack tars felt that they had help for their duties among the ratlines and the forecastles. When Richard Weaver preached to the operatives in Oldham, England, all the workingmen felt they had more grace for the spindles. When Dr. South preached to kings and princes and princesses, all the mighty men and women who heard him felt preparation for their high station.

Again I remark, that sanctuary help ought to come through the prayers of all the people. The door of the eternal storehouse is hung on one hinge, a gold hinge, the hinge of prayer, and when the whole audience lay hold of that door, it must come open. There are here many people spending their first Sabbath after some great bereavement. What will your prayer do for them? How will it help the tomb in that man's heart? Here are people who have not been in church before for ten years; what will your prayer do for them by rolling over their soul holy memories? Here are people in crises of awful temptation. They are on the verge of despair, or wild blundering, or theft, or suicide. What will your prayer do for them this morning in the way of giving them strength to resist? Will you be chiefly anxious about the fit of the glove that you put to your forehead while you prayed? Will you be chiefly critical of the rhetoric of the pastor's petition? No. No. A thousand people will feel "that prayer is for me," and at every step of the prayer chains ought to drop off, and temples of sin ought to crush into dust, and jubilees of deliverance ought to brandish their trumpets. In most of our churches we have three prayers—the opening prayer, what is called the "long prayer," and the closing prayer. There are many people who spend the first prayer in arranging their apparel after entrance, and spend the second prayer, the "long prayer," in wishing it were through, and spend the last prayer in preparing to start for home. The most insignificant part of every religious service is the sermon. The more important parts are the Scripture lesson and the prayer. The sermon is only a man talking to a man. The Scripture lesson is God talking to man. Prayer is man talking to God. Oh, if we understood the grandeur and the pathos of this exercise of prayer, instead of being a dull exercise, we would imagine that the room was full of angelic appearances.

But, my friends, the old style of church will not do the work. We might as well now try to take all the passengers from New York to Buffalo by stage-coach, or all the passengers from Albany to Buffalo by canal-boat, or do all the battling of the world with bow and arrow, as with the old style of church to meet the exigencies of this day. Unless the Church in our day will adapt itself to the time, it will become extinct. The people reading newspapers and books all the week, in alert, picturesque, and resounding style, will have no patience with Sabbath humdrum. Some of the poorest preachers wear the best clothes; and many a backwoodsman has dismounted from the saddle-bags, and in his linen duster preached a sermon that shook earth and heaven with its Christian eloquence. No new Gospel, only the old Gospel in a way suited to the time. No new Church, but a Church to be the asylum, the inspiration, the practical sympathy, and the eternal help of the people.

But while half of the doors of the church are to be set open toward this world, the other half of the doors of the church must be set open toward the next. You and I tarry here only a brief space. We want somebody to teach us how to get out of this life at the right time and in the right way. Some fall out of life, some go stumbling out of life, some go groaning out of life, some go cursing out of life. Through these church gates set heavenward how many of your friends and mine have gone? The last time they were out of the house they came to church. The earthly pilgrimage ended at the pillar of public worship, and then they marched out to a bigger and brighter assemblage. Some of them were so old they could not walk without a cane or two crutches; now they have eternal juvenescence. Or they were so young they could not walk except as the maternal hand guided them; now they bound with the hilarities celestial. The last time we saw them they were wasted with malarial or pulmonic disorder; but now they have no fatigue, and no difficulty of respiration in the pure air of heaven. How I wonder when you and I will cross over! Some of you have had about enough of the thumping and flailing of this life. A draught from the fountains of heaven would do you good. Complete release you could stand very well. If you got on the other side, and had permission to come back, you would not come. Though you were invited to come back and join your friends on earth, you would say, "No, let me tarry here until they come; I shall not risk going back; if a man reaches heaven he had better stay here."

Oh, I join hands with you this morning in that uplifted splendor.

When the shore is won at last,
Who will count the billows past?

In Freybourg, Switzerland, there is the trunk of a tree four hundred years old. That tree was planted to commemorate an event. About ten miles from the city the Swiss conquered the Burgundians, and a young man wanted to take the tidings to the city. He took a tree branch and ran with such speed the ten miles, that when he reached the city waving the tree branch he had only strength to cry, "Victory!" and dropped dead. The tree branch that he carried was planted, and it grew to be a great tree twenty feet in circumference, and the remains of it are there to this day. My hearer, when you have fought your last battle with sin and death and hell, and they have been routed in the conflict, it will be a joy worthy of celebration. You will fly to the city and cry "Victory!" and drop at the feet of the great King. Then the palm branch of the earthly race will be planted to become the out-branching tree of everlasting rejoicing.

When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls,
And pearly gates behold,
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?

A Christian Diplomat.

The Death of Sir A. S Blackwood, Secretary of the British Post-Office Department and Leader of Various Evangelistic Movements.

THE announcement of the death of Sir Arthur Stevenson Blackwood, which was cabled from England on Oct. 2, occasions regret on both sides of the Atlantic. His lucid and scholarly articles on prophecy, several of which have appeared in this journal—one of them this week—have made his name familiar to American readers. Many of our citizens, too, have enjoyed personal intercourse with him when during trans-Atlantic visits, they have had the privilege of attending the famous conferences at Mildmay Park. Since the death of Mr. Pennefather, who organized these conferences, Sir Arthur Blackwood has been President of the Mildmay Association, and his enthusiasm and organizing abilities have maintained the Conferences at the high level they attained under their saintly founder.

Late Sir Arthur S. Blackwood,
Diplomat and Evangelist.

His death will be severely felt at Mildmay and in other religious circles where his influence was a power for good. It appears that Sir Arthur has been in very poor health for some months past, and recently went to several watering-places in France and Germany in the hope of recovering his normal vigor. He was returning home when, on board the steamer on which he was crossing the channel from France to England, he was prostrated by a sudden seizure and became unconscious. On the arrival of the steamer, he was carried ashore and his family physician was summoned to his side. His condition was pronounced hopeless and in a few hours he passed away, without recovering consciousness.

Sir Arthur Blackwood was about sixty-three years old when he died. He commenced his career in the service of his government in 1851 as a clerk in the Treasury. He soon became noted for the conscientious care with which he performed all the duties intrusted to him and he was marked out for promotion. During the Crimean War he was sent out to the field to personally superintend the commissariat department of one of the divisions of the British army. The disgraceful break-down of the department in the first year of the war caused widespread disaffection, the relatives of the soldiers being indignant that the brave men who had gone out to fight their country's battles should be left without food and the common necessaries of life. The indignation became louder when it was found that the sufferings of the army in the inclement Russian winter were due to the bungling and blundering of government clerks. In the emergency, the young government clerk who had proved his capacity and painstaking devotion to duty was selected to remedy the defects and reorganize the commissariat service. His success was phenomenal and he returned with an assured position in the confidence of his superior officers. He was decorated with the Crimean medal with the clasps of Alma, Inkerman and Sebastopol and he also received the Medjidie medal from the Sultan of Turkey. He resumed his place in the Treasury Department, but in 1874 when the English government was adding the telegraph system to the Post Office Department it again had recourse to Mr. Blackwood's service. He was appointed Financial Secretary of the Post Office, and two years later, when the Post Office extended its field of operations by carrying small parcels of merchandise, Mr. Blackwood was promoted to be permanent chief of the department, and was knighted. In his new position he controlled 100,000 employes, and was responsible for the efficient working of the department. This position he retained under the Conservative and Liberal governments, and the Postmasters-General of both parties found in him a most reliable executive.

During all his official career, Sir Arthur Blackwood maintained a deep interest in religious matters. While he was still a young man, he commenced a series of Evangelistic services in the most aristocratic district of London, which finally developed into the great meetings at Willis's Rooms, where the converts included men and women belonging to the highest social circles. At his own house at Streatham in Surrey, where his wife, formerly Duchess of Manchester, presided with grace and dignity, some of the most eminent clergymen and evangelists were always among the guests and regular weekly meetings were held for Bible study. He subsequently removed to Crayford and there he built a large mission hall and established one of those combinations of club and restaurant, which have proved in England the most successful rivals of the saloon. He was one of the most frequent speakers in his mission hall and it was noticed that his addresses were listened to with as much delight by the uneducated masses who gathered there as by and cultured audiences in the London drawing-rooms. Those addresses, many of which have been published indicated a close and intimate knowledge of the Bible and a great deal of original thought. Underlying them was a spirit of devotion and simple dependence on the Holy Spirit's teaching which impressed every hearer. For twenty years, his addresses were among the most stimulating and helpful of those delivered at the Mildmay Conferences and often gave the key-note to the whole of the sessions. It was mainly due to the wise choice which selected Sir Arthur as the successor of Mr. Pennefather that the Mildmay Conferences maintained and increased their influence. Through his marriage, and his near relation to the Marquis of Dufferin he had access to the highest social circles, but he was one of the most humble and unostentatious of men and throughout his life was a conspicuous illustration of the fact that high birth and position need be no bar to Christian activity and usefulness.

DEATH OF A CHOLERA NURSE.

Sister Saint Paulin, who has just died at Oran, for thirty years bravely held her post on the battlefield of sickness. She nursed the sick during the cholera of 1867, the typhus of 1868, the cholera of 1884, and the small-pox of 1886, and in the intervals of these great campaigns she never quitted her works of mercy. In 1885 she received the Cross of the Legion of Honor. In her last illness the doctor said to her, "Courage, you will yet wear your cross for many a year." "No," she replied, "I am going to wear another Cross, the true one; my work here is ended. Good-bye, or rather au revoir [till we meet again], for whatever you may think we shall meet again in eternity."

SELF-DENIAL.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 29. I Cor. 8. Golden Text, Rom. 15: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"NOW we that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves. Let each one of us please his neighbor for his good unto edifying, for Christ pleased not himself." Self-pleasing, personal enjoyment is sapping the root of the spiritual, physical and political life of the day. Men are no longer willing to "endure hardships." We read of those who have, from a life of obscurity worked their way upward through self-denial, and labor, to a position of superiority, and everyone feels the force of such men as these; they have learned to endure. But the race of such seems to have almost died out, and a weak, pleasure-loving, degenerate generation has succeeded them, who clamor for pleasure, for riches, for position, without being willing to work their way up.

Self-pleasing in eating, drinking, dress, reading, etc., pervades all classes of society, and the terrible thing of all is that the same spirit has got into the Church of God. "I don't like," or "I do like" is the acknowledged reason for saying or doing, instead of that which alone actuated the Lord Jesus, the will of his Father who was in heaven. It is blessed to turn from a self-pleasing world and a self-pleasing church, which only augments instead of correcting the self which is in the world, and to look right away to the blessed Word of God and read: "Even Christ Pleased not Himself."

Has it really dawned upon us that our high calling, our vocation for eternity is to be one with God? Has the prayer of our Master ever taken possession of us: "That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou has sent me." (John 17: 21.) God has set his witnesses in the world as lights in the midst of the darkness, and those whose lives are not in contrast to the darkness are not fulfilling the purpose for which they are sent into the world. Of Jesus it is written: "When he cometh into the world he saith . . . Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." (Heb. 10: 5, 8.) He says of those whom the Father has given to him, "As thou has sent me into the world, even so have I sent them into the world." What for? To do thy will, O God," as their Master did before them. Is this your recognized, accepted vocation? If so, you can never again be entangled in the meshes of a self-pleasing spirit, your prayers will not be to obtain something for yourself, you will forget how to have a choice of your own about the things which happen day by day; like your Master you will neither please yourself nor wish to please yourself, but "live to do thy will O God." And this principle will enter into your eating and drinking, into the spending and the earning of your money, into your prayers and your service. God will have his complete will in all.

One of those things which most crosses the will of Christian workers is this Christian privilege of bearing the infirmities of the weak, acting with a regard for those who may be stumbled by what we do or say. The infirmities of the weak test those who think they are strong. How often one who is looked upon as strong in the Lord finds it very difficult to bear with a weak brother, whose conceit leads him to break into a meeting at the most inopportune time with a prayer, or testimony, or chorus right across the spirit of the meeting! How many a Christian worker has fallen into unrest of spirit or into a kind of inward indignation which he tried to believe was zeal for the Lord, under a test such as this! And yet the proof of true strength would be the ability to bear with this brother. It takes no grace of God to be indignant; the weakest brother can find fault; but to stand still when it seems to us that the work of God is suffering, and, with calm confidence in God, to bear the infirmity of our brother with a serene, untroubled spirit, trusting the Lord to overrule, this is that we are strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. It takes a very real confidence in God to see what may seem to us great harm done to the cause of God, and to be able quietly to trust him about it without putting our own hands to it; it shows that we have come to see our own nothingness and to appreciate the might and wisdom of our God, and to believe in his care for his own work against all appearances. The apostle Paul who, later on in his epistle, is about to unfold the wondrous teaching about the body of Christ (1. Cor. 12), gives a very practical lesson on this head as to how Christians in his day should act about meat which has been offered in an idol temple. He prefaces what he is about to say with the truth: knowledge puffeth up but love buildeth up;" and adds: "If any man thinketh that he knoweth anything, he knoweth not yet as he ought to know." (R.V.) How ought he to know? Divine knowledge always convinces us of our ignorance and nothingness, and anything which exalts us cannot therefore be of God: God resisteth the proud but giveth grace to the humble." (1. Pet. 5: 5.) It is an awful thing to be puffed by knowledge which God gives to us, it is turning the grace of God against him, and through his very gifts misrepresenting him!

Paul gives this illustration. A converted man has knowledge that an idol is nothing at all, but the bit of wood, or stone, gold or silver, which he sees, he has knowledge enough to know that eating what is offered in sacrifice to an idol is not in itself harmed thereby, the food is unchanged, no virtues and no power to harm is communicated to it by its being offered to wood or stone, and no Christian could be harmed by the fact of eating it. But there are weak brethern, in them; they have not enough of the Spirit of God to dissociate from the meat offered to idols the old superstition in which they formerly lived. They cannot, without wronging their consciences, do that which a brother stronger in faith can do with impunity. But if a man see thee sitting at meat in an idol's temple, what then? Thou mayest be unhurt, but how about thy weak brother? Human impatience would say: "I cannot be hindered by his ignorance and want of faith." But if through thy knowledge thou leadest thy brother back into idolatry because he cannot eat with thy knowledge, but with his associations, is not thy knowledge a curse to thy brother, and wouldst not thou have served him better if thou hadst been as ignorant and as fearful of meat offered to idols as he is?

Old Asscoiations are Strong

Let us take another illustration: thou art a saved man, intoxicating drinks are no snare to thee, but thy weak brother has been delivered from them; they were the curse of his life, he sits at thy table, sees thee drink them with impunity, and, in his weakness of faith, he follows man instead of God and puts himself into the jaws of the lion which he has escaped by following thy example. Thou wert only thinking of thyself and thy power to drink with impunity, so, through thy knowledge he that is weak perisheth, the brother for whose sake, Christ died." (R V.) Or, again, one who can enter into an exhibition, on some place of public resort, without losing his communion with God, may forget that for a weak brother's sake, whose infirmities it is his privilege to bear, he would do more for the Church of Christ, in that weak brother by denying himself and keeping away, lest that weak brother be stumbled. Again in the books we read and speak of, etc., and in all our conversation generally, let us not forget that weak brethern are always watching us; it is our vocation to do all we do for Christ and for his Church. Sinning against the brethren and wounding their weak conscience is to

"Sin Against Christ."

O, how many sins of Christians there are in this way against the brethren and so against Christ. It is utterly impossible to keep watch over ourselves in all the details of life, but if we are fully surrendered to the Holy Ghost he will warn us whenever a brother or sister is in danger of being hurt or stumbled by us. In measure as we take in the exceeding glory of our calling to be one, it becomes a sweet and welcome privilege, and no hard cross, to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. Self-pleasing becomes absolutely abhorrent to us as we see and enter upon our true and divine vocation. We see a beauty in Christ's life of renunciation above all other beauty, and we cannot but say with Paul: "If meat make my brother to stumble, I will eat no meat while the world standeth lest I make my brother to offend."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

EATING IN THE IDOL'S COURTS.

CLEAR idea of the circumstances in which Paul wrote this letter to the Church at Corinth will do much toward explaining some of its teaching. As in our own correspondence, we would write a very different letter to a newly married friend, from one addressed to a friend suffering under bereavement, or some heavy trial, so Paul's letter was intended for people in peculiar circumstances. As was his babit, however, he lays down broad principles, which we can apply to modern life. His letter is believed to have been written in the spring of 57, about three and a half years after Paul left Corinth. He was at Ephesus and had just received a letter from the church at Corinth. Its tenor can be perceived from Paul's answer. The church wanted an authoritative utterance from him on questions which had arisen since his departure. The little group of Christians he left there, belonged to different social ranks and some of them had been rescued from the vicious classes. They were in a city given over to licentiousness, and would be exposed to fierce temptations. From Chloe's servants who brought the letter to Paul, information was obtained which caused the Apostle great sorrow. Some members of the church had fallen into sin, others were worldly and in the church itself there were quarrels and divisions. Some of these disputes were about doctrine, some about baptism, then, as now, a fruitful subject of contention, some about marriage and some about the conduct of church discipline. When Paul answered the letter he had in mind the facts imparted to him by Chloe's servants. Our lesson has to do with one of the questions submitted to him—that relating to the meat which had been offered to idols. This matter was one of immense practical importance. The priests and the people about the idolatrous temples had the right to sell the carcases which had been offered in sacrifice to heathen deities. Much of the meat sold in the market came from this source and at the heathen feasts such meat was preferred. The church asked if it was wrong to eat it. The question might have been easily answered if it had stood alone. An idol was nothing and the meat did not suffer by having been offered to it. But to Jewish converts such an act was revolting; it had been forbidden by the Council at Jerusalem (See Acts 15: 20); and it might lead weak Christians to revive the practice of eating in the courts of the idol's temples. Taking all things into account, Paul said it was well to abstain. The great object was to win souls for Christ, and if the practice of eating food indiscriminately was keeping any back, or causing divisions and weakening the church, it should be abandoned. Thus we obtain the principle which we may apply now, when the whole question of idol worship is obsolete, that Christian love is higher law than Christian rights.

If any man see thee who hast knowledge. If any kind-hearted man thoughtlessly dropped a banana skin or a piece of orange peel on the pavement and afterward heard that some one had slipped on it and injured himself, he would be sincerely sorry. How much more would the Christian grieve if by inadvertence he set an example which led others into sin! Mr Spurgeon used to say that when he was staying at Homburg he never went to the public gardens in which the gambling-palace was situated. They are the most beautiful gardens in the world and none would have enjoyed seeing them more than he, but he would not go. He was not afraid of being attracted by the gambling-table, but he refrained for the sake of others. Perhaps some man who had not the same moral strength might have seen him go in, and naturally inferring that there could be no harm in doing it as Mr. Spurgeon did it, might have gone in, too, and once within the circle of fascination, could not have resisted. As a matter of fact, the proprietor of the gambling hell said that many of his victims were lured in that way. The beauty of the gardens attracted respectable people. Others who were weak followed them in and, once there, were induced to enter the gaming saloon. Mr. Spurgeon felt, when he heard this, that although there would be no harm to him and a great deal of pleasure in walking in the gardens, and though he had a perfect right to do so, it would be wrong to enter the gardens.

Them that are weak. None but they who are affected with the craving for intoxicants know what weakness and frailty there is in it. Prof. Drummond says: I knew a man who had this awful craving, but who wrestled with it and overcame it. He yearned to help those similarly afflicted and was successful in doing so for he spoke to them with sympathy knowing by his own experience how pitiful was their lot. He became celebrated as a temperance lecturer, but he supported himself by his trade as a glass-cutter and gave his services free of charge to the temperance cause. Many years passed after he had ceased to be a drunkard but the appetite was not eradicated. One day a servant girl brought into his place of business a decanter with a broken neck, and asked him to cut it smooth. He took up the bottle to see what was wrong; the fumes of brandy came out of the neck and went into his brain. He turned the decanter upside down and got a drop of the fluid upon his finger and put it to his lips. It set his blood on fire. He went to the nearest saloon and got drunk. That was the beginning of a very bitter and disgraceful end.

A young man who has been working in Yokohama, Japan, related to Dr. W. M. Taylor, of New York, a remarkable incident which occurred there. A temperance society was formed in the city sometime ago. It hung out its sign over its meeting place, and the sign was read by a native of Ouida who came to Yokohama on business. No missionaries were allowed to work in Ouida so that he had not heard anything of the temperance movement. He went into the room and inquired what it was. He was told, and the idea struck him as novel and useful. He obtained some literature and pledges, and went back to Ouida determed to organize a temperance society. Although there were plenty of drunkards there, the society was not the success that it was in Yokohama. Something appeared to be lacking. On going again to Yokohama the man made another call on the Temperance Union. There he discovered that the defect in his work was the absence of motive. The people could not see why they should deny themselves for the sake of their weak brethren. The power of the love of Christ in arousing love of others was explained to him, and he begged that a native evangelist be sent back with him to Ouida to teach him and his fellow townsmen. From that visit grew a church of over forty native members, and the temperance society flourished. The people who learned to love Christ and follow him began to take an interest, quite new to them, in the welfare of all about them.

For whom Christ died. This thought gives a new aspect to the valne of a soul. When we see a drunkard reel along the street we are apt to think it does not much matter what becomes of him. But Christ did not think so. He loved the poor and degraded and proved it by dying to save them. It is the fact of his love that has given him the power at which we often wonder over the outcast. Love has a mighty power to redeem though it be only the love of one like ourselves. The superintendent of the Inebriate Asylum at Binghampton, N. Y., is reported as saying, "Some men are sent here under compulsion—almost driven here by their friends and such men are never cured. In all my experience I have never known a case of a man being cured of his inebriety unless there was someone—a sister, a mother, a wife, a maiden—who prayed for him, hoped for him, wept for him at home. The great redemptive power of the world, the power that saves men from sin is the power of a loving suffering heart."

Singing the Gospel.

Alexina Mackay Ruthquist and Her Heroic Christian Work Among the Hindus.

ONE of the most delightful and instructive missionary books of the season has just been issued from the publishing house of A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York, the writer being the author of the famous missionary biography, "A. M. Mackay, Missionary of the C. M. S.

Missionary to India. . . . (Reproduced by Permission.) to Uganda."—a volume from which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published copious extracts a year ago. The present volume, which has a certain connection with the previous work, is entitled, A. Mackay Ruthquist, or Singing the Gospel among the Hindus and Gonds. It is the life-story of Alexina Mackay Ruthquist, one of the brightest, most devoted and self-denying of missionaries, now gone to her reward. Her field of labor was India, and there her efforts were remarkably blessed. In the Zenanas, among the soldiers, and among the native population she sang sweetly and worked nobly and successfully for the Master. Some of her experiences in the Zenanas and elsewhere are given below in her own words:

"A few days ago at Nagpoor we had a direct call from a woman as we were passing, and soon we were surrounded, not only by a little company of women with such kindly faces, in the centre of which was our own special friend, in the shape of a Brahman widow, but a large gathering from outside, consisting of men, youths and children, grouped round us, and listened very quietly to some of the most stirring hymns selected by us, as well as to a plain statement I read to them from a little book, concerning the true way of salvation. As we were taking leave of this company, several of the women from other houses urged us to visit their homes too, which we were only too glad to do, finding new opportunities in the circle of friends connected with each.

"The young native teacher of another school to which we introduced ourselves came up to our gharree the other day, and asked us to visit his mother-in-law (Sassoo), sending a boy along with us to show the way. Here we had a capital opportunity, a number of women crowding in, while several men and boys seated themselves in the little courtyard. The teacher himself joined us, and graciously granted permission to his shy-looking wife to learn to read, along with another member of the company who had become a pupil.

A Native Minstrel.

"While sitting in a certain house one morning, about to begin our first hymn, a young minstrel, a religious beggar of some sort, appeared in the yard. He had a tamborine, or some such musical instrument, in his hand, and we allowed him to treat us to one of his songs, afterwards asking him to listen to us. He had been singing about one of their heroes, Sukaram by name, as he informed me. I told him our song was about the true God, who filled heaven and earth, and had created us and everything. When we had finished singing, he asked us for a hymn-book. Now these hymn-books cost four annas, i. e., about 6d., and on ordinary occasions we insist on the payment of this small sum, if the person soliciting it seems to be in comfortable circumstances, otherwise there would be no end to the gratuities we would have to pay to these people. In this case, however, in consideration that the young man in question could read (in itself a rare accomplishment) and moreover, that he made his living by song-singing, and might himself unconsciously become a propagator of the true religion if he took to singing our hymns, or even carrying them about with him, I made one over to him, as well as the little First Book, containing so much Christian instruction. Meeting him since at another house, I was able to give him a little book written by one of our missionaries, containing the history of his hero, Sukaram! We frequently invited these strolling musical or other medicants to sit down and listen to a hymn, when they call at the houses we are visiting."

Roses in January.

"Yesterday," Mrs. Ruthquist wrote on another occasion, "such a nice little boy led the way for us to his home, where we found his mother and some other friends waiting for us. Almost immediately a wreath of splendid roses was thrown around my neck, and this the month of January, remember! And the usual refreshment of betel-nut offered, after which we sang and explained a nice hymn. A little baby of a month old was shown to us. The mother wishes to be taught to read and make topees soon. The boy is very anxious to learn English, but his father will not pay the school fees. He is a selfish man, and spends the money on himself. The grandfather was an educated man; he taught in a school founded by a famous missionary, now dead, a Mr. Hislop. He almost made up his mind to profess Christianity. I do hope the way will be opened for my little friend.

"The name Gond, or Gund, is from the Telugu word for a mountain, and signifies 'hillmen.' This simple race believe that they were created by the invisible God on the snowy peak of Dhawalagiri, the third loftiest of the Himalaya Mountains; and their legend of the five "Songs of Lingo" describes how they descended the torrent which sprang from the melting snow on this majestic summit, until they reached and settled in the ravines and jungles among the hills of Central India. Over half a century ago, Sir Donald M'Leod—a Scotchman, who has also the blood of the Huguenots in his veins—created and supported for many years missions to the Gonds and some other aboriginal tribes. It remained for the Scottish missionary Hislop to reduce the Gondi language to writing, and to reveal to the world the folk-lore of the Gonds, and their social and religious condition. To work among this timid, truthful and superstitious people, Alexina gladly settled down with her husband in the lonely jungle. Many of them were bards who could sing and play the drum and other musical instruments, and as they were exceedingly friendly, and very receptive to Christianity, her hymn-singing was greatly appreciated.

The Gonds are said to have about fifteen gods, all malevolent, who are regarded as media of communication between the Creator and mankind; but in their homes they have no idols. They are in reality Shamanites, or devil-worshipers; but unlike the Hindoos, they have a strong sense of sin, and of their need of a living sacrifice, and of the shedding of blood. Their dense ignorance is very trying, and a great hindrance to the entrance of the Gospel; but at the same time, Alexina considered that, dark and degraded as they are, they are more easily evangelized than the Hindoos, as they have less to unlearn. The Gond villages are very isolated, and frequently are comprised of only four or five houses, although sometimes they may be double that number; but alas! however few there may be, one is invariably a brewery! The curse of opium has also fallen upon these simple Hill people.

Rev. J. Montelins, of the Swedish society, writes:

Idolatrous Abominations.

"One sees with grief how the people (the Gonds), walk in darkness, and whilst they think they are serving God, they are degrading themselves in the service of their idols. I have read much of the pursuit of evil lusts to the honor of idols, but never could I have imagined that human uncleanness and worship in idol temples could so blend as they in reality do. We have always been obliged to make our observations through the doorway, as we were forbidden to enter, unless we would draw off our shoes, and such veneration we could not pay to their abominations. Here there is the blowing of trumpets, ringing of bells, and beating of drums for the idols, both when they are to be awakened in the morning, or when they are to sleep in the evening. These idols are dressed and undressed, washed and cared for, whilst the whole time they are being fanned. If there was not under all this the frightful reality of the power of the devil in the world, one might call it the people's play with dolls.

Mrs. Ruthquist died while on a voyage up the Red Sea. When the news came to Amarwara, the women came together in crowds, and one could see and hear them outstripping each other in weeping and lamentation, crying, "Oh, that she had only been allowed to die here, that we might have gone with her to the grave!" On the evening of the last day she was in Amarwara, she called some women who used to come for instruction, saying, "I want to have them once more; who knows when I can have them next?" Her mind was very much taken up latterly with thinking of heaven, and how it would be there. On her way down to Nagpoor, she sang the whole way one beautiful hymn after the other, and several times in one day the twenty-third Psalm.

The War in Morocco—Mekinez, the Summer Residence of the Sultan.

A Moorish "Holy War."

The Spanish Garrison at Melilla Fiercely Attacked by the Moslem Tribesmen.

"HOLY wars," so-called, have at different stages of the world's history, devastated large areas of the earth's surface and, in the name of religion, destroyed millions of its population. Even in these comparatively enlightened days, the recent religious riots in India, the relentless persecution of Christians in Turkey and the threatening attitude of the Buddhist and Shinto devotees in China and the Korea show that the intolerant fury of the "jehad" or holy war is not confined to the Moslem alone.

From Morocco comes the news of an attack by the Riff tribes in force on the Spanish garrison at Melilla, a town on the northern coast. Melilla is a Spanish convict settlement and in view of previous disturbances, the military commandant, Gen. Margallo, decided to strengthen the fortifications. This angered the Moors and the mountain tribes assembled a force about 6,000 strong and attacked the little garrison of 400 men. The garrison, although vastly outnumbered, fought heroically and were aided by the white residents of the town, who organized a corps for the defence. The guns of the garrison did great execution, and besides inflicting heavy losses on the enemy, destroyed many buildings, including a mosque. Eighteen of the defenders were killed and over 100 wounded. Spain has resolved to send a strong force to punish the tribesmen, and the Sultan of Morocco, Muley Hassan, who acknowledges the right of Spain to build a fort at Melilla, has promised to make reparation. It is doubtful, however, whether Sultan Muley can suppress the fanaticism of his mountaineer subjects.

It is possible that even Spanish gunboats and artillery may find a more powerful foe to face than they anticipate, should the tribesmen summon Mohammedan aid from other parts of Africa. The present trouble brings up the question of what is to be ultimately done with Morocco. England, France, Italy and Spain all have covetous eyes turned toward the little North African independency. Spain already has a foothold there, having both Ceuta and Melilla — the latter a sort of offset to the English possession of Gibraltar. Thirty years ago, the piratical Riff tribes rose against the Spanish and Spain occupied Tetuan and exacted $20,000,000 indemnity from Sultan Muley's father. It is not improbable that the present trouble may result in a further addition to Spanish territory in Morocco.

Mekinez, the summer residence of the Sultan (shown in the illustration on this page), is situated about forty miles west of Fez, and Muley Hassan is conducting the negotiations for reparation at the former place. Its triple row of walls, its olive plantations, and thousands of white roofs and terraces, with not a wreath of smoke ascending and not a man or woman visible within the walls, make it look like a phantom city. Yet it is claimed that it has the most beautiful gardens, the finest palace and the handsomest women in all Africa. The palace was founded by Muley Ismael, who had "4,000 wives and 877 sons."

WEEK-NIGHT SERVICES.

ALL over Christendom, on Friday nights, or Thursday nights, or Wednesday nights, people assemble in churches for religious service. Is not the Sunday service enough? Why invade the week-nights with the church meeting? Many Christians do not appreciate it. Indeed, it is a great waste of time, unless there be some positive advantage to be gained. The French nation at one time tried having a Sunday only once in ten days. The intelligent Christian finds he needs a Sunday every three or four days, and so builds a brief one on the shore of a week day in the shape of an extra religious service. He gets grace on Sunday to bridge the chasm of worldliness between that and the next Sunday, but finds the arch of the bridge very great, and runs up a pier midway to help sustain the pressure. There are 168 hours in a week, and but two hours of public religious service on Sunday. What chance have two hours in the battle with 168? A week-night meeting allows larger membership utterance. A minister cannot know how to preach unless, in a conference meeting, he finds the religious state of the people. He feels the pulse before giving the medicine. Otherwise, he will not know whether it ought to be a sedative or a stimulant. Every Christian ought to have something to say. Every man is a walking eternity. The plainest man has omnipotence to defend him, omniscience to watch him, infinite goodness to provide for him. The tamest religious experience has in it poems, tragedies, histories, Iliads, Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. Ought not such an one to have something to say? If you were ever in the army, you know what it is to see an officer on horseback dash swiftly past carrying a dispatch. You wondered as he went, what the news was. Was the army to advance or was an enemy coming?

So every Christian carries with him a dispatch from God to the world. Let him ride swiftly to deliver it. The army is to advance and the enemy is coming. Go out and fulfill your mission, and you may have a letter committed to your care, and after some days you find it in one of your pockets and you forget to deliver it. Great was your chagrin when you found that it pertained to some sickness or trouble. God gives to every man a letter of warning or invitation to carry, and what will be your chagrin in the judgment to find that you had forgotten it. A week-night meeting widens the pulpit until all the people can stand on it. Such a service tests one's piety. No credit for going to church on Sunday. Places of amusement are all closed. There is no money to be made. But week nights, every kind of temptation and opportunity spreads before a man, and if he go to the praying circle he must give them up. A man who goes to the weekly service regularly, through moonlight and pitch darkness, through good walking and slush ankle deep, will, in the book of judgment, find it set down to his credit, his eternal credit. He will have a better seat in heaven than the man who went only when the walking was good and the weather comfortable and the service attractive and his health perfect. That service which calls for nothing, God counts for nothing. A week-night service also thrusts religion into the secularities of the week. It is as much as to say, "This is God's Wednesday, or God's Thursday, or God's Friday, or God's week." You would not give much for a property, the possession of which you could only have one-seventh of the time, and God does not want that man whose service he can have only on the Sabbath. If you paid full wages to a man, and found out that six-sevenths of his time he was serving a rival house, you would be indignant, and the man who takes God's goodness and gives six-sevenths of his time to the world, the flesh and the devil, is an abomination to the world. The whole week ought to be a temple of seven rooms dedicated to God. You may, if you will, make one room the Holy of Holies, but let the temple be consecrated. The week-day service gives additional opportunity of religious culture, and we find it so difficult to do right and be right that we cannot afford to miss any opportunity.

Such a service is a lunch between the Sunday meals, and if we do not take it, we get weak and faint. A truth coming to us then ought to be especially effective. If you are in a railroad train, and stop at the depot, and a boy comes in with a telegram, all the passengers lean forward and wonder if it is for them. It may be news from home. It must be urgent, or it would not be brought there. Now, if, while we are rushing on in the whirl of everyday excitement, a message from God meets us, it must be an urgent and important message. If God speaks to us in a meeting mid-week, it is because there is something that needs to be said before next Sunday.

THE PEN GAINING.

BRAIN is coming up. Muscle has made many a strike for higher wages at the door of the factory and the mine, but the brain has suffered in silence. Grub Street, London, with all its pinched poverty, has run clear around the world. "Prideaux' Collection," without which a library is incomplete, was two years rejected by the publishers. The valuable works of Linnæus were sold for one dollar, although now the scientific world would not part with them for millions of dollars. When Victor Hugo in early life wanted to be made a member of the French Academy, he called upon Collard for his vote, and the latter pretended not to have heard of him or of his books. "Will you accept a copy of my books?" said Victor Hugo. "No, I thank you," said Collard, "I never read new books." Paley offered to sell his immortal philosophy for five hundred dollars, and the offer was rejected. Many of the best and wisest of the authors had not where to lay their head. Sometimes government took pity upon them, as when President Pierce appointed Hawthorne to office, and Locke was, by the British Government, made Commissioner of Appeals, and Steele was made a Commissioner of Stamps. Oliver Goldsmith said: "I have been years struggling with a wretched being, with all that contempt which indigence brings with it, with all those strong passions which make contempt unsupportable." Mr. Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," had no home, and was inspired to the writing of his immortal song by a walk through the streets on a slushy night, and hearing music and laughter inside a comfortable dwelling. The world-renowned Sheridan said: "Mrs. Sheridan and I were often obliged to keep writing for our daily shoulder of mutton, otherwise we should have had no dinner." John Mitford, while he was writing his most celebrated book, lived in the fields, making his bed of grass and nettles, while two-penny worth of bread and cheese, with an onion, was his daily food. But things have vastly bettered. Literature is more honored now than in any age of the world.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Thompson, Pa. Are audiphones practical for church use that the deaf may be enabled to hear the Gospel preached? If so, where can they be procured?

We believe they are now used to some extent, but would recommend you to write to Hiscox Freeman, 853 Broadway, New York.

J. E. Montgomery, Malcolm, Neb. Does the new birth of which Christ spoke to Nicodemus mean the same as conversion? Does it take place in this life or when a man enters heaven?

It is the same as conversion and takes place in this life when a man begins his Christian career. It is the new life imparted to him when he exercises faith in Christ.

S. A. Marteeny, St. John, Kan. Was there any effort made to rebuild the Temple after its destruction by Titus, A. D. 70?

In A. D. 136, Emperor Hadrian built a heathen temple on its site and dedicated it to Jupiter Capitolinus. No Jew was permitted to approach it. In 363, Emperor Julian undertook to rebuild the Temple but was compelled to desist by flames, which are said to have burst forth from the foundations. A mosque now stands on the Temple site.

A. W. Smedes, Springbrook, N. J. How do you reconcile the two passages: "God is love," and "Our God is a consuming fire"?

We can readily comprehend how the two emotions of love and anger can exist in the same human breast; and as we can only know God's nature as it is revealed through agencies that are intended to be comprehended by our humanity, so we can realize the possibility of love and anger—just, righteous anger against sin—existing in the divine nature also.

C. A. Bergen, Bellemead, N. J. Where did Cain get his wife and who was she?

She was doubtless a dweller of some land "east of Eden" to which Cain fled after his fratricide. "Nod" is derived from the word "Nud," which means "flight," or "the land of exile." There is no country in Asia of this name, and as the geographical position of Eden is uncertain, so must be the exact locality of Cain's exile. Some commentators believe that India is indicated.

George R. Greene, Seattle, Wash. What authority had Paul for claiming to be a Roman? He stated that he was a Jew and a Pharisee.

There is no inconsistency, any more than in speaking of a naturalized Irishman as an American citizen. Roman citizenship was occasionally conferred on men of other nationalities as a reward for distinguished service. It was highly valued, and as it appears in Paul's case, was a protection from indignity. Paul's father or some ancestor had received this distinction and Paul inherited it.

"Subscriber," Mt. Holly, Mass. Please explain 1 Timothy 1:20.

You will find a similar and more explicit passage in 1. Cor. 5:5. It would appear that the Apostles possessed a power of discipline mysterious to us which was exercised on delinquent members of the church. It appears to have been more than excommunication and included bodily affliction intended to produce reformation. This bodily ill the Apostle regarded as inflicted by Satan, as he did his own affliction, which he spoke of (II. Cor. 12:7), as a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him.

S. D. Davis, Vienna, S. C. 1. Did Peter's command (Acts 2:38) imply that the sins of the people would not be forgiven till after baptism and is it [illegible]? 2. Did the Apostles expect the Jewish law to stand [illegible] years after the Christ's death?

1. Peter required them to be baptized as an outward and visible evidence of their faith. In those days of Jewish persecution, the act of baptism marked a man out as a follower of Christ with all the danger and social discredit it entailed. No man would be likely to thus boldly take the stand with the despised band of Christians, unless he had true faith. Baptism was in their case a test of sincerity. Their sins would be forgiven when they exercised faith, and it is so now. 2. Yes, their conception of Christianity was that of a Jewish sect. It was only gradually, through Peter's vision and Paul's story of his success among the Gentiles, that they realized the universality of the new religion. Even after the Council at Jerusalem had decreed freedom from the law for the Gentile converts (Acts 5:19, 20), the feeling prevailed, especially with James, that Jewish converts ought to continue to observe the Mosaic laws. (Acts 21:24.)

L. Powers, San Marcos, Tex. Do you construe the teaching of the Bible as declaring that persons who have had no means of acquiring a knowledge of Christianity will be punished after death?

The two passages bearing most directly on the question are Luke 12:47, 48, and Romans 2:12-15. You will see from these that every person will be judged according to the light he has had. There is no explicit statement as to the condition of the heathen who died without hearing the Gospel, and there was no reason why God should tell us what he does in respect to them; the question does not concern us. As, however, we are told that there is no way of attaining eternal life except through Christ, there is abundant and urgent reason for the church to make earnest effort to carry the Gospel to those who have not heard it.

A. Hewitt, Marianna, Ark. 1. Were the Kingdoms of Judah and Israel totally distinct and did Judah occupy the whole country after Israel ceased to be a nation? 2. Who was the elect lady to whom John addressed his second epistle?

1. The separation of the monarchy into two took place shortly after Solomon's death, as described in I. Kings 12. After the downfall of the ten tribes, the southern branch, consisting of Judah and Benjamin, continued to occupy the land they had formerly occupied until they too were carried away captive. 2. Her name is not known, unless the Greek word "Kyria," translated "lady," be a proper name. Some have regarded it as the Greek form of Martha. She was evidently a woman well known to the Apostle. He had, as we infer from the epistle, been at the house of her sister, where he met her children. The idea formerly entertained that under this name the Apostle was writing to a church, is now generally abandoned.

John A. Warner, Richland, S. Dak. In what century did the Catholic Church originate?

Catholic historians assert that their church began with the life of Jesus on earth, and endeavor to support their claim by legend and tradition. His advent was the beginning of the Christian Church, of which the Church of Rome was a later and corrupt development. Christianity spread through a large part of the civilized world and the Emperor Constantine, being converted, transferred the imperial residence to Constantinople, leading to a rivalry between the Christian bishops of Rome and Constantinople. The Roman bishops extended their influence over Western Europe and at the close of the Eighth Century had established the Papal temporal power and converted the episcopate into a Papal Church. This period is therefore to be regarded as the date of the foundation of the Roman Catholic Church. The Reformation, which came later, giving birth to the Protestant Church, was really a restoration of the original Christian Church and its pure doctrines, from which the Eastern and Western churches had both diverged.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A CHRISTIAN WORK IN RUSSIA.

AN exquisitely beautiful work, so unostentatious that few people outside of St. Petersburg know of its existence, has been carried on in that city for some time by the two ladies whose portraits appear on this page. The motive for the work originated in New York. Several years ago, Miss Grundberg and Miss Wennberg were strolling up Fourth Avenue one Sunday morning and entered a church there. They were Swedish ladies who were engaged in teaching in New York and had been drawn together when they first met in this city by the similarity of their circumstances, both being of Swedish nationality and both having been orphaned in early life. Neither was a Christian, but both went to church occasionally. The preacher that morning, a perfect stranger to them, preached on John 3 : 16, and his words were blessed of God to the ultimate conversion of both ladies. They shortly afterward returned to Sweden, and thence went to Russia, settling in St. Petersburg. There they united with the American-English Church under the pastorate of Mr. Kilburn, and looked around for some work to do for Christ. By Mr. Kilburn's advice they distributed tracts among the poor of the city and talked with them. The police, however, ordered this work discontinued. They then began a work among friendless girls seeking to save them from the temptations of the capital, in which they were successful in protecting many from falling and finding them suitable positions in which they could earn a livelihood. Again, however, the police interfered, always on the same plea of heretical teaching, and the temporary home they had opened had to be closed. Their next effort was a home for orphan children in which they gathered twenty-one little waifs. The police interfered again, but by this time the story of their persecution had been told in Court circles, and one of the Grand-duchesses laid their case before the Czar himself. He promptly stopped the police proceedings and gave the ladies his sanction to their work. Since that time they have been unmolested, and their Christian labors among the poor and friendless have extended and been greatly blessed. The work has been carried on in absolute dependence on God; and money has been provided in answer to prayer, as every need arose. God's promise has been fulfilled in their experience. (Isa. 33: 10.)

Died Alone on the Mountains.

An old man died a few days ago of exposure on the mountains of Pike county, Pa. He lived at Roemerville, Pa., and left home to visit his brother in Porter township. The country through which he traveled was mountainous and sparsely settled. He stopped at a house near Cadensis to inquire his way, and that was the last that was seen of him alive. It was several days before it became known that he had not reached his brother's. A searching party was organized at once and his dead body was found near Goose Pond. He was only a mile and a half from his brother's, but he had evidently become bewildered and wandered about aimlessly in the woods until worn out by hunger and fatigue. The surroundings show that he had broken off branches of trees and made him a bed in several places, and the gnawed sassafrass roots disclosed the straits to which hunger had driven him. He had $39 in his pockets. If some kind-hearted person had been near to tell him how near he was to his brother's house and direct him thither how thankful the old man would have been. There are many here and in heathen lands trying to find the way to God and waiting for such a service to be rendered to them. (Romans 10: 14.)

A Use For Tungsten.

A discovery reported by the German papers promises to be of considerable value to manufacturers. It is of a use to which the brittle white metal known as tungsten can be applied. Although this metal is found in great abundance in many districts, it has been regarded as of no value, as it is too brittle to be worked. A short time ago, however, some crystals were found, so hard that they would scratch glass and cut topaz and other precious stones. On being analyzed, it was found that the crystals contained nothing but iron and tungsten. Experiments were made which have resulted in the discovery that a combination of the two metals in the proportion of one atom of iron with two of tungsten produces the crystals, and when tungsten is alloyed with steel a remarkable increase of hardness is imparted to the latter metal, minute crystals being formed in the mass. Thus the quality which rendered the metal useless by itself, renders it more valuable when combined with another metal, each supplying the lack of the other. The principle does not apply to metals only; it operates among men, and we see it in the Church of Christ, where "there are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit," (1 Cor 4 : 16) and the whole body is "compacted by that which every joint supplieth." (Eph. 4 : 16.) There is, too, much human material outside, which, like the tungsten, is now useless, but would become valuable if consecrated to Christ and used in his service. (1 Tim. 1:12,13.)

A Use For the Willow.

The apparently useless willow that grows in abundance along the banks of the Mississippi, has, says a scientific journal, been put to good service: "The United States Government, it is safe to say, would not be half as far along with the improvement of the Mississippi as it is if it had not had the aid of the humble and seemingly-useless willow. It is of no account for building; it cannot be construed as firewood by any but the most active imagination, and it is of no use in the arts, beyond the making of whistles, but when it comes to building a dam the engineers find nothing that fills the bill half as well as the willow. It is woven into a long continuous mat. One end of this is anchored to the shore on one side of the chute that is to be damned, and weighted with rocks and sunk to the bottom, then another mat, made in the same way, is woven and laid down on top of the first, and similarly weighted down, and this work is continued till the dam has risen as high as it is intended to stand; the finishing being always a heavy coating of rock that covers the willow and all. The willow, always covered with water and the mud that inevitably lodges among the rocks of the dam, is kept sealed air-tight, and of course does not decay. It binds the rocks together and prevents the dam being pushed out of place by ice or disturbed by the pressure of the current at high water." It is so with human nature. The weakest and apparently most useless men and women often effect a purpose that stronger natures fail in achieving. Especially in the Lord's work the weak things of the world, the base things and those that are despised God uses to bring to naught things that are (1 Cor. 1 : 28).

MISS GRUNDBERG. MISS WENNBERG.

Caught by the Quicksand.

An effort to recover a couple of ducks which he had shot involved a sportsman in a terrible death recently near White Bear, Minn. A farm-hand who was at work on the edge of Mud Lake saw a man in a boat at some distance shooting ducks. A few minutes later a faint shout reached his ears. Looking across the lake in the direction in which he had last seen the sportsman he saw an overturned boat and a little way distant from it the man struggling in the water. He ran to a place where a boat was moored and after some time spent in searching for oars he rowed to the spot, but the man had disappeared. His body was afterward found within three feet of where the boat had been capsized, in about four feet of water. The bottom of the lake is an oozy mass of mud and treacherous quicksand, out of which shoot thousands of water lily stems. Evidently the sportsman had shot a couple of ducks—the dead birds were floating near by on the water—and in attempting to pick them up had capsized the frail boat. His feet became tangled in the web of water-lily vines, and he could not extricate himself from the quicksand, into which he sank inch by inch until he was drawn under the water and drowned. The body was nearly buried in the mud when the searchers recovered it. Analogous catastrophes have been witnessed in spiritual life. Men who have sought some worldly prize have often become entangled in snares and temptations from which they cannot extricate themselves and become dead to the influences of religion. (II. Timothy 2: 4.)

Almost a Fatal Blunder.

The quiet village of Jamaica, L. I., was disturbed early in the morning of October 3rd by the loud ringing of the church bell. It continued ringing and many of the citizens rose from their beds and went to see what was the cause of the alarm. The church doors were securely locked, yet the mysterious ringing went on. There are two watchmen employed in the districts near the church, and both of them went to the church under the impression that some practical jokers were in the building or that burglars had entered and inadvertently set in motion the electric apparatus by which the bell is rung. They approached the building stealthily from different sides, each hoping to catch the wrong-doers in the act. Soon the sound of a pistol-shot intimated to the crowd of onlookers that one of the watchmen had caught sight of an offender. Another pistol-shot was heard a few moments later, and one of the two watchmen was seen running quickly around the church. He seized a man who was lurking in the shadow of the church and dragged him out. The figures could not be clearly distinguished in the gray dawn, but there was evidently a violent altercation going on between the watchman and his captive. The people ran to the help of the officer, and found, to their surprise, that the prisoner was the other watchman, and that the two men had been shooting at each other, under the impression that they had been shooting at a burglar. When the doors of the church were opened it was found that all the commotion had been caused by a crossed wire, the insulating material of which had been gnawed off by a mouse or had gradually worn off. The two men congratulated themselves for once on their bad marksmanship. There is often trouble of other kinds in the church, generally caused by some cause as insignificant as the Jamaica mouse, that does not end so pleasantly. Those most concerned for the welfare of the church mistake each others for enemies and rush into conflict, forgetting the Apostle's warning that they are liable to be consumed one of another. (Gal. 5 : 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

From our stock of Oxford Teacher's Bibles we have thrown out a case into which a little dust had settled. They are perfect in every respect and are the same as those we used in our Premium Department. We will mail these Bibles, about 500 in number, at One Dollar each to such of our subscribers as may desire to avail themselves of this opportunity.

The Bible Society for Russia during the past year has disposed of 56,556 copies of the Sacred Scriptures. The colporteurs have traversed the wilds of Siberia in their work.

At the recent annual Juggernaut festival at Puri 70,000 worshippers were content to march before the idol's car, instead of throwing themselves under the wheels as of old.

Harrison B. Thompson, one of the missionaries of the Congregational Society in Alaska, has been murdered. It is believed that the crime was committed by a drunken Indian.

Dr. Maxwell, formerly Medical Missionary in China, informed the Royal Commission on Opium that some 20,000 victims passed through the hands of the missionaries annually, seeking to escape from the opium bondage.

The minister, whose sermon is stated to have been the chief cause of the conversion at Colchester of the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, has just died at the Parsonage, Higher Ardwick, Manchester. Rev. Robert Eaglen was born in Norfolk in 1815, and was highly esteemed by Primitive Methodists.

The statistics presented at the Sunday School Convention in St. Louis show that the United States leads the world with 123,173 Sunday Schools, 1,305,949 teachers and 9,718,422 scholars, next comes England and Wales with 37,201 Sunday Schools, 585,457 teachers and 5.976,537 scholars; Canada has 8,336 schools, 69,521 teachers and 576,064 scholars.

Rev. Weston F. Shields, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Wood River, Wis., and one of his elders, Dr. J. S. Thomas, have resigned, to engage in foreign mission work. They have been accepted by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and are now under appointment to go to the North Laos Mission in Siam. They are expecting to sail as soon as they can make all their arrangements.

Rev. Dr. Stoecker of Berlin, formerly court preacher, now a member of parliament, and head of the Berlin City Mission, has assisted Mr. Moody in his evangelistic campaign at Chicago. On Sept. 10 he preached to a large number of Germans at the Chicago Avenue Church and Music Hall. It was Mr. Moody's hope through him to reach many of those Germans who have fallen away from their churches and have almost wholly lost interest in religion.

One of the daughters of Prof. C. A. Briggs, the suspended Presbyterian minister, has entered the Grace House Training Institute for deaconesses. Prof. Briggs and his wife and daughters are warm friends of the Salvation Army and often attend the meetings at the Headquarters in Reade street, New York. Mrs. Briggs receives clothing and provisions for the use of the Army in its philanthropic departments.

Many ministers and church officers and members have united in a political organization in Jersey City, N. J., for the moral reform of the city. The political parties are so nearly balanced that it is believed a compact union of the friends of decency and good government acting disinterestedly could hold the balance of power and compel reformation. Dr. Scudder of the People's Tabernacle is the leader of the movement.

The American Board's financial report for the year shows that the income of 1892–93 is $629,946. This is less than of 1891–92 by $164,922. The donations have fallen off to the extent of $61,909 and the legacies $103,013. In August, which is usually the best month in the year, the collections were $79,030, while in August of last year they were $124,394. The debt is about $88,000. While this decrease is partly due to the business depression, the chief cause is that many of the churches which have been the largest givers in the past are dissatisfied with the attitude of the Prudential Committee.

Dr. L. W. Munhall closed his work in Mount Carmel, Pa., on Oct. 5. The entire city and neighborhood has been moved during these services and hundreds have been converted. Dr. Munhall had arranged to leave by an early morning train on Friday and bade his friends good-by the previous evening, but a general desire was expressed for a farewell praise and prayer-meeting and one was called for four o'clock on Friday morning. The church was filled at that hour and there was a blessed season of prayer. Afterward the company went with the Evangelist to the railroad station and continued singing hymns until the train left.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THREE CANDIDATES FOR DISCIPLESHIP.

Preached last Sunday morning, Oct. 15, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: Luke ix. 57-62: "And it came to pass, that as they went in the way, a certain man said unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," etc.

E have brought before us in this Scripture three candidates for discipleship in Christ's school. The facts concerning each one furnish sufficient material for a discourse; but there is a decided advantage in the comparison and contrast of one case with another. Perhaps our sermons ought oftener than they do to deal with considerable portions of Scripture; certainly this course is justified where three related and yet distinct instances of Christ's wisdom in dealing with inquirers are brought before us in so close relations

The first two instances are given by the evangelist Matthew in connection with the stilling of the tempest; but Luke's order is preferable, as he usually gives us a continued narrative while Matthew groups events topically rather than chronologically. Luke informs us that Jesus was now going to Jerusalem; that around him were great multitudes, and that he gave commandment to depart unto the other side of the sea. This time no doubt was a crisis in our Lord's ministry. Around the King was gathering a company of enthusiastic adherents, whose expectations of earthly honor and glory were raised to the highest point. The tumult and excitement which they caused threatened to defeat our Lord's higher and diviner plans, and it became absolutely necessary that he should avert the threatened outbreak, or change the whole character of his earthly mission. In some instances on former occasions he was able to repress the enthusiasm of his Mistaken Followers.

In other cases he withdrew himself from them and their dangerous designs. At such seasons he was accustomed to retire to the other side of the lake of Galilee; but the earnestness of some of his followers led them to intrude even upon his quiet retreat there. It seems now a fitting time for our Lord to lay down plainly the requirements of discipleship, and to bring from the outer into the inner circle of his friendship and service those who were worthy of this high honor.

In nothing does our Lord's divine wisdom appear more conspicuously than in his relations with individual souls. This manifestation is especially noticeable when men of various characters and attainments come into contact with him in rapid succession, as in the case before us. These applicants possess some characteristics in common; but their spiritual conditions are so diverse as to require opposite forms of treatment on the part of Christ. He was the wise physician of souls; he knew how rapidly to make an exhaustive diagnosis in each case. He needed not that any man should tell him, for he knew what was in man. Every student of Scripture must be profoundly impressed by our Lord's practical wisdom in dealing with inquirers, whether they were honest inquirers or merely captious cavilers. These three candidates all seemed to have already belonged to the outer circle of Christ's disciples. Are they worthy of admittance into closer and tenderer relations with the Lord? Let us study the three cases in their order.

The first candidate was an enthusiastic, impulsive, unreflecting and self-seeking man. The evangelist Matthew calls him "a certain Scribe," or "one Scribe." There is perhaps some emphasis to be placed on the "one," marking the infrequency of offers of service from the class to which this man belonged. It was rare that a scribe, an educated and professional expounder of the law, offered to follow Christ in any way, and still more rare that he should say, "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." The numeral "one," which means more here than the indefinite article, would seem to call attention to the wonder that a scribe should make this offer. But although he might regard Christ as the promised Messiah, like other disciples, he had mistaken notions of the nature of his kingdom. His profession of attachment was in itself most commendable; it possesses characteristics worthy of enumeration. It was voluntary; he had not been called by Christ; he had not been urged by the other disciples. He is thus a volunteer, and usually volunteers are preferred for the most difficult and dangerous forms of service. His profession also was determined; he affirms his willingness to become Christ's constant attendant, sharing his dangers at all times, and in all places. His proffer was so unreserved that it reminds us of the brave words of the noble Ittai to David, "Surely in what place my Lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be." His words arouse our enthusiasm and evoke our appreciation. His conduct and speech are entirely commendable. There is no reason, so far as we know, to doubt the honesty of this aspirant to discipleship. But our Lord's answer shows that and unreflecting. Doubtless he expected a temporal kingdom, established with great earthly splendor; and doubtless he expected that he would, as an attendant on Christ, have a prominent place, a sort of premiership, in that new kingdom. Our Lord saw that there was not in him the thorough devotion which would lead him to follow him in trial as truly as in triumph. His words are wonderfully suggestive of Peter's confident asseveration, "Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both unto prison and to death." It is certain that Christ was not impressed by the apparent heartiness and honesty of his profession of devotion; to Jesus these fine-sounding words were really hollow-hearted. His profession did not have the right ring; it lacked the element of intelligent and genuine resolution. Christ's perfect honesty always impresses us as we read the gospels. He will never secure followers by false representations; he will never lower the standard of discipleship to accommodate a rich young man, or a learned scribe; neither will he raise it to keep away one who is poor or ignorant. There is the same standard for fishermen, scribes and millionaires. His reply on this occasion corrects this applicant's false expectations of worldly advantage in discipleship. Christ does not forbid him, but simply shows what he must expect in becoming a true disciple. Christ seems to ask, "Do you expect worldly good?" And he practically affirms, "if so, you will be utterly disappointed, for I am Houseless and Homeless."

With wonderful pathos he reminds him that the foxes have holes and the birds nests, but the son of man has not where to lay his head. He is not in this reply complaining of his abject poverty; we dishonor the master when we unduly magnify his houseless condition. He is merely giving a proverbial description of his unsettled and homeless life in contrast with the life this scribe expected should he become a disciple. Nevertheless, his words show us how great was his poverty, how complete his humiliation. The heavenly king had no palace, no royal couch, no obsequious servants. On the cross he bowed his head on his own breast, for in death as in life he had not where else to lay it. He would have this impulsive applicant carefully count the cost; he would throw him back upon deeper searchings of his own heart than he had yet made. We do not know whether this scribe became finally one of the pupils of this houseless teacher. It is more likely that he, as well as the rich young man of a later day, withdrew and went away never to return. Christ teaches us, as he taught the scribe, that except we give up all for him we cannot be his disciples. Are you willing here and now to give up everything for Christ? Let us remember that Christ asks us to give up nothing which we ought to keep. We are to give up what the sick man gives up when returning health flushes his cheek and invigorates his body; what the prisoner gives up when his prison doors are thrown wide open, and he passes into the outer world as a free man. Come now, I beseech you, and be Christ's disciples in this whole-hearted, joyous and blessed spirit, and you will have a foretaste of heaven even on the earth as you follow the Lord withersoever he goeth.

Our attention is now directed to the second applicant for the honors of discipleship. He is a man who is in a strait betwixt two duties. Our Lord's relations to this hopeful candidate are most instructive and helpful. While he checked the one applicant, he encouraged the other. He recognized more honesty in this man's backwardness, than in the other's forwardness. To him, therefore, he addressed the encouraging and significant words, "Follow me." He puts this man into the same category as Matthew, Philip and Peter, to whom he had addressed the same command. This man was timid, hesitant and doubtful; he needed earnest encouragement and

A Hearty Invitation.

We all know men whom we almost compel to decide for Christ; often they are good and true men, but timid and distrustful. Timid men need holy urgency to duty. They are afraid they will not hold out, afraid that they will not grow sufficiently in grace to justify them in taking a forward step; and thus they stay out of Christ's school. They ought to learn that Jesus would have them come in and take their place at his feet. Men cannot grow in grace except they use the means of growth. We do not refuse to send children to school because they are ignorant, if they are only willing to learn. Their very ignorance is one of the best reasons why they should go to school. Men and women often act with an utter disregard of common sense concerning the Christian life. Those who are conscious of their Christian life, and who are anxious to learn, those who know that they can trust Christ as their personal Saviour, ought at once so to acknowledge him, and to come into his Church. How can they receive warmth if they insist in living out in the cold? How can they have full light if they will not walk in the light they have? This man, as we have seen, was perplexed between two duties. In answer to our Lord's command, he replied, "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father." Some suppose that his father was not yet dead, and that he wished to remain with him until his death occurred; but most interpreters believe that his father was even then dead, and that this applicant asked permission to perform the last offices of piety to him before

Following Christ.

This latter is the more natural interpretation, both of the candidate's request, and of the Lord's reply. Christ's reply probably is to be interpreted thus: "Let those who are spiritually dead bury those who are naturally dead." It is as if Christ had said, "Those who have not been spiritually quickened with the new life may perform such a service as burying those who are naturally dead; but those who are made alive by spiritual quickening, have other and nobler duties to perform." The Evangelist Luke alone gives us Christ's further command to this man, "Go thou and preach the kingdom of God." For such work this man had special fitness. The case is put by our Lord in the strongest possible light, to show that no duty, however important and sacred in itself, ought to prevent us from becoming his disciples. The more sacred the duty toward the dead father the more emphatic the teaching of Christ regarding his higher claims. Had Christ yielded to this man's request he would have admitted that a duty to a dead father was more important than the command of the living Lord. But his reply clearly shows that no duty whatever, even the most sacred arising from human relationship, must interfere with the positive command of immediate entrance upon Christian service. We know how sacred to the pious Jew was this duty on the part of children to their parents; but even this sacred duty must give way to the

of following Christ. Nothing whatever must come between the soul and obedience to the divine Lord. In no other way could Christ mpre emphatically have taught this solemn and sacred lesson. A similar lesson he taught in the words, "Whosoever loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." A man called of God to preach the everlasting Gospel must not refuse obedience because of any earthly claim. The King's business requires haste. A visit to a sorrowing family might have been injurious to this man's spiritual life. Probably as a procrastinating and hesitating man attendance upon his father's funeral might have prevented him from ever following his Lord. Christ doubtless selected an extreme case to make the lesson he would teach, the more striking, emphatic and solemn. Delays are always dangerous. Delay in this case might have been utterly hurtful. Perhaps the first applicant was too hasty in resolving; certainly this one is too deliberate in executing. When the command of God comes in clear and positive terms we must not consult with flesh and blood. Some have supposed that this candidate was none other than Thomas; and this unwise caution was not unlike that of the

The Hesitating Disciple.

We may believe that when this man's duty was made clear he immediately followed his Lord. Beautiful is it to suppose that he finally followed Jesus as Ruth did Naomi, and sad to see the first, like Orpah, taking leave of God and his people. O, for decision when the call of Christ comes! We need men who will cut every earthly tie and run in the way of God's commandments. We need men who will burn all their ships behind them, lest they should be tempted to go back. We need men who will not even look back, but ever forward in Christian service. O, the follies of these suffer-me-first people! One says, suffer me first to repent more Another, suffer me first to enjoy more of the world. Another, let me have more of wealth; another asks for more time. Some make a virtue of their delay; they are so commendably cautious. But to each Christ says regarding every excuse, "What is that to thee, follow thou me." God help all to follow Jesus just now!

We now come to the the third of these candidates for discipleship. The second was in a strait betwixt Christ and his duty toward his dead father, and this one was in a strait betwixt his duty to Christ and his living friends. He, too, like the first, offered to follow Christ; but, like the second, he made a condition, asking first to go home to bid farewell to those who were at his house. He also forgot that Duty to Christ is Supreme.

That Christ demands an immediate, deliberate and unreserved surrender. We do not know whether or not Christ had previously called the man to follow him. But whether or not, this candidate must now learn that there can be no dallying with Christ's authoritative call; he must learn, like the king's daughter of the 45th psalm, that when the divine command comes he is to "forget also thine own people and thy father's house." His command reminds us of Elisha's request when called from the plough of Elijah, "Let me, I pray, kiss my father and mother, and then I will follow thee." Indeed, it is not impossible that this incident was in the mind of the candidate in making his request and in the mind of Jesus in giving his reply. Elisha's request was granted; this man's was denied. Elisha doubtless was firm and decided; this man was fickle and vacillating. Our Lord's reply is most beautiful and instructive; "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God." We all know that if a ploughman is to make a good furrow he must not look back. But it is impossible to do good work if the ploughman removes his hand from the plough, or his eye from the mark. Especially difficult was it to make straight furrows in Oriental countries where the soil was hard and the plough light. Only a watchful eye and a steady hand could make a furrow even approaching straightness. Dr. Hackett tells us of the frequency with which he saw peasants with their light ploughs and feeble cattle striving to break up fallow soil. He shows also how exact is to Oriental customs. Had the ploughs of that country been made like ours, Christ would have said hands and not hand; but he speaks with exact conformity to the one-handed plough common then and not uncommon still. Our Lord teaches us that Christian calling requires earnestness, decision and perseverance, and the man who lacks these qualities is not fit for the kingdom of God. Hesiod, one of the earliest Greek poets, speaking of the ploughman, says:

> Let him attend his charge and carefully trace
> The straightest lined furrow, gaze not more around,
> But keep his mind intently on the work.

Looking back leads to drawing back, and drawing back, we are divinely taught, is perdition. We must ever remember that only he who endures to the end has the promise of salvation. This man acted as if following Christ was a melancholy and gloomy occupation; he seemed to think that he was going to death rather than into joyous life. He forgot that he might be a nobler friend to his family by being the friend of Christ. His worldly affairs were too much on his heart. He was in the unfortunate condition of being double-hearted; one heart was at home, the other with Jesus.

In studying these three classes of persons, first, the impulsive, second, the procrastinating, and third, the half-hearted candidate for discipleship, we learn that all who follow Christ must count the cost; that duty to Christ is supreme; that he demands a deliberate, unreserved and immediate surrender, and that the first duty of every man is to seek "first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." To-day I am asking for candidates for my Lord's service. I have laid down under his guidance the conditions. By his divine authority I invite you now to enlist in his service, and by his matchless tenderness I would win you to a service sweeter than earth can know, and a service which will continue forever in heaven where the redeemed serve him day and night in his temple.

RUSTEM PACHA'S CHARGE.

Among the cablegrams to the secular press on October 6, was one stating that inquiries had been made of Rustem Pacha, the Turkish Ambassador in London, as to the reason why THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had been excluded from Turkish dominions. He had replied that it had been excluded because it had published incorrect statements in reference to the action of the Turkish Government in the affair of the burned American College at Marsovan.

On reading the cable message, we at once telegraphed to the Postmaster-General at Washington, to ascertain if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had really been excluded from the Turkish mails. We have received in reply, a statement from him to the effect that he had received no notice from Turkey of the exclusion of this journal, and that while the Turkish Government had the right to exclude any journal from its mails to which it might object, it was unusual to do so without notifying the representative of the country to which the journal in question belonged. As no such notification has been received by the Washington post office, it is safe to conclude that this journal is not the one referred to in the cablegram, and we therefore suppose it was the London Christian Herald that was referred to in the cablegram published by the American papers.

There is the more reason for believing this, in the fact that all the statements made in these columns on the subject of the Marsovan affair have been confirmed by official documents and by the evidence given at the trial of the accused professors. The Turkish Government, therefore, could not exclude this journal on the ground that it had made incorrect statements, although it might do so if it resented the publication of correct accounts of the outrage.

MONEY RECEIVED.

Since our last acknowledgment the following sums have been received and applied to the various funds indicated below by the senders:

"I AM THE GOOD SHEPHERD."

JOHN 10 : 11.)

OH shepherd, come out on the mountain so cold,
We are sure lambs are there that have strayed from the fold,
We thought they would follow in pastures so green,
But by the still waters they cannot be seen.
We frighten them so, if we go on this trail,
No efforts of ours in the least will avail;
Come shepherd, they know you, and you they will hear,
If you call they will listen, nor longer will fear.
We never can rest while in danger they roam,
Come shepherd, good shepherd, come carry them home!

We are sure, as we hearken, we hear a faint cry,
O hasten, good shepherd, we fear they will die!
The wolf, as he comes from his deep mountain lair,
Will hear the weak cry, as 'tis borne on the air.
Come, shepherd, and lead us, so kind is your voice,
They'll come at your calling and make us rejoice; [feed,
Once more in their pasture contented they'll
And follow their shepherd wherever he'll lead.
We never can rest while in danger they roam,
Come shepherd, good shepherd, come carry them home!

LET HIM IN.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

HEAR your Blessed Master pleading
For admission to your heart;
Be not stubborn and unheeding,
Else from you he may depart;
Oh, admit him,
And receive his healing art!

Oh, admit the Great Physician,
Hasten now to let him in,
Do not render void his mission—
Your deceptive heart to win;
Oh, receive him,
He will pardon all your sin.

Choose you now his free salvation,
That you may be born anew,
Suffer not procrastination,
To steal precious time from you;
Follow onward,
He will lead you safely through.

Let him in; he long has waited,
Standing at the bolted door,
Bow to him, whom once you hated,
Let him stand without no more;
Haste to open,
Ere your day of grace be o'er.

Enter not the valley friendless,
Let him in—your need is great;
His departure may be endless,
Fixing your eternal state,
Wait no longer;
Open, ere it be too late!

THE YEAR-DAYS.

Why a Prophetic Day is Believed to Indicate a Year of Actual Time.

BY SIR ARTHUR S. BLACKWOOD.

THE large and prominent place occupied in God's Word by predictions yet to be fulfilled excludes the thought that those predictions were intended to be meaningless to us. They were written for our edification and our warning. They were to be studied, and the reward comes not to the superficial reader, but to the student. In endeavoring to understand them, the time scale is obviously of the first importance. When we meet with the word "day" in a prophecy, we must ask ourselves whether the writer means a period of twenty-four hours, or some longer period, as in the expressions "the day of the Lord," "the day of judgment," etc. Already four reasons have been cited for the belief that a prophetic day is to be understood as a year—the Jewish year of 360 days. Other reasons appear on further examination of the subject.

5. The year-day principle is strongly supported by the notable instance of the seventy weeks of Dan. 9: 24. The literal translation of the expression is, as is well known, "seventy sevens," and wherever the term "sevens" is used by itself in the Scripture it invariably denotes seven days. As the period predicted is proved by the fulfilment of the prophecy to have extended over a period of four hundred and ninety years, there is no alternative but to conclude that the seventy weeks, or "sevens" of days, were employed to prefigure as many weeks of years.

6. It is further supported by the instance in which it was declared that Nebuchadnezzar's madness and bestial condition were to last for "seven times," Dan 4 : 16, 23, 32. These "times" are acknowledged to mean years. Seven days would have been too short for the purpose; seven centuries could not have applied to a man's lifetime. But while predicted as literal years, and fulfilled in literal years, they were symbols of a much longer period. The whole occurrence had a symbolical meaning. Nebuchadnezzar was a typical, or representative man; he was the representative of the long succession of Gentile rulers who were to bear sway over the earth until the coming of the Son of Man as the King of kings. The debasement of the kingdoms of this world was symbolized by his insanity and degradation to a bestial condition. Seven "times" or years would consist of 2529 days, and be consequently symbolical of 2520 years which these "times of the Gentiles" were to cover.

7. That "the three days and a half" during which the witnesses lie unburied (Rev. 9: 9) are symbolic, is proved by the fact that "we have about thirty passages in Scripture, where three days are mentioned to define an interval, and four where four days occur; but nowhere else is the fraction of a day introduced into such a measurement of time. . . . If the Holy Spirit had intended natural days only, would he have used a preciseness in the statement of time, which is nowhere else employed, not even in that most important of all instances, the resurrection of our Lord?"

A supposed objection has been taken to the year-day principle, on the ground that it would require the thousand years, or millennium, to last for "three hundred and sixty thousand years." But this, though at first sight plausible, has really no force. The reason for expressing in hieroglyphs the different chronological periods mentioned in the prophecies which related to the dispensation to elapse during our Lord's absence was probably that the Church should be kept in ignorance, for a very long time indeed, of the length of the interval. This, as we have seen, was essential if she was to occupy an attitude of watchful expectation of her Lord's return. The periods in question are therefore described in a variety of ways, the longest of them being expressed by three different terms—"a time, a times, and half a time:" a thousand, two hundred, and three-score "days," and "forty and two months." This fact is alone sufficient to lead to the supposition that the expressions had a mysterious character, and were designed to convey a hidden meaning.

But when this dispensation has been wound up, when the time of waiting is over, and there is no longer any need for watchfulness, the Church being with the Lord, it is no more necessary to conceal the period of her reigning with him (prior to the everlasting state) by means of mysterious and various symbols. It is therefore expressed by one and the same term, "a thousand years," no less than six times. The hieroglyph is no more required. The year-day principle obtains no longer,

CHRISTIAN RESPONSIBILITY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Oct. 29. I. Cor. 8: 10, 11; Romans 14: 12-19

IN emphasizing, and rightly, the necessity of faith as the first step in the Christian life, it has too often been forgotten that the next step, from faith to love, is no less essential. The cardinal principle of Christianity is love. The Apostle John goes so far as to doubt whether a man who does not love his fellow-man really loves God. He had been nearer to his Master than any of the twelve and had entered more fully into his spirit. In doing so, he had perceived that Christ's ideal of his people was that of a band of men and women full of love for each other and for all about them. They were not only to love those who loved them but even their enemies and those who were intent on injuring them. Out of this principle comes the duty which is the subject of the topic. As the husband who loves his wife will refrain from doing something that annoys, or vexes her, simply on that ground, though, in his own opinion, the thing she objects to is harmless and enjoyable, so the Christian must consider the weaknesses and even the prejudices of his brother. This is not to extend to matters of right and conscience, but to incidental matters of mere gratification. What the Christian believes it is his duty to do, he must do, no matter whom it may hurt; but if by any of the indulgences of the taste, or of the flesh, he is causing pain or injury to another, there ought to be enough love in his heart to lead him to relinquish the indulgence. The fact that no harm comes to himself from the indulgence and that his brother had more sense or more moral strength he would see the thing in another light, is not to have any weight with him; his duty is to deny himself for his brother's sake. The burning question at the time Paul wrote was, whether there was any harm in eating meat that had been offered in sacrifice to idols, but in every age there is some question to which the principle will apply. Paul admitted that there was no harm in the practice in question, but under the circumstances enjoined abstinence. With us, the difficulties are of another kind but the duty is the same.

Two gigantic evils exist in society which have a bad eminence over many others. It would be difficult to prove that in itself it is wrong to drink a glass of wine, or play a game at cards, but when the acts are viewed in relation to the vices of drunkenness and gambling, they are set in another light. A Christian man is bound to ask himself whether his abstinence is not a duty in view of the injury others suffer from those vices. His indulgence may do him no harm, but what of those who try to follow his example, but have not his moral strength? How will it affect the boy who sees him and who will have to endure temptation when he goes out into the world? If that boy is disposed to follow his father's example, will he not be safer if the example be one of absolute abstinence, than he would be if the example is one of temperate indulgence? Let experience answer. And, of the weak brother, who has found by experience that moderation is impossible for him, will it not help him to complete abstinence, will it not relieve him of [illegible] whom moderation is possible? Thus abstinence becomes a law of Christ, for he pleased not himself, but became a sacrifice for others.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

The young people's society of the State Street Baptist Church, of Rockford, Ill., is to be credited with another illustration of practical Christianity. They recently planned to give an entertainment of a special character to increase the funds of the treasury, but on learning that the Ladies' Union Aid Society of the city were in need of funds to carry on their work among the poor of the city, the young people enlarged their plans and gave a grand entertainment and donated the proceeds to the poor. About $150 were realized, and the action of the young people has stimulated other organizations to make special offerings for the needy.——The Illinois State Union holds its annual convention at Jerseyville Oct. 20. It is expected that every church will be represented, as an attractive programme has been prepared and important business is to be transacted. A resolution is to be moved providing for a representative Board and a better division of labor, which resolution, it may be hoped, will be passed. Efforts will also be made to secure a more methodical system of enrollment.——At the recent rally at Plainwell, Mich., of the Unions in the Kalamazoo River Association, stirring addresses were made by Rev. G. M. Hudson, President of the Union, Rev. D. T. Magill and the State Secretary. The Unions in this Association are thoroughly organized and full of enthusiasm.——The Baptist young people's societies in Utah and Southern Idaho are being brought into line by the attraction of the Christian Culture Courses. They have held a convention and appointed an Associational Secretary to correspond with each society and promote denomination organization. Provo leads the way in enrolling its societies.——Echo meetings to receive the report of the delegates who went to Indianapolis, have been held throughout the country. One of the largest was the one recently held in the Fourth Church of Philadelphia. The meeting had the double honor of the presence of two national officers in the persons of President Chapman and Secretary Brinckle.——A good example to Baptist pastors has been set by Rev. N. N. Glazier, of Greenfield, Mass., whose sermon on "Culture for Service" was followed by the Union in connection with his church taking up the three "C" courses with enthusiasm.——A very graceful and kindly action of the Union in connection with Dr Pierce's church at Rockford, Ill., was an invitation to the old people of the church to a special reception. A carriage was sent to the house of every invited guest of seventy years and upward to bring them to the meeting.

THE NEW C. E. TRUSTEES.

The appointment of five new members of the Board of Trustees of the United Society of [illegible] announced by the Golden Rule. One of the new members is Canon Richardson, of the Diocese of Huron, who represents the Episcopal Church of Canada. Another is Rev. J. M. Lowden of Boston, Mass., of the Free Baptist denomination. Another is Prof. James Lewis Howe of Kentucky, of the Southern Presbyterian Church. All know what splendid work he has done for Christian Endeavor, and how highly respected he is throughout his State. Rev. M. M. Binford has taken the place of the lamented Rev. A. C. Hathaway as President of the Friends' Interdenominational Christian Endeavor Union, and also succeeds Mr. Hathaway at his church in Richmond, Ind. He has just been chosen a member of the board from this denomination, while the fifth member is Rev. Rufus W. Miller of Pennsylvania, of the Reformed Church in the United States, who has become so well known in connection with the brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, an organization which works most cordially and sympathetically with the Christian Endeavor Society.

A THRIVING R. R. ASSOCIATION.

The Young Men's Christian Association at Baraboo, Wis., has the advantage of a union of the town and railroad work, and so has been able to secure a much larger and more imposing building than would otherwise have been possible. The building, a picture of which is here given, is one of the finest and most commodious of those devoted to Y.M.C.A. in that section of the country. It has a good library and reading-room, an excellent gymnasium, baths, etc., besides auditorium and class-rooms. It covers an area of 53 by 63 feet, and cost $10,300. The Association was organized only eleven years ago, but it has attained a membership of 238 and has this elegant home of its own. The Association, like others of the railroad connection, has a regularly organized system of visiting the sick and injured.

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN COLLEGE.

It is gratifying to learn that many of the young ladies studying at Wellesley College wear the silver cross. From the pen of Helen Worthington comes the following report of the work, which appears in the organ of the Order: It was during 1888 that the Professor of Physics formed the first Wellesley Ten among the students of her immediate acquaintance. Busy as the members were, they still found time to gather once a week for a few moments of prayer, and frequently sew for some needy family. Although the following year saw them scattered, this pioneer Circle still influences the Christian life of the college. Nearly every Fall one or more new students come to shake hands with the Professor, who is still teaching at the "College Beautiful," announcing themselves as Children of the new bands formed at school or home by the members of the original Ten. And so the good goes on and out, to be gathered back to the dear Alma Mater from which it issued. At the beginning of every college year, therefore, the President calls a meeting of the Silver Crosses, and urges each bearer to identify herself and her energies with the work of the Christian Association. In the name of this body of teachers and students, nearly all the religious and charitable labors of the institution are carried on. Two missionaries are supported by subscriptions; an active interest in temperance affairs is maintained, Sunday schools in the neighboring villages are supplied with volunteer teachers from among the girls; a reading-room and entertainments for the college servants have been furnished, besides many other responses made to calls for aid. To accomplish this, necessarily, the co-operation of many individuals is needed. For this high reason, The King's Daughters have come to believe that in losing their outward personality for the time being, they could give more, and find their lives more fully in the larger whole. Thus, it has come about that while distinctive Tens are comparatively few in Wellesley, the most consecrated and efficient workers are wearers of the silver cross.

Red Men at the World's Fair.

The Nation's Wards Have Some Interesting Encampments There.—Indian Progress.

WHEN the managers of the World's Exposition planned the series of camps of aboriginal peoples from different quarters of the globe, the North American Indian was not overlooked. Indeed, our red wards have a number of encampments there. Maine has sent several families of civilized Penobscot Indians; New York has an Iroquois village; Canada has a settlement of Creek Indians, and besides all these, there are swarthy and dark-haired delegations from the Winnebagos, Apaches, Navajos, Savannah and Arawack Indians. One group shown by our artist on this page is a drawing from the life of one of these Indian colonies, and represents a council at which matters of grave tribal consequence are discussed between pipe-whiffs, while the braves sit around outside the tepees, or tents. It is a characteristic group, and reproduces with absolute fidelity a scene which everyone familiar with Indian custom must recognize. Dressed in his blanket and bonnet of eagle feathers, the old chief is haranguing the younger members of the tribe, and it is evident from their attitude, that his words sink deep into their ears, even though they may not be convincing. Civilization and evangelization have made rapid progress among the Indian tribes of North America in the last quarter of a century, although for many years previous it had been of phenomenally slow growth. The first Protestant missions to the Indians of New England were undertaken in 1643 on Martha's Vineyard, just twenty-two years after the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers; and the first convert was Hiacoomes, who afterward became a preacher among his own people. Now missionary work has extended to all the tribes, and the gospel has stanch followers everywhere among the red men. Such great Christian philanthropies as the Hampton Institute, established by the late Gen. Armstrong, in Virginia, and the Haskell Institute, in Lawrence, Kan., are doing a noble work in the education and training of the red men, and the various Christian denominations are spreading the Gospel among the war-like tribes, bringing them into churches, colleges, boarding-schools and school-houses, and educating them to abandon their nomad habits and inherited love of arms, and to adopt the arts of peace. The American Missionary Association alone has eight missions among the Indians divided into twenty-three stations with forty-three white, and twenty-five native mission workers. The Presbyterians have nearly sixty stations; the Protestant Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist Episcopal and other denominations are all grandly represented in the same field.

A Merchant Prince's Test.

The following story is told about Horace B. Claflin, a prominent New York merchant, who was as quaint and humorous as he was keen-witted and rich: On a certain evening, about five o'clock, Mr. Claflin was sitting alone in his office when a young man, pale and careworn, timidly knocked and entered. "Mr. Claflin," said he, "I am in need of help. I have been unable to meet certain payments, because certain parties have not done as they agreed by me, and I would like to have $10,000. I come to you because you were a friend to my father, and might be a friend to me." "Come in," said Claflin; "come in and have a glass of wine." "No," said the young man; "I don't drink." "Have a cigar then." "No; I never smoke." "Well," said the joker, "I would like to accommodate you, but I don't think I can." "Very well," said the young man, as he was about to leave the room; "I thought perhaps you might. Good day, sir." "Hold on," said Mr. Claflin. "You don't drink?" "No." "Nor smoke?" "No." "Nor gamble, nor anything of the kind?" "No, sir; I am superintendent of the ——— Sunday School." "Well," said Claflin, with tears in his eyes and choking voice, "you shall have it, and three times the amount if you wish. Your father let me have $5,000 once, and asked me the same questions. He trusted me, and I will trust you."

TWILIGHT TOWN.

BEYOND the shadow lies Twilight Town,
Where wee heads nod and lids shut down
Over black eyes, blue eyes, gray and brown;
And through a gap in the city wall
Is a beautiful spot where sunbeams fall
And dance for aye, through tree-tops tall.
Hush, baby! Soft and slow,
Soft and slow, let us go
Through the shadows to Twilight Town.

Soft as the wind through rippling wheat, [meet,
When the sun's last rays and the shadows
Sounds the patter of thousands of little feet.
Through the gap in the wall, on their dimpled knees,
The babies creep under the waving trees,
On the grass of the kingdom "Do-as-you please."
Hush, baby! Soft and slow,
Slow, slow, let us go
Through the gap in the wall to Twilight Town.

A Baby's Voice Saved Them.

A missionary in China, Rev. James Graham, tells how their baby saved their home from destruction and themselves from what seemed almost certain death. There was an uprising of the Chinese against the missionaries, and a mob that found Mr. Graham outside his home began to abuse him. They pursued him to his home, pelting him with bricks. His wife, believing that innocence has power to dispel evil, seized her baby from the cradle and ran to the window, where she held it up in the face of the mob. The baby, as if it had been retained for the scene, began to crow, and throw up its hands in the absurdly friendly fashion of babies, at the threatening faces below. The Chinese saw it, and began to grin back in return. The bricks fell from their hands, and the missionary escaped indoors. Nor did they leave; they gathered around the window where the baby still crowed and goo-gooed, and actually stayed until they were surprised and overcome by a rescue party from town.

NATIONAL FLOWERS.

MANY nations have their favorite flower. Americans have not yet quite decided as to the national favorite. Says a writer in The Housekeeper, "it is thought by southern people that the beautiful magnolia should be chosen, because it was George Washington's favorite. Others are in favor of the Mayflower, because it cheered the Pilgrim Fathers after their first gloomy winter in this country. Then the trailing arbutus, the golden-rod, and so many others have been suggested, that it seems quite impossible or any authority to decide the question as to which shall be our national flower.

"The purple thistle of Scotland, which is its national flower, is not beautiful to the sight, nor yet agreeable to the touch, but the Scotch chose the thistle, instead of one of the many beautiful flowers which bloom there, because of a service it had rendered them in the ancient Danish wars. The shamrock of Ireland looks exactly like a three-leaved clover. The Irish chose this for their national flower because it was supposed to charm away evil spirits, and it was believed that serpents never stung anyone who wore a bit of shamrock. The cactus of Mexico was chosen because of the following legend: In ancient times, long before Columbus came to America, the Aztecs, or ancient Mexicans, were looking for a place to build a city. They wandered over what is now the United States, and finally came upon a wise man, who told them that when they came upon a spot where an eagle was perched upon a rock, they should there build their city. As they drew near the Lake of Tezcuco, they saw an eagle upon a branch of the nopal cactus, which grew out of a crevice in the rock. The eagle held a serpent in its beak. The Aztecs then knew that this was the place intended for their city, and they built what is now known as the City of Mexico. The lotus is the national flower of Egypt. It is an aquatic flower resembling the pink pond lily. China and Japan have a great deal of sentiment about their national flower, which is the chrysanthemum, for they devote a whole day every year to its celebration. On this day the emperor throws wide open the gates of his gardens, which are usually closed to all, and allows rich and poor alike to enter. No country has a sweeter or more attractive flower than Greece—the violet. The white violet has always been an emblem of purity, and the purple and blue of faithfulness. The purple iris is the national flower of France. It was chosen by Louis the Seventh, who used it on his flag. England has always been symbolized by the rose, which was chosen because so many beautiful white roses were found there. The terrible War of the Roses, which prevailed in England so many years, took its name from this symbol. When time had brought a happy ending to this war, the two roses were combined on the flag.

"The stolid people of Holland had an eye for the beautiful and sweet, as shown by their national flower, the hyacinth. The superb, courtly hues, the ivory-like finish, and the rich, passionate odor and air of the carnation, captivated the Spanish."

CHAPTER XII.

YOLANTE'S DIPLOMACY.

JUST how much the Stapletons knew as to Guy's position as the rightful owner of the Dangerfield estate, Yolante determined to find out. Her mother's words had made her uneasy and she could not rest until she had seen Martha and found out the extent of the danger. She went to the cottage and asked for Guy's old nurse. A gruff voice could be heard within, saying, "Martha, come back and shut the door. We don't want no dealings with any of that crew."

Martha Stapleton, who having been in good service was a well-mannered woman, and knew a lady when she saw one, hesitated at the sound of that peremptory call, and cast an appealing glance at her visitor.

Yolante, however, was not one to be daunted by difficulties. She stepped boldly within the cottage, and found herself face to face with a bent old man, who despite his white hair and bowed frame, showed in his movements indication of great physical strength, or rather the remains of it. His eyes beneath their shaggy white brows gleamed ominously upon the girl as she advanced, and perhaps had Yolante's spirit been less high, and her pride less strong she might have quailed beneath that vindictive scowl. As it was she advanced fearlessly, and stood in a very upright attitude well in view of the angry old man, not perhaps entirely unconscious of the fact that she made a picture upon which any eye might look with pleasure, and reckoning somewhat upon her well-tested power of charming, though she had certainly never before troubled to exert it upon so unpromising a subject.

"Mr. Stapleton," she began quietly and courteously, "I have heard a good deal about you and your family: but I have never had the pleasure of seeing you before. What I have heard about you has made me curious. I wonder if you would be good enough to answer me a few questions."

The old man sat and glared at her with a sort of sullen fire in his eyes such as one sometimes sees in the eyes of an angry bloodhound. Martha came nervously forward, and looked imploringly at the girl.

"It's no manner of use arguing with grandfather, ma'am," she said respectfully. "He is that set against you all, and 'twould be better to go quiet-like away." The woman spoke beneath her breath, as if desirous that her words should not reach their subject. "I don't doubt you meant kindly by coming—but it would be better-like to let well alone."

"It was you I really came to see, Martha," answered Yolante with one of her bright smiles. "Do you know that it was only by accident the other day that I heard anything about you, and knew that you had been Guy's nurse. If I had heard it before, I should have made your acquaintance earlier. I did not know when I started, that you actually lived with your husband's father, as I suppose 'grandfather' is, but I suppose you are at liberty to see friends who come to see you, and anyone who has ever been good to Guy, must rank as a friend of ours. Don't you know that he is almost like a brother to us all? Indeed I never saw two brothers anywhere so fond of each other as Guy and my eldest brother Monk."

"That is what they all say, miss," answered Martha, her face ligting up, "and I be main glad to hear it."

A fierce snort from the old man here interrupted her.

"Fine affection that—all talk—all talk. If you be all so mighty fond of he, why don't you give him his rights among you?"

"Guy has got all that belongs to him," answered Yolante calmly, "but I will not pretend to misunderstand you, Mr. Stapleton, I know you think that Guy ought to be in my brother's place, as of course he might have been but for the quarrel between his father and grandfather. But I should very much like to know, if you would be kind enough to tell me, why you talk as though Guy was being in any way defrauded. If he has any rights of which we do not know, I am sure we will be very much obliged to anyone who will enlighten us. As it is my brother has offered to divide the property with him, feeling that our grandfather's will was hard upon him, but he entirely declined to allow it. It is hardly, I know, for me to defend my brother's conduct to you or anybody else, for it has always been upright and straightforward enough to speak for itself. But I am too fond of him to like hearing reproaches cast at him, and so if you will be good enough to tell me why you speak as if he were doing a conscious wrong, and defrauding the person he loves best in all the world, I should be very glad: because it might help to clear away some ill feeling and misunderstanding to talk the whole thing over."

Yolante had made several pauses in her speech, hoping that one of her hearers would answer her; but neither appeared to have anything to say, and it was with some relief that the girl saw this, for it seemed plain to her that they had not got hold of the real clue to the tangle they more than suspected, and so long as that was the case, there was nothing to fear from them.

"Well, have you anything to tell me? Surely you cannot think it a fair thing to do, to bring grave charges against us, and then decline to state your reasons for them. You are fond of saying to everyone that Guy ought to be master here instead of my brother to whom the place was willed. Will you not tell me why you go on saying so?"

"Old Squire told me his own self, as we should see the young master's son reigning here when he was dead."

"If he said so, he must have changed his mind afterwards. And we do not even know that he ever knew that his eldest son had a child."

Yolante wished after the words were spoken that she had not told a falsehood. The color rose in her cheeks as she did so for she was not yet versed in the ways of deceit, and though she had been keeping a guilty secret for some time, she had never had occasion so far to commit herself in any way.

"Ay, but he did know—he did know—for he told me his own self," repeated the old man eagerly, "and Squire he wasn't the man to change his mind once he had made it up. He left the old place to Mr. Guy's boy, and somewhere in the house there is another will—and some of these days it will be found, unless—"

The old man paused suddenly with a wolfish gleam of ferocity in his eye. It was very plain to Yolante what he meant by that expressive pause: but she did not appear to understand.

"I am afraid you will be disappointed if you think that," she was able to speak quietly in the relief she felt at finding them obstinately set on the wrong tack, "Old Mr. Lumley, the lawyer, who was very fond of our uncle Guy, and was very wishful to make sure that he or his heirs were being justly dealt with, made the most careful search for a possibly later will, and failed to find one. My brother would be the last man to stand in anybody's way if he were not placed there by law and right. Least of all would he defraud Guy."

"Fine words—fine words—if he talks why does he not act too?" the old man sneered.

Yolante flushed hotly: she was not accustomed to be spoken to in that way. She considered that she had been very condescending in listening so quietly to this violent and insolent old man as it was, and now that she had learnt what she had come to learn she did not care to remain to be badgered. As her pride rose her caution diminished, and she drew herself up haughtily as she said,

"My brother has done everything in his power to be generous to Guy and has even gone so far as to make him his heir. Not one man in a hundred would have acted as he has done, and you show how little you know in the matter in leveling inuendoes at him."

The fiery eyes of the old man were bent searchingly upon her. "Made him his heir, has he?" he repeated slowly. "O ay—I heard something about that."

"Guy must have told them," said Yolante indignantly to herself, and she felt a strong sense of irritation in the thought that her cousin should come to this house to gossip over the private affairs of the family with their pronounced enemies. True it was only what she herself was doing at the present moment: but then she had an object in view, and what could be more hurtful than for Guy to go and talk with their worst enemies of the probabilities of Monk's life? She was terribly indignant.

"You seem to know a great deal," she said, rising and drawing herself up to her full height.

"Ay, maybe I do. I mostly finds out what I want to know. It's the best way to keep a watch when this kind of a game is being played out. Some folks had best look to themselves when I and my boy are having our eyes upon them."

Yolante felt that she had stayed long enough. She bowed a haughty farewell to the old man, and walked to the door, followed by Martha, who had listened uneasily to the dialogue, witoout attempting to put in a word herself.

When they had passed out into the little garden, and she had gone forward to unlatch the gate at the end of the gravel walk, so that they were well out of ear-shot of the cottage, she spoke in a hurried, nervous way.

"Thank you kindly for coming, miss. You meant it kind, I know, and I should like a bit of a chat with anybody as loved Master Guy—as he will always be to me: but you see it don't do—it don't do. Grandfather is that set against you all, and though he was quieter like with you, seeing as you are such a beautiful young lady, he can't never get over the old feeling, and it would be better to keep out of the way."

"They are very wicked men," said Yolante haughtily, "And I am surprised that a respectable woman, as you seem to be, should care to associate with them. Guy would tell you himself—if he spoke with any truth, that we are and always have been the best friends he has."

Martha's face had changed its expression several times during the speech, and had Yolante been a little less haughty and a little more conciliatory she might have learnt something she would have been very glad to know. As it was, Martha hesitated for a moment, and then her lips closed firmly. She was not accustomed to being taken to task in this way, and especially by a slip of a girl, even though she was one of her boy's cousins. So after a moment of proud silence on both sides, Martha merely asked.

"And will you tell me, please, how Mr. Guy is getting on, and when he will be back?"

"He has been quite well for a long time, and he will be home in September, I believe. I daresay you know as much about him as we do, you are such great friends it would seem."

And then Yolante walked quietly away, with a brief "good-morning," not quite sure if she had acted with as much diplomacy as she had intended, though glad to have made out what she had done from the words of the fierce old man.

Martha went slowly back to the cottage, a cloud upon her face. She was an honest, straight-forward, well-intentioned woman by nature, and it went greatly against the grain with her to be mixed up in any feuds of dark purposes, however little understood by her. So Martha would gladly have seen the matter set at rest, and did what little she could to throw oil on the troubled water: but though she did not know it, there was a strong tendency to mania in her husband's family, and it was developing itself fast in her husband's brother, the mania in this instance taking the form of a deadly hatred against Monk Dangerfield, not for anything that he had done or left undone, but simply because he was supposed to be the supplanter of the natural heir.

Unknown to her, Ralph Stapleton had entered the back room whilst Yolante had been in the front one, and he had plainly heard every word which had passed.

"I begin to think it will never be found now. They have made away with it amongst them. I was always afraid from the first that she had laid hands on it and tossed it into the fire—its just what she would have done if she got the chance," remarked the old man with an air of conviction. "Well, if that way is gone, there is only one thing left to hope for, and there seems little enough chance of that, with a strapping young fellow like that. I wonder now if it is true about that will of his. The girl seemed to know all about it."

"I believe that is all true enough," said Ralph who was leaning his head on his hand, a very dark look upon his black-browed face. "But that will soon be waste paper, if all they say now is going to come true."

"And what do they say?"

"Why, that young Squire," and a fierce sneer crossed the man's face as he pronounced the words, "that he is courting Lady Conway's daughter, and that they are keeping company together already. If that's so, we shall be hearing their wedding-bells in about no time."

"Well?" questioned Martha, who was interested in this little piece of romance.

"Well," he echoed mimicking her, "What do you suppose is the worth of a will made before a man's marriage?"

Martha looked perplexed.

"Don't you know that a marriage makes waste paper of any will drawn before it? A man has to make a new one when he puts his head into the noose: and what do you think of our boy's chances, when his fine cousin has taken a fine young wife?"

"Oh," answered Martha grasping the situation at once, "of course that does make a great difference." She sat silent, and presently heaved a long sigh. "The young Squire's life is worth two of his," she said.

But there was no response in the man's sombre eyes. Martha did not like the look in them, though she was far from suspecting the black thoughts at work in his partially clouded brain.

However, her husband would be coming in soon, and she must get his dinner ready.

When Martha was gone the old man and his son sat on opposite sides of the hearth, and looked at the smouldering embers and sometimes at one another. There was something so vindictive in the faces of both, that it was no wonder the honest woman had felt afraid.

"She must never know," remarked the old man, as if following out some private train of thought.

"There isn't anything to know that I am aware of," was Ralph's sullen reply, though his eyes gleamed wolfishly.

"Right, boy, there is nothing to know. Maybe there never will be, but it is a good maxim to repeat from time to time, never to trust a woman."

There was a long silence and then Ralph spoke. "They sent him away to die and leave the coast clear. They sent the young doctor chap with him—him with the dark face, who looks as if he knew a thing or two. I thought then we should never see him back no more: but either the young chap muddled his part, or else he didn't care to do it when it came to the point. Any way, he's on his way home now, they say: and it'll be odd if he can ever be sent away again. When he's the master here, he can please himself, and the Squires of Dangerfield have always lived on the old place."

"Shooting time coming on—plenty of accidents every year—" muttered the father, as if seeing into the future—"young men always careless with their guns—why Guy himself, the best shot I ever saw, put a charge in my leg once just in carelessness. And one of his uncles was shot dead when they were out having a day of it. Never a season without an accident—never was one here at least—and I think the old place will keep up its reputation—that I do."

Yolante paid no more visits to the cottage, and nothing more was heard of Martha or the Stapletons during the summer. In September Guy returned looking strong and well.

"Why Guy, I should hardly have known you," Monk said when he met him at the depot on his arrival, "you are so brown and so broadened out. You are twice the fellow you were when you went away. As for Fulk, he looks like a young lion. How good it is to have you back. The place hasn't been like itself without you."

"It seems to have suited you anyhow," laughed Guy, as he mounted the seat of the mail-phaeton in which Monk had driven down to meet him. "And so I am to wish you joy? and begin to learn to look upon you as a sort of Benedick? Well, I will try to focus my mind afresh, and adjust my ideas to the new state of things. What, you haven't ceased blushing at the thought yet. Bravo, old boy, I'm glad you retain your old modesty. I was afraid you might lose it now you have not had me to set you down judiciously at the right moment."

"I think I wanted you more to keep me in countenance," laughed Monk who was only a little less boyish than of old, though his new dignities and responsibilities were beginning to tell upon his character and give it stability. "You are certain you are glad, Guy? You do not think that it will make any difference?"

"Well, I should be inclined to hope it would make a very considerable difference. Marriage is not generally regarded in the light of such a complete detail."

TRAVELLING IN CHINA.*

THE Chinese or Pekin cart, while a very venerable and respectable institution, is, regarded as a mode of conveyance, neither commodious nor luxurious. It is a small but very heavy and strong tilted cart on two wheels; the whole conveyance is built of very strong, tough wood, the wheels heavily tured with iron, and further protected on the outside with iron bosses; the axle-tree is of large dimensions and great strength, and the axle projects on each side of the cart some six or seven inches. On the bottom of the cart there are several wooden projections, fitting the axle-tree, so that it can be put forward or backward according to the load carried—the same principle as in an English dog-cart, though the altered position is secured by lifting instead of a screw—and the body of the cart, when got into position, is secured to the axle-tree by strong ropes; the shafts run through the cart, so as to form the support of a rack in the rear, on which heavy luggage can be placed, and to stop the cart at a convenient angle when it is tilted up in the innyard or elsewhere.

The internal dimensions are two feet six inches in width, by four feet in length, and the height is sufficient for you to sit on the floor of the cart and have a little space left between your head and its covering, which is semi-circular in shape. It must, not, however, be supposed that the whole of this space is devoted to the use of the inside passenger—if he gets two thirds of it he is fortunate. Smaller articles needed on a long journey are carefully stored away in the rear of the cart, and then one-half your mattress forms a seat, while the other half is bent up against the packages in the rear of the cart, so as to form a support for your back; and into this partially filled cart you have to creep and get as comfortably seated as you can, your feet extending so as to touch the tail of the mule, and resting on a board like the foot-board of our English carts, the centre of which forms a leg-rest for the passenger, and the ends seats for the driver and Chinese attendant. Such were the conveyances in which we were to travel some two hundred and seventy miles.

The roads of China can only be characterized as bad and worse. I believe there are no good roads in China, except in the foreign settlements; all the others I have seen are unutterably bad. The very bad roads are, I think, on the whole easier to travel on than those which are slightly better. On the very bad roads the mules are obliged to move slowly and cautiously; the concussions are very violent as you are jolted into a hole or jerked out of one. As the mules make a rush at a bank, and then without the slightest regard for your feelings, let you drop on the other side, you have your teeth nearly shaken out of your head and your breath put out of your body; but then you have this consolation—that an interval of perhaps a minute must elapse before another such concussion will occur. But if the road improve a little, the mules are inclined or persuaded to break into a gentle trot, and then every part of your unfortunate body is agitated by a constant and terrible vibration, and it is an occasion for both astonishment and gratitude that a complicated piece of mechanism like the human body can remain in going order after many hours of such treatment.

On December 23, we took our departure for Chow-ping, a two-days' journey where we were to spend Christmas day. I used a wheel-barrow on this occasion which one of the missionaries placed at my disposal. The wheel-barrow is one of the most important and useful of Chinese institutions, and is in this part of China more largely employed for various purposes than any other mode of conveyance, or, even of all other conveyances combined. Nearly everything is carried on wheel-barrows, and by the poor it is largely used to carry persons. Our missionaries have seized the idea of the wheel-barrow, and have improved upon it, and the result is that they have, for fine weather, the most comfortable conveyance that I have seen in this country, and one which, with its single wheel, can travel where no two-wheeled conveyance could possibly go.

The barrow is a strong wooden framework about six feet long and four feet six inches broad, with two short shafts at each end, which the barrow-men hold. The wheel works in a kind of a slot in the middle, the upper part being boxed in. The wheel is a very strong one, three feet ten inches in diameter. In addition to the barrow-men, who are strong and skilful—as they have need to be—there is harnessed to the barrow, for a long journey or a heavy load, a pony, donkey or mule. The animal is attached to the barrow by rope traces, about four or five yards long, so that he is able to choose his way, and can get on a bank, or to the top of a steep rise, and thus help the barrow-men as otherwise he could not. These barrows will carry two passengers, one on either side, or if only one, the bedding and baggage can be packed on the unoccupied side. The barrows used for conveyance of merchandise are very strong, but rough constructions, and immense loads are carried upon them. On a long day's journey you will meet with hundreds of these barrows.

*From A Winter in North China, by Rev. T. M Morris. The Old and New in Education.*

THE schools conducted on scientific principles differ widely from the mechanical schools. While the aim of the old education is mainly to give the child a certain amount of information, the aim of the new education is to lead the child to observe, to reason, and to acquire manual dexterity as well as to memorize facts—in a word, to develop the child naturally in all his faculties, intellectual, moral and physical. As in these schools the teacher is guided in her work by the nature of the child mind—that is, by the laws of mental development—she is constantly in search of such light as will guide her in giving the child the benefit of what is known of the nature of the mind and its mode of development. We find, therefore, widely distributed among the teachers a truly progressive spirit, much enthusiasm, and a desire to become conversant with the laws of psychology and the principles of education. It is almost exclusively in the cities where the teachers constantly pursue professional studies under the guidance of their superintendents that schools of this order are found.

As it is no longer the text-book or the arbitrary will of the superintendent, but the laws of psychology, that now become the ruling spirit of the school, the order of things becomes reversed, and, in consequence, the atmosphere of the school-room is entirely changed. The teacher who endeavors to instruct in accordance with the nature of the mind is of necessity obliged to study the child, so that she may understand him and know how to minister to his needs. In this manner a true bond of sympathy forms between the teacher and the child. The attitude of the teacher now changes from that of lord and master to that of friend and guide. She thus ceases to be cold and harsh, and becomes loving and sympathetic. The school room loses its prison aspect and becomes characteristic of a refined and refining home. Further, when the teacher is guided in her work by the laws of psychology, there is a change in the methods of instruction as well as in the spirit of the class-room. While in the mechanical schools the recitation periods are devoted either to hearing children recite lessons that they have studied by heart, or to drilling the pupils in facts, in the schools conducted on scientific principles such procedures are not tolerated, the teachers being obliged to devote these periods to actual teaching, and—to the best of the ability—in accordance with methods approved by the educational scientists.

It may therefore be seen that the new education recognizes that there are elements aside from measurable results that require consideration in educating the child. The first and foremost among these elements is the child himself. The old system of education thinks only of the results, and with its eye upon the results, forgets the child; while the new system is in large part guided by the fact that the child is a frail and tender, loving and lovable human being. "By their fruits shall ye know them," is a proverb which, though frequently quoted in this connection, does not apply to schools at all, because it leaves out of consideration the fact that the child lives while he is being educated. Who would argue that the steerage is as good as the cabin because the steerage passenger travels as quickly and as safely as the cabin passenger? When natural methods are philosophically applied by the teacher, the child becomes interested in his work, and the school is converted into a house of pleasure. When, on the other hand, the child is taught by mechanical methods, his mental food is given to him in the most indigestible and unpalatable forms, in consequence of which he takes no interest in his work, learning becomes a source of drudgery, and the school a house of bondage.

*From The Public School System of the United States, by Dr. J. M. Rice, who made recently a personal examination of the public schools of New York, Baltimore, Buffalo, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Boston, Chicago, Minneapolis and other cities. His object was to ascertain to what extent the old unscientific system of education still prevailed, and to propose such changes as his observations suggested as in his opinion would render our schools more effectual in giving the children a thorough education. This book is the result of his tour, and it shows how much might be done with slight effort for the benefit of the children. Pp. 308; price, $1.50. published by The Century Co, N. Y.

ASKING AND TRUSTING.

CHILDREN oft seek
Beyond the reach
Of broken speech
Some cherished gift for which they long, Persistingly
And hopefully
Trusting a mother's love so strong.

Lord, may not we—
Children we be Truly of thee—
Learn of the child the lesson old,
And ask and ask,
And trust and ask?
The blessings thou will not withhold?

BRAZIL'S CIVIL WAR.

UNHAPPY Brazil continues to be torn by civil war. Admiral Custodio Jose de Mello, commanding the insurgent fleet, has kept up the bombardment of Rio Janeiro, and a large portion of the business community has left the city. He has not yet succeeded in reducing the forts, Santa Cruz, one of the strongest, still flying the government flag and keeping the rebel fleet at bay with its powerful batteries. At present the fate of President Peixoto's administration hangs in the balance. Florian Peixoto, whose portrait we give in this column, was a marshal of the republic before being elected president. Not quite two years have passed, however, since his predecessor, Marshal Deodoro da Fonseca, was deposed by the same Admiral Mello with a very similar demonstration of naval force, which had, as in the present instance, been preceded by an insurrection in the province of Rio Grande do Sul. Peixoto was then vice-president, and became president on the overthrow of Fonseca. It is curious that the present crisis has arisen out of his action in having vetoed a law recently passed by congress to forbid a vice-president becoming president. The presidential term of office is four years, and if Peixoto now succeeds in overcoming the present attack he has over two years more of executive power before him. He is a man of much determination and great personal bravery. In his domestic life he has very simple tastes, and he is said to be carefully saving and investing in Europe the greater portion of his salary.

PRESIDENT PEIXOTO.

JOB'S FRIENDS.*

JOB'S three friends come to comfort him and help him toward a right moral attitude. There are three rounds of discussion: Eliphaz leading, Bildad following, Zophar closing. To each Job replies. In the third round, Zophar, feeling the uselessness of prolonging the colloquy, fails to speak. Then Elihu, a younger man, comes forward to offer his views. At the end Jehovah answers Job out of a whirlwind. Job prostrates himself, accepts the divine reproof. Prosperity returns.

Look first at what Job's friends contribute to the discussion. Let us do them no injustice, as by the sarcasms of Job and the divine rebuke we may be inclined to do. They are the best men of their time and country. Nowhere is age more venerable than in Arabia. A life in the pure open air of the desert, active but not laborious, temperate without hardships, thoughtful without wearing study, ceremonious in courtesy without the dissipations of society, leads to an age of imperial dignity. As these patriarchs in flowing robes and snowy beards approached the sufferer, erect and clear-eyed, they were fit types of manhood in its ripe maturity. Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar were just men, reverencing a just God. The divine government as they understood it, was an administration of inflexible justice, slow, possibly, but sure [illegible]

When now they found Job stripped of his wealth and his children, loathsomely diseased and seated in the ashes, they had but one opinion. He was guilty and his guilt was an atrocity measured by his calamities. Shocking as it was to their feelings to see the change in one so lately trusted, it was a shock only to their feelings, not to their opinions. What they saw was readily adjusted to their general notions of the fallibility of man and the methods of the divine government. The plain duty which they thought they saw was to lead Job to a confession of his crimes, and so again to peace. They began [illegible], setting forth the majesty and holiness of God, his justice and irresistible omnipotence, his readiness to forgive, and the inevitable doom of the obstinate sinner. All is general and impersonal.

ORIGIN OF THE QUAKERS.†

Religious fanaticism is the most dangerous of all the errors of mankind. A false leader in religion may be more fatal than an incompetent general of an army, therefore ministers of the Gospel and teachers have the greatest task imposed on them of any of God's creation. When once one's religion runs mad, barbarity assumes the support of conscience and feels its approval in the consummation of the most heinous crimes. The Pilgrims and Puritans who had fled from religious persecution across the seas, and had come to the wilderness to worship God according to their own conscience, were unwilling to grant the same privilege to others. For this reason they banished Roger Williams, and persecuted other religious sects not in accordance with their own views.

They whipped Quakers, bored holes in their tongues, branded them with hot irons, and even hung them for their religious views. Religious fervor, controlled by prejudice and ignorance, is the greatest calamity that can be [illegible] a nation.

The Quakers appeared first in England about the time Roger Williams procured his charter for Rhode Island. The term "Quaker," now so venerated and respected, was given to this sect in derision, just as the Puritans, Protestants, and many other now respectable sects were named. Their founder and preachers were among the boldest and yet the meekest of the non-conformists. Their morality was so strict that by some they were denominated ascetics, and their strictness was carried into every habit and department of life. Extravagant expenditures, fashionable dress, games of chance, dancing, attending the theatres and all amusements, however harmless, were forbidden by this sect. Even music was discouraged as a seductive vanity. The members of this church were forbidden to own slaves, take part in war, engage in lawsuits, indulge in intemperance or profanity which, if persisted in, was a cause for the expulsion of a member from the society, and the whole body was in duty bound to keep a watch upon the actions of each other. Their practices so generally agreed with their principles, that society was compelled to admit that the profession of a Quaker or Friend, as they usually styled themselves, was a guaranty of a morality above the ordinary level of the world.

BABYLONIAN RECORDS AT CHICAGO.

Signatures of the ancient Babylonian Kings, preserved to wondering Nineteenth-Century civilization, in tablets and bricks and unglazed pottery, form part of a unique exhibit by the University of Pennsylvania in the liberal arts section of the Manufacturers' Building. These old Babylonian cuneiform texts are a part of the harvest gathered by Rev. John Peters in 1888. The fragments shown have been carefully selected from the many thousands of objects in possession of the university, and are considered the best and most representative articles unearthed by the expedition.

Possibly the most remarkable of these curious objects is a door-socket in diorite, ascribed to the period of Sargon I., 3800 B. C. On the side is a cuneiform inscription, written in the oldest Semitic dialect of Babylonia, and the characters are archaic and beautiful. The message which it conveys from the ancients to us moderns is ominous in its portent. It reads as follows: "Shargani-Shar-Di, son of Itti Bel, the mighty King of Agad and of the dominion of Bel, builder of Ekur, temple of Bel in Nippur. Whosoever removes this inscribed stone, his foundations may the Gods Bel and Shamash and Ninna tear up, and exterminate his seed."

ETERNAL REST.

Oh, how blest are ye whose toils are ended!
Who through death, have unto God ascended!
Ye have arisen
From the cares which keep us still in prison!

Christ hath wiped away your tears forever;
Ye have that for which we still endeavor;
To you are chanted
Songs which yet no mortal ear have haunted.

Ah, who would not then depart with gladness
To inherit heaven for earthly sadness?
Who would here languish
Longer in bewailing and in anguish?

Come, O Christ, and loose the chains that bind us,
Lead us forth, and cast this world behind us;
With thee, the Anointed,
Finds the soul its rest and joy appointed.

WINTER BLOOMING BULBS FREE!

The Lovely, Fragrant Cinnamon Vine! Two kinds of this Delightful, Sweet-Scented, Winter-Blooming Climber Absolutely Free to Every Reader of this Periodical! A Grand offer by a Well-Known, Old Established and Thoroughly Reliable Publishing House! The Cinnamon Vine is one of the most charming of all plants for the window garden. It grows very rapidly, soon attaining a height of twenty feet or more, and completely surrounding the window, making a perfect bower of beauty. Its leaves are beautifully shaped, and it blooms freely, producing in great profusion a delicate white flower, which emits the delightful odor of cinnamon. If the bulbs are set in pots the plant will attain a large growth and bloom during the coming winter, or the bulbs may be set in the open ground in the Spring, when the vine will completely cover any trellis or arbor, presenting a beautiful effect. Desiring to introduce our charming magazine for ladies and the family, The Ladies' World, into thousands of homes where it is not already taken, we make the following special and extraordinary offer. Upon receipt of 12 Cents in silver or stamps, we will send The Ladies' World for Three Months, and to each subscriber we will also send Free and postpaid, Two Bulbs of the charming Cinnamon Vine described above. The Ladies' World is a large 24-page, 32-column illustrated Magazine for ladies and the family circle. It is devoted to stories, poems, ladies' fancy work, artistic needlework, home decoration, housekeeping, fashions, hygiene, juvenile reading, etiquette, etc. Remember, 12 cents pays for the magazine three months, and two bulbs of the Cinnamon Vine are given absolutely free to every subscriber. No lady can afford to miss this wonderful opportunity. We guarantee every subscriber more than the value of money sent, and will refund your money and make you a present of both bulbs and Magazine if you are not satisfied. Ours is an old and reliable publishing house, endorsed by all the leading newspapers. Write us today—don't put it off. Six subscriptions, with the two bulbs free to each, sent for 50 cents.

SPECIAL OFFER! To any lady sending us 12 cents for above offer, and mentioning the paper on which she saw this advertisement, we will send free, in addition to the Cinnamon Vine Bulbs and the Magazine three months, one Bulb of the charming Freesia (Freesia Refracta Alba, a beautiful, winter-blooming plant, producing large pure white flowers, in elegant clusters, delicate and fragrant. The Cinnamon Vine and Freesia together will make a beautiful window garden. Address

THE LIFE BEYOND.

WHAT were the use of living
If life contained no more,
No sweet hope, solace giving,
That points to a fairer shore?

Beyond this land of shadows
Eternal sunshine dwells,
And in those peaceful meadows
There bloom the asphodels.

The fragrant winds are winging
Their flight through budding bowers,
And Eden birds are singing
Thro' long delightsome hours.

No shade of pain and sorrow
O'erclouds the day so bright,
And no uncertain morrow
Darkens a troubled night.

A SCENE IN LEOPOLDVILLE.

In a letter to the Baptist Missionary Society from his station at Leopoldville, Rev. Joseph Clark writes:—I wish you could see this station and the work being done here. First, I think the different languages would astonish you: Accra, Kitanga, Kikongo, Kiyansi, Kilolo, Ki(ba)ngala, and some other tongues the names of which I cannot tell. Then the work would appeal to you with its many-sidedness. Here are some boys and girls clearing the ground and planting palm and other trees. These palms are not merely ornamental, they provide food and oil, and in other ways are of very great value. Some are at work being trained in the carpentry; others, are building a roof on a house. It looks fully as good as any house of our missionaries down country. Is it a new house for Dr. Sim's? No, it is a house for native girls, of whom there are about fifteen on the station. What has it cost? If you look at the Missionary Union accounts, it seems to have grown as do the mushrooms, at no expense. The doctor has raised it himself; to a considerable extent the expense has been paid by his medical skill. Here are the brick walls of a fine house going up. This is the industrial school, costing the same to the Missionary Union, I presume, as did the other house. The five recent baptisms tell that not only are bricks being made and houses built, but also souls are being won for Jesus. Others are seeking the way of life, and I can assure you it is affecting to see some come out in front of, say, one hundred and fifty to two hundred others, and kneel down to be prayed for.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

Striking phrases which happily express in a few words some weighty thought often live in the memory when long arguments are forgotten. Such are the following which have fallen from the lips of famous preachers: Rev. Charles Berry recently spoke of "the explosive power of a right principle." This recalls Dr. Chalmers' famous saying, "the expulsive power of a new affection." The Church will never forget Augustine's words, "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless till it rest in Thee"; nor these: "Take my heart, Lord, for I cannot give it to Thee. Keep it, for I cannot keep it for Thee." Luther's saying is the watch-word of Protestantism: "The doctrine of justification by faith is the mark of a standing or falling Church." George Westfield does not usually get the credit of having been a suggestive preacher, but his is the saying: "I do not preach for life, but from life." His words to students are golden: "I hope you will enter into your studies, not to get a parish, nor to be polite preachers, but to be great saints." And to ministers: "Beware of nestling." One of Spurgeon's happy sayings is: "God wants nothing but your wants."

THE UNCHANGED VERSE.

At a recent evangelistic meeting the following incident was related: A neighbor of the speaker was converted under a sermon on John 3:16. When she returned home her little boy noticed her happy face, and asked the reason of it. "I have found Jesus, my dear boy," she exclaimed, "I am saved by his precious blood." "How do you know?" asked the little fellow. "Listen," she said, and she read the verse to him that had brought the joyful assurance. Next morning Satan raised his favorite question of feelings, and she came down to breakfast with the old miserable expression that her son had been so long accustomed to. "What's wrong now, mother?" questioned the boy. "Everything's wrong, dear; I have made a terrible mistake, I fear." "Have you lost Jesus, mother?" She did not like to say she had. "Has the verse changed, then?" continued the boy, "it seems as if it had." "That was many years ago," said the mother, "but my dear boy's faith rebuked my unbelief. I then and there believed God's bare word, feel or no feel, because it was his word, and I am just resting my soul there now."

CALLING IN THE CHILDREN.

Cheering Reports from "The Christian Herald's" Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest—Still Planting New Schools—A Typical Sunday School Convention.

NEARLY two and a half years have passed since this journal, with the hearty Christian co-operation of a number of its readers, commissioned the Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, a pastor of wide experience in the home field, to go forth in the capacity of a Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest. His duties lay in out-of-the-way sections, among the poorer class of settlers, who had not the benefit of church relations, their homes being remote from centres of population and trade. It was sad to contemplate the neglected condition of the children in such homes; thousands of the little ones were growing up in obscure localities in ignorance of the Gospel.

Those two and a half years have been prolific of spiritual results, and have witnessed the founding of many new Sunday Schools and not a few churches, in Northern Missouri especially—a locality where such work was greatly needed. Our missionary's labors have been greatly blessed in being the means of opening up avenues for supplying Gospel privileges to many localities hitherto unprovided. In the first year, twenty new schools were organized, five reorganized or revived, sixteen were addressed and aided, and twenty-seven others visited and assisted in various ways according to their particular needs. During the second year, twelve new Sunday Schools were planted, forty-three new teachers appointed, and 497 scholars enrolled. Six schools that were falling off for want of attention were revived and a large amount of other evangelical work performed which it is not necessary to recapitulate here. During that year the missionary traveled 5,072 miles, visited 432 families, delivered 162 addresses and sermons, and distributed several hundred Bibles and Testaments. His work during the part of the third year that has already gone has been even more arduous than in the preceding years, but both Mr. Sharp and those who are contributing to his support in the field have the gratification of knowing that the results are proportionately increased. An idea of the character and extent of the work may be gathered from the extracts from some of his recent letters which we give below. Of one school which he founded, he writes:

"Oak Grove is the name of a country Sunday School in Adair County, Missouri. As its name indicates, it meets in a grove. A large oak tree stands on the west of an open space in the forest, and shelters the school (which meets in the afternoon) from the heat of the sun. On the south side of the open space, or court, lies a large log, partly decayed, which may have been a tree of towering height before this territory had acquired statehood. The open space is shaded by trees around it, and is seated with slabs and planks resting on supports at the ends. The school is well attended by parents, youths and children. One of those present the day I was there recently, was an octogenarian, about the age of Mr. Gladstone. He was in fine health, very cheerful, and taking an active interest in the success of the school. He has long been a Christian, and still brings forth fruit in old age. The teachers were delighted, the scholars attentive, and the interest in the work equalled, if it did not surpass, that of many schools which meet in houses. Their young voices and sweet songs sounded lovely through the forest. "At the close of the school I addressed the scholars, seeking to aid and encourage them. I was invited to come again soon and hold a protracted meeting with them. This I was compelled to decline on account of other work. When the weather gets too cold for the school to meet in the grove, it will be continued in some dwelling-house.

"In my travels in another county, last spring, I found it necessary to reorganize a school which had met with opposition through ignorance and sectarianism. It is truly missionary ground. The roads were muddy—the weather rainy and chilly; but the reorganization was effected, in spite of unfriendly influences and evil prophecies. I have recently received cheering words from it. The attendance is regular and growing, and the interest is good. The district has about ninety children of school age, and a corresponding adult population who greatly need the gospel."

Mr. Sharp thus describes the illustration on this page which he recently forwarded:

"This is a photograph of Indian Springs Sunday School picnic-convention. On the left you will see your missionary standing on a stump, addressing the school and visitors.

"The Convention lasted two days. I addressed them each day and preached at night, and during that time distributed hundreds of Gospel tracts, booklets, etc. In former years I organized Sunday Schools near that locality in school-houses. Indian Springs School is in a country district near two springs which used to be frequented by Indians in the early history of this State—hence the name. There is no church house near. The Tabernacle Pulpit

UNSAFE LIFEBOATS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Acts 27: 32: "Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off."

WHILE your faces are yet somewhat bronzed by attendance on the International Boat Contest between the Vigilant and the Valkyrie, I address you. Good things when there is no betting or dissipation, those out-door sports. We want more fresh air and breeziness in our temperaments and our religion. A stale and slow and lugubrious religion may have done for other times, yet will not do for these. But my text calls our attention to a boat of a different sort, and instead of the Atlantic, it is the Mediterranean, and instead of not wind enough, as the crews of the Vigilant and Valkyrie the other day complained, there is too much wind and the swoop of a Euroclydon. I am not calling your attention so much to the famous ship on which Paul was the distinguished passenger, but to the life boat of that ship which no one seems to notice. For a fortnight the main vessel had been tossed and driven. For that two weeks, the account says, the passengers had "continued fasting." I suppose the salt water, dashing over, had spoiled the sea-biscuit, and the passengers were seasick anyhow. The sailors said, "It is no use; this ship must go down," and they proposed among themselves to lower the lifeboat and get into it, and take the chances for reaching shore, although they pretended they were going to get over the sides of the big ship and down into the lifeboat only to do sailors' duty. That was not sailor like, for the sailors that I have known were all intrepid fellows, and would rather go down with the ship than do such a mean thing as those Jack Tars of my text attempted. When on the Mediterranean last June the Victoria sank under the ram of the Camperdown, the most majestic thing about that awful scene was that all the sailors staid at their posts doing their duty. As a class all over the world sailors are valorous, but these sailors of the text were exceptional and pretended to do duty while they were really preparing for flight in the lifeboat. But these "marines" on board —sea-soldiers — had in especial charge a little missionary who was turning the world upside down, and when these marines saw the trick the sailors were about to play, they lifted the cutlasses from the girdle and chop! chop! went those cutlasses into the ropes that held the lifeboat and splash! it dropped into the sea. My text describes it: "The soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off." As that empty lifeboat dropped and was capsized on a sea where for two weeks winds and billows had been in battle, I think that many on board the main vessel felt their last hope of ever reaching home had vanished. In that tempestuous sea a small boat could not have lived five minutes.

My subject is "Unsafe Lifeboats." We cannot exaggerate the importance of the lifeboat. All honor to the memory of Lionel Lukin, the coach-builder of Long Acre, London, who invented the first lifeboat, and I do not blame him for ordering put upon his tombstone in Kent the inscription that you may still read there:

"Lionel Lukin was the first who built a lifeboat, and was the original inventor of that principle of safety, by which many lives and much property have been preserved from shipwreck; and he obtained for it the king's patent in the year 1785."

All honor to the memory of Sir William Hillary, who living in the Isle of Man, and after assisting with his own hand in the rescue of 305 lives of the shipwrecked, stirred the English Parliament to quick action in the construction of lifeboats. Thanks to God for the sublime and pathetic and divine mission of the lifeboat. No one will doubt its important mission who has read of the wreck of the Amazon in the Bay of Biscay; of the Tweed running on the reefs of the Gulf of Mexico, or of the Ocean Monarch on the coast of Wales, or of the Birkenhead on the Cape of Good Hope, or of the Royal Charter on the coast of Anglesea, or of the Exmouth on the Scotch breakers, or of the Cambria on the Irish coast, or of the Atlantic on the rocks of Nova Scotia, or of the Lexington on Long Island Sound. To add still further to the importance of the lifeboat, remember there are at least three million men following the sea, to say nothing of the uncounted millions this moment ocean passengers. We "land-lubbers," as sailors call us, may not know the difference between a marlinespike and a ring bolt, or anything about heaving a log, or rigging out a flying jib-boom, or furling a top-sail, but we all realize to greater or less extent the importance of a lifeboat in every marine equipment. But do we feel the importance of a lifeboat in the matter of the soul's rescue? There are times when we all feel that we are out at sea, and as many disturbing and anxious questions strike us as waves struck that vessel against the sides of which the lifeboat of my text dangled. Questions about the church. Questions about the world. Questions about God. Questions about our eternal destiny. Every thinking man and woman have these questions, and in proportion as they are thinking people do these questions arise. There is no wrong in thinking. If God had not intended us to think and keep on thinking, he would not have built under this wheel-house of the skull this thinkingmachine, which halts not in its revolutions from cradle to grave. Even the midnight does not stop the thinking machine, for when we are in dreams, we are thinking, although we do not think as well. All of us who are accustomed to thinking want to reach some solid shore of safety and satisfaction, and if anyone has a good lifeboat that we may honorably take, I wish he would unswing it from the davits and let us get into it and put for shore. But I give you fair notice, I must first examine the lifeboat before I risk my soul in it or advise you to risk your soul in it. All the splendid Ramsgate lifeboats, and Margate lifeboats and South Shields lifeboats and American lifeboats were tested, before being put into practical use, as to their buoyancy and speed, and stowage and self-righting capacity. And when you offer my soul a lifeboat I must first test it.

Here is a splendid new lifeboat called Theosophy. It has only a little while been launched, although some of the planks are really several thousand years old, and from a worm-eaten ship, but they are painted over and look new. They are really Fatalism and Pantheism of olden time. But we must forget that and call them Theosophy. The Grace Darling of this lifeboat was an oarswoman by the name of Madame Blavatsky, but the oarswoman now is Annie Besant. So many are getting aboard the boat, it is worthy of examination, both because of the safety of those who have entered it and because we ourselves are invited to get in. Its theory is that everything is God. Horse and star and tree and man are parts of God. We have three souls: An animal soul, a human soul, a spiritual soul. The animal soul becomes, after a while, a wandering thing, trying to express itself through mediums. It enters beasts, or enters a human being, and when you find an effeminate man, it is because a woman's soul has got into the man, and when you find a masculine woman, it is because a man's soul has taken possession of a woman's body. If you find a woman has become a platform speaker and likes politics, she is possessed by a dead politician, who forty years ago made the platform quake. The soul keeps wandering on and on, and may have fifty or innumerable different forms and finally is absorbed in God. It was God at the start and will be God at the last. But who gives the authority for the truth of such a religion? Some beings living in a cave in Central Asia. They are invisible to the naked eye, but they cross continents and seas in a flash. My Baptist brother Dr. Haldeman says that a Theosophist in New York was visited by one of these mysterious beings from Central Asia. The gentleman knew it from the fact that the mysterious being left his pocket-handkerchief, embroidered with his name and Asiatic residence. The most wonderful achievement of the Theosophists is that they keep out of the insane asylum. They prove the truth of the statement that no religion ever announced was so absurd but it gained disciples. Societies in the United States and England and other lands have been established for the promulgation of Theosophy. Instead of needing the revelation of a Bible, you can have these spirits from a cave in Central Asia to tell you all you ought to know, and after you leave this life you may become a prima donna or a robin or a gazelle or a sot or a prize-fighter or a Herod or a Jezebel, and so be enabled to have great variety of experience, rotating through the universe, now rising, now falling, now shot out in a straight line, and now describing a parabola, and on and on, and up and up, and down and down, and round and round. Don't you see? Now, that Theosophic lifeboat has been launched. It proposes to take you off the rough sea of doubt into everlasting quietude. How do you like that lifeboat? My opinion is you had better imitate the mariners of my text, and cut off the ropes of that boat and let her fall off.

Another lifeboat tempting us to enter is made up of many planks of Good Works. It is really a beautiful boat—alms-giving, practical sympathies for human suffering, righteous words and righteous deeds. I must admit I like the looks of the prow and of the row-locks and of the paddles and of the steering gear and of many who are thinking to trust themselves on her benches. But the trouble about that lifeboat is, it leaks. I never knew a man yet good enough to earn heaven by his virtues or generosities. If there be one person here present on this blessed Sabbath all of whose thoughts have been always right, all of whose actions have always been right, and all of whose words have always been right, let him stand up, or if already standing, let him lift his hand, and I will know that he lies. Paul had it about right when he said: "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified." David had it about right when he said: "There is none that doeth good, no not one." The Old Book had it about right when it said: "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." Let a man get off that little steamer called "The Maid of the Mist," which sails up to the foot of Niagara Falls, and then climb to the top of the Falls on the descending floods, for he can do it easier than any man ever will be able to climb to heaven by his good works. If your thoughts have always been exactly right, and your words exactly right and your deeds always exactly right, you can go up to the Gate of Heaven, and you need not even knock for admittance, but open it yourself, and push the angels out of your way, and go up and take one of the front seats. But you would be so unlike anyone else that has gone up from this world that you would be a curiosity in heaven, and more fit for a heavenly museum that for a place where the inhabitants could look at you free of charge. No, sir, I admire your good works, and that lifeboat you are thinking of trusting in is handsomer than any yawl or pinnace or yacht or cutter that ever sped out of a boat-house or hoisted sail for a race. But she leaks. Trust your soul in that, and you will go to the bottom. She leaks. So I imitate the mariners of the text, and with a cutlass strike the ropes of the boat and let her fall off.

Another lifeboat is Christian Inconsistencies. The planks of this boat are composed of the split planks of shipwrecks. That prow is made out of hypocrisy from the life of a man who professed one thing and really was another. One oar of this lifeboat was the falsehood of a church member, and the other oar was the wickedness of some minister of the Gospel, whose iniquities were not for a long while found out. Not one plank from the oak of God's eternal truth in all that lifeboat. All the planks, by universal admission, are decayed and crumbling and fallen apart and rotten and ready to sink. "Well, well," you say, "No one will want to get into that lifeboat." Oh, my friend, you are mistaken. That is the most popular lifeboat ever constructed. That is the most popular lifeboat ever launched. Millions of people want to get into it. They jostle each other to get the best seat in the boat. You could not keep them back though you stood at the gunwales with a club as on our ship "Greece" in a hurricane and the steerage passengers were determined to come up on deck, where they would have been washed off, and the officers stood at the stop of the stairs clubbing them back. Even by such violence as that you could not keep people from jumping into the most popular lifeboat, made of church-member inconsistencies. In times of revival when sinners flock into the inquiry room, the most of them are kept from deciding aright because they know so many Christians who are bad. The inquiry room becomes a World's Fair for exhibition of all the frailties of church members, so that if you believe all is there told you you would be afraid to enter a church lest you get your pockets picked or get knocked down. This is the way the talk: "I was cheated out of $500 by a leader of a Bible class." "A Sunday School teacher gossiped about me and did her best to destroy my good name. "I had a partner in business who swamped our business concern by his trickery, and then rolled up his eyes in Friday night prayer meeting, as though he were looking for Elijah's chariot to make a second trip and take up another passenger." But what a cracked and water-logged and gaping-seamed lifeboat the inconsistencies of others. Put me on a shingle mid-Atlantic and leave me there, rather than in such a yawl of spiritual confidence. God forbid that I should get aboard it, and lest some of you make the mistake of getting into it, I do as the mariners did on that Mediterranean ship when the sailors were about to get into the unsafe lifeboat of the text and lose their lives in that way. "Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off."

"Well," says someone, "this subject is very discouraging, for we must have a lifeboat, if we are ever to get ashore, and you have already condemned three." Ah, it is because I want to persuade you to take the only safe lifeboat. I will not allow you to be deceived and get on to the wild waves and then capsize or sink. Thank God, there is a lifeboat that will take you ashore in safety, as sure as God is God and heaven is heaven. The keel and ribs of this boat are made out of a tree that was set up on a bluff back of Jerusalem a good many years ago. Both of the oars are made out of the same tree. The row-locks are made out of the same tree. The steering gear is made out of the same tree. The planks of it were hammered together by the hammers of executioners, who thought they were only killing a Christ, but were really pounding together an escape for all imperiled souls of all ages. It is an old boat, but good as new, though it has been carrying passengers from sinking ships to firm shore for ages, and has never lost a passenger. These old Christians begin to smile because it is dawning upon them what I mean. The fact is that in this way years ago they got off a wreck themselves, and I do not wonder they smile. It is not a senseless giggle that means frivolity, but it is a smile like that on the face of Christians the moment they leave earth for heaven, yea, like the smile of God himself when he had completed the plan for saving the world.

Right after that big tumble of the Atlantic Ocean six or seven weeks ago, on the beach at East Hampton, I met the captain of the life-saving station and said: "Captain, do you think a life-boat could live in a sea like that?" Although the worst of it was over, the captain replied: "No, I do not think it could." But this life-boat of which I speak can live in any sea and defies all breakers, and all cyclones, and all equinoxes, and all earth, and all hell. In twenty years the life-saving apparatus along our Atlantic coast saved the lives of over 45,000 of the shipwrecked, but this life-boat that I commend has saved in twenty years hundreds of miliions of the shipwrecked. Like those newly invented English lifeboats, it is insubmergeable, self-righting and self-bailing. All along our rocky American coast things were left to chance for centuries, and the shipwrecked crawled up on the beach to die unless some one happened to walk along or some fisherman's hut might be near. But after the ship Ayrshire was wrecked at Squan Beach, and the Powhatan left her three hundred dead strewn along our coast, and another vessel went on the rocks, four hundred lives perishing, the United States Government woke up and made an appropriation of $200,000 for life-saving stations, and lifelines from faking-box are shot over the wild surf, and hawsers are stretched from wreck to shore, and what with Lyle's gun and six-oared surf-boat, with cork at the sides to make it unsinkable, and patrolmen all night long walking the beach until they meet each other and exchange metal tickets, so as to show the entire beach has been traversed, and the Coston light flashes hope from shore to sufferer, and surfmen, encased in Merriman life-saving dress, and life-car rolling on the ropes, there are many probabilities of rescue for the unfortunate of the sea. But the Government of the United Heavens has made better provision for the rescue of our souls. So close by that this moment we can put our hand on its top and swing into it, is this Gospel life-boat. It will not take you more than a second to get into it.

But while in my text we stand watching the marines with their cutlasses, preparing to sever the ropes of the life-boat and let her fall off, notice the poor equipment. Only one life-boat. Two hundred and seventy-six passengers, as Paul counted them, and only one life-boat. My text uses the singular and not the plural. "Cut off the ropes of the boat." I do not suppose it would have held more than thirty people, though loaded to the water's edge. I think by marine law all our modern vessels have enough lifeboats to hold all the crew and all the passengers in case of emergency, but the marines of my text were standing by the only boat, and that a small boat, and yet two hundred and seventy-six passengers. But what thrills me through and through is the fact that though we are wrecked by sin and trouble, and there is only one life-boat, that boat is large enough to hold all who are willing to get into it. The Gospel hymn expresses it:

All may come, whoever will,
This Man receives poor sinners still.

But I must haul in that statement a little. Room for all in that life-boat, with just one exception. Not you; I do not mean you, but there is one exception. There have been cases where ships were in trouble and the captain got all the passengers and crew into the life-boats, but there was not room for the captain. He, through the sea-trumpet, shouted: "Shove off now and pull for the beach. Good-by," and then the captain with pathetic and sublime self-sacrifice went down with the ship. So the Captain of our Salvation, Christ the Lord, launches the Gospel life-boat, and tells us all to get in, but he perishes. "It behooved Christ to suffer." Was it not so, ye who witnessed his agonizing expiration? Simon of Cyrene, was it not so? Cavalry troops, whose horses pawed the dust at the Crucifixion, was it not so? Ye Marys who swooned away with the sun of the mid-day heavens, was it not so? "By his stripes we are healed." By his death we live. By his sinking in the deep sea of suffering we get off in a safe life-boat. Yes, we must put into this story a little of our own personality. We had a ride in that very life-boat from foundered craft to solid shore.

Once on the raging seas I rowed,
The storm was loud, the night was dark,
The ocean yawned and rudely blow'd
The wind that tossed my foundering bark.

But I got into the Gospel lifeboat and I got ashore. No religious speculation for me. These higher criticism fellows do not bother me a bit. You may ask me fifty questions about the sea and about the land and about the lifeboat that I cannot answer, but one thing I know: I am ashore and I am going to stay ashore, if the Lord by his grace will help me. I feel under me something so firm that I try it with my right foot, and try it with my left foot, and then I try it with both feet, and it is so solid that I think it must be what the old folks used to call the Rock of Ages. And be my remaining days on earth many or few, I am going to spend my time in recommending the lifeboat which fetched me here, a poor sinner saved by grace, and in swinging the cutlasses to sever the ropes of any unsafe lifeboat and let her fall off. My hearer, without asking any questions, get into the Gospel lifeboat. Room! and yet there is room! The biggest boat on earth is the Gospel lifeboat. You must remember the proportion of things, and that the shipwrecked craft is the whole earth, and the lifeboat must be in proportion. You talk about your Campanias, and your Lucanias, and your Majestics, and your City of New Yorks, but all of them put together are smaller than an Indian's canoe on Schroon Lake compared with this Gospel life-boat, that is large enough to take in all nations. Room for one and room for all. Get in! "How? How?" you ask. Well, I know how you feel, for summer before last, on the sea of Finland, I had the same experience. The ship in which we sailed could not venture nearer than a mile from shore, where stood the Russian palace of Peterhof, and we had to get into a small boat and be rowed ashore. The water was rough, and as we went down the ladder at the side of the ship, we held firmly on to the railing, but in order to get into the boat, we had at last to let go. How did I know that the boat was good and that the oarsmen were sufficient? How did I know that the Finland Sea would not swallow us with one opening of its crystal jaws? We had to trust, and we did trust, and our trust was well rewarded. In the same way get into this Gospel lifeboat. Let go! As long as you hold on to any other hope, you are imperiled and you get no advantage from the lifeboat. Let go! Does some one here say, "I guess I will hold on a little to my Good Works, or to a pious parentage, or to something I can do in the way of achieving my own salvation." No, no, let go! Trust the Captain, who would not put you into a rickety or uncertain craft.

For the sake of your present and everlasting welfare, with all the urgency of an immortal addressing immortals, I cry from the depths of my soul and at the top of my voice, Let go! Last summer the life-saving crew at East Hampton invited me to come up to the life station and see the crew practice, for twice a week they are drilled in the important work assigned them by the United States Government, and they go through all the routine of saving the shipwrecked. But that would give little idea of what they would have to do if some midnight next winter, the wind driving beachward, a vessel should get in the grasp of a hurricane. See the lights flare from the ship in the breakers, and then responding lights flaring from the beach, and hear the rockets buzz as they rise, and the life-boat rumbles out, and the gun booms, and the lifeline rises and falls across the splintered decks, and the hawser tightens, and the life-car goes to and fro, carrying the exhausted mariners, and the ocean, as if angered by the snatching of the human prey from the white teeth of its surf and the stroke of its billowing paw, rises with increased fury to assail the land. So now I am engaged in no light drill, practicing for what may come over some of your souls. It is with some of you wintry midnight and your hopes for this world and the next are wrecked. But see! See! The lights kindled on the beach. I throw out the life line. Haul in, hand over hand! Ah, there is a life-boat in the surf, which all the wrath of earth and hell cannot swamp, and its Captain with scarred hand puts the trumpet to his lips as he cries: "Oh, Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help." But what is the use of all this if you decline to get into it. You might as well have been a sailor on board that foundering ship of the Mediterranean when the mariners cut the ropes of the boat and let her fall off.

THE RESURRECTION.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 5. I. Cor. 15 : 12-26. Golden Text, I Cor. 15: 57. By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE last enemy that shall be destroyed (or abolished) is death." The Apostle Paul declares that our Saviour, Christ Jesus, abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the Gospel. (II. Tim. 1: 10, R. V.) And in Heb. 11: 14, it is written: "Since then the children are sharers in the flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same, that through death he might bring to nought him that had (or hath) the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver them who through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." (R.V.) "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, and ourselves also which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit the redemption of our body." (Rom. 8: 22, 23.)

Sin brought into the world sickness, death, corruption, Christ came to reverse all which sin had done. By dying he has destroyed the power of death, of sin, of sickness, of corruption. How shall we ever fully understand the unspeakable grace and love which in every sense, gave itself for us! Only so far as we understand the death of Christ—and that can only be by being crucified with him—just so far can we know "the power of his resurrection." Only as we know the power of his resurrection can we share and enter into his coming glory.

Paul meets the objections of those who say that there is no resurrection of the dead by saying if this is so: "Then is not Christ risen, and if Christ hath not been raised your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins." (R.V.) The only proof that Christ has really made atonement for sin is the fact that death, the penalty of sin, has lost its hold upon him. "But now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of them which are asleep," the first of those who have been raised from the dead who did not die again, for those whom he shall raise when he comes again. "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive." All that we have from Adam, all our earthly, fleshly nature must pass through death, all flesh is grass and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field . . . The grass withereth the flower thereof fadeth, but the word of the Lord endureth forever. (I. Pet. 1: 24, 25.) But just as real as is the law of death for all which is of Adam, so real and unchangeable is the law of life and incorruption for all which is of Jesus Christ. He came with power over all flesh, to give eternal life, i. e., incorruption to as many as the Father has given him.

The Pledge of Life Immortal

By the very fact that in our human nature he passed through death, and was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, Jesus Christ, has pierced through death, and made a way by which life and immortality or incorruption should come to light. "But every man in his own order, Christ the First-fruits, afterward, they that are Christ's at his coming." "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more, death hath no dominion over him," and when once he has succeeded in taking away those that are his at his coming, he is the guarantee that death shall have no more dominion over them. Our nature inherited from Adam has gone through death in him, and we put our signature to this faith in willingly welcoming all which is death to our self-life; reputation, choice, affection, tastes, all which we have valued—"what things were gain to me," as Paul expresses it. And as surely as we are united with him by the likeness of his death so surely shall we be united with him by the now in the spirit, and when he comes again in the body. This is why Paul says: I die daily. In no other way could he could he have made his calculation that the loss of all things was worth while that he might "know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable to his death if by any means [he] might attain to the resurrection [out from among the dead."] i. e., the resurrection of God's true elect; those whom the Father has given to him.

The resurrection has always been that which the natural man has sought, by any means, to get rid of; death, annihilation, anything but resurrection. And therefore all the ingenuity of the natural mind has been brought to bear on the resurrection. "How are the dead raised up and with what body do they come?" is among the question which are raised. "Thou foolish one," answers Paul, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other seed; but God giveth it a body as it has pleased him, and to every seed his own body." What then, are our human bodies, only the seeds of what shall be? And is our life on earth, our moral, spiritual, as well as physical life only the seed of the future? Are we not only sowing, but sown for a wonderful, incomprehensible harvest in the future? "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." (I. John 3: 3.) O wondrous, ineffable glory of the resurrection! It is not eternal imperfection but the corruptible sown for the the imperfect sown for the harvest of perfection! Paul speaks of the variety of nature, one flesh of beasts, birds, fishes, all varying. There are some celestial, some terrestrial bodies, and among celestial bodies, the sun and moon differ, and one star differeth from another star in glory. "So also is the resurrection of the dead." Differences which are as small here as the form of many yellow or brown looking little seeds, will, in the resurrection, wonderfully develop. Then shall we understand the difference between the queen at the right hand of him who is "fairer than the children of men," and the virgins her companions that follow her. Then shall we know who are the blessed that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Then shall we understand the mystery of the living creatures, who are not only "round about the throne," but also "in the midst of the thrones," and who unlike the four and twenty elders, seem to have part in the execution of judgment. Then we shall know, when these distinctions shall be made clear to us, who are the servants that open to their Lord immediately when he shall return from the wedding, for we cannot doubt that all of such as these who have already passed through death will have part in the first resurrection.

But the wonderful sowing for the harvest of the resurrection. It is beyond all our human conceptions. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory." This is so like the change which the Lord will work in those who shall be taken away without dying. He will fashion anew the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself. (Phil. 3: 21, R.V.) Just as in our chapter the apostle says: "Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither can corruption without incorruption. Behold I tell you a mystery [or a secret]; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." How shall this corruptible mind put on incorruption, "Not for that we could be unclothed, but clothed upon that what is mortal may be Swallowed up of Life."

What strange expressions these are, until we learn to die daily! Then it becomes our own familiar tongue; we understand what it is to look, not at the things which are seen or which are felt, or which are approved of man, but at the things which are not seen and not felt, and not understood by man; we learn in our turn to suffer the loss of all things earthly and to see in all things Jesus only. This leads us to understand the order of things. The first man, Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening (i.e., life giving) spirit. Howbeit that is not first which is natural (soulish, consisting of our will and feelings, likes and choices, intellect and talents), but that which is spiritual; "the hidden man of the heart is that which is not corruptible the very being of God within us.

"I SAY UNTO THEE ARISE."

RESURRECTION seems almost an impossibility when we look upon a corpse after corruption has set in. It is not surprising that many have asked incredulously, "If a man die, can he live again?" Some men of this way of thinking were in the church at Corinth, as Paul learned, either from Chloe's servants, or from the letter they brought. They may have belonged to the Greek schools of philosophy and have brought the doctrines they learned there, into the church. The Epicureans denied that there was any existence after death. The Stoics believed that the soul lived after death, but lost its identity, being re-absorbed into the source of life from which it originated. Paul combats both ideas, and expresses surprise that any man could hold them and yet be in a Christian church. For him, the fact that Christ had risen from the dead should be a sufficient proof that resurrection was not impossible. There ought, Paul held, to be no doubt in the mind of any Christian as to the fact of Christ's resurrection. To doubt the fact was to disbelieve the Apostles, who declared that they had seen him alive after the crucifixion. It was to take away the foundation of faith, for who could put faith in a dead man? His resurrection proved him to be divine. It was also to take away the motive for service and suffering, for why should a man work and suffer for Christ, if there was no future life? There was no security for future life if Christ had not risen. Thus Paul lifted the question out of the region of speculative philosophy and made it a question of fact. Had Christ risen? Then his people might be sure of rising, too; if he had not risen, the whole fabric of Christianity collapsed. Paul staked all his position and preaching and labor on the one fact of Christ's resurrection, and he breaks forth into a pæan of joy as he dwells on its absolute certainty. Christ, he declares, has triumphed over death and he will go on conquering until this last enemy is abolished and death is swallowed up in victory.

How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead. Nature abounds with suggestions of life from the dead. It is told of Thorwaldsen, the Danish sculptor, that when he returned to his native land with those rare works of art which have made his name immortal, the servants, who unpacked the statuary, scattered upon the ground the straw which was wrapped around the marble works. There were unseen seeds in that straw, and soon there were flowers from the gardens of Rome blooming in the gardens of Copenhagen.

"I find it hard to believe in the resurrection," said a young man to an evangelist. "I had the same feeling," said the evangelist, "the other day, when I was planting some beans. 'Is it possible,' I said to myself, 'that such dry things can live again?' I believed in their resurrection, though I could not reason the matter out, and in spite of my not being able to understand it, they did rise again." The young man replied, "Yes, but man when he is buried remains where he is laid." "Then," said the evangelist, "you think God takes more care and puts less effort into the case of the man than of the bean."

Opponents of the doctrine of the resurrection contend that it is impossible to restore anything which has been dissolved into its original elements, as the body is after it has lain long in the grave. Halley relates that an Eastern slave, to whom his master intrusted a beautiful silver cup, accidently dropped it into a bowl of aquafortis. He saw the cup disappear and was in despair. He appealed to a superior servant, who assured him that the cup was irretrievably lost, having been dissolved. Finally, in distress, he went to his master and told his story. The master added to the aquafortis which held the silver in suspension a quantity of salt water, which caused the aquafortis to precipitate the silver, and a new cup was made from it.

Faraday describes a beautiful illustration of the doctrine of the resurrection, which he saw in the cemetery of the village of Oberhofen in Switzerland. There were many imposing monuments there with inscriptions declaring the hope of the bereaved in the future life of those they had buried there; but none of these interested the great scientist so much as the casual work of nature herself on a humble grave. The relatives of the deceased were evidently too poor to buy a gravestone; but they did what they could. A rough log had been driven into the ground at the head of the grave and at the top of it a small flat board had been nailed slantwise, on which was a paper bearing the name and age of the dead. Between the board and the log was a vacant sheltered space. A caterpillar had crawled into it to undergo the change in chrysalis from a crawling worm into a beautiful butterfly. It had passed through the stage and had flown away, but its empty skin lay in the web it had spun in the hollow over the grave. There, in plain view, was the discarded habitation of the butterfly and beneath the sod the discarded habitation of a human soul.

In a paper mill a number of women were employed sorting the rags out of which the finest kinds of paper were made The rags were very dirty and the women were dirty, too. They were morally polluted too, for being poorly paid they had drifted into vicious ways of getting money. It was strange to think that the sheets of beautifully white paper which were used for bank notes and dainty stationery were the product of the filthy rags which the wretched women were sorting over, but so it was. One of the women was led to Christ during a sickness that kept her long in hospital. A stranger visited her and was surprised to find her so joyful on the verge of death and he asked her why she felt so. She answered, "I have led a wicked life and I am altogether vile and corrupt. I am like the rags going into the mill, but soon I shall be pure and clean and fit for the Master's service.

Margaret Gatty tells a beautiful little parable in illustration of the resurrection. She represents the grub of a dragon-fly at the bottom of the sluggish pool asking anxiously what became of the grubs that climbed up the stalks of the bulrushes. No one could tell him, for none of them ever came back. One day he asked his question of a frog who splashed down among the grubs into the only world they knew of. The frog told him that there was a beautiful world of dry land beyond the pool utterly unlike such a dull dark slimy place as that and the grubs went there when they climbed up the bulrushes. The grub could not believe it but the frog assured him it was so and that while on dry land himself he had watched a grub just like his questioner laboriously and painfully climb up a stalk and fix himself near the top in the sunlight. There he rested until his skin, dried in the heat, cracked from end to end. Then a strange thing happened. Through the gap in the skin could be seen something light and shimmering. It shook itself, as if awaking from a dream, and at last shook itself free of the dry bands of skin. Then it spread beautiful large gauzy wings and rose and the frog saw it no more—saw nothing but the empty skin. The grub listened wonderingly and doubtfully. It repeated the story to other grubs, who were also incredulous, but admitted that there was mystery in these departures. They obtained a promise from a grub, who was just about setting out on the fatal journey up a bulrush that if he could come back and tell them what happened to him, he certainly would. His old companions looked for him anxiously but he never came back. So, one after another went the same way, but none returned to satisfy the curiosity of the grub who had listened to the frog and did not know whether to believe or not. But when one day his limbs grew sluggish and he felt restless and uneasy and oppressed, he felt irresistibly impelled to climb the bulrush himself as he had seen so many of his fellows do. Then he knew the change, but not till then.

CALLING IN THE CHILDREN.

ng only a small house, received the school into their home for more than a year; but about a year ago they erected a tabernacle, made of muslin, supported by wooden posts, plainly seated, with earth for a floor, and warmed in cold weather by a large stove. On the occasion of the recent picnic-convention, the crowd was at times larger than could be accommodated in the tabernacle. They therefore met in a grove. Grouped in the picture are a number of Sunday School workers of this and other schools, some having come over a dozen miles. This school has a very needy and large field. Through it I have from time to time supplied the poor with Bibles and Testaments, and a great amount of Sunday School literature; and Gospel books, tracts, etc., have been scattered far and wide, and these have been received with gladness. The number of conversions has been considerable, and their genuineness has been attested in the changed lives of the living and the triumphant departure of the dying. The school is doing a very important and greatly needed work, not only for the people in its immediate neighborhood, but for miles away. Will not THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers pray for the devoted workers, for they have many difficulties, and much wickedness to encounter, and the field is "white unto the harvest?"

Another gathering which he attended "represented fourteen schools. The exercises were devotional, encouraging and instructive. Some features of the gathering were in the nature of a convention, as the speeches and plans looked to increasing the efficiency of the work, and extending it in the different townships of the county. The attendance was about 2,500.

"From there I sent out appointments for the following Sunday. One of these appointments was at a school-house in a district where there is great indifference, and the people are illiterate. After an address and the distribution of gospel literature, I conversed with the people. They seemed to be stirred afresh to the importance of keeping up their school, which they had allowed to go down. They asked me to send them another appointment, which I hope to do, because it will result in much good.

"From there I drove west across the Grand Chariton—a river flowing from north to south through north Missouri—to a part of the country where I had organized schools in different districts in small school-houses some years ago, and where no church-house had been erected. God be praised for a great change in those neighborhoods! Recently two very neat and comfortable churches have been built, about four miles apart, furnishing ample room for regular preaching and Sunday Schools in thickly settled communities.

"The man at whose house I lodged that night, said, 'Bro. Sharp, I was converted through hearing you speak at M——(a school house) six years ago,' and his wife said, 'I longed to come out (on the Lord's side) at that time.' Some time afterwards both husband and wife became known as out-and-out Christians and Sunday School workers. They have six children, the oldest probably not over eighteen years, all boys, and bright fellows, whom they are bringing up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Six years had passed before I saw this precious fruit. These parents were strangers to me at that time. I therefore go on gladly in the work the Lord has given me to do, praising him for the blessings he allows me to see, and trusting that I shall see far more when the reaping time shall come."

Concerning another Sunday School, he writes:

"Rutledge is a station in Scotland County, Mo., which has grown into a village since the recent construction of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railroad through that county. Soon after the village was located, I went there to organize a Sunday School. There being neither church nor school-house in the place, I organized in an implement warehouse—a plain barn-like-structure, but large enough to hold the people. The school lived and prospered, and is now conducted in a beautiful and comfortable church-house since erected. On a recent visit when I addressed the school and preached, the house was well filled, the workers seemed earnest and intelligent, and the singing was delightful, both in its volume and harmony. The village is situated in a beautiful and fertile country, which has an industrious and prosperous population. The town is increasing in business and numbers, so that the importance of having planted a Sunday School early in its history is very manifest.

"From another county I have received recent information of an entire township in which there are four school-houses, but neither Sunday School nor regular preaching. A well-known and very reliable minister of the Gospel tells me that in visiting that section of the country, he was at the house of a married woman whom he had known in her girlhood. She told him she had not heard a sermon since she moved to that community eleven years ago! For her own sake, and for the sake of her children, she was anxious to have a Sunday School organized which they may attend. It is my purpose soon to explore that portion of the country, preach to the people, visit them from house to house, and plant as many Sunday Schools as may be needed."

Many persons have the impression that this frontier work, among scattered farm communities, poor people and sod houses, is a simple matter. This is a great mistake. While deep points in theology, Greek and Hebrew are all but useless, a wide range of ability is essential to success. The missionary must be ready at any moment to address, interest and instruct any kind of a congregation—children, cowboys, cultured church-going town people, or others. Frequently on Sunday he drives from ten to thirty miles, addressing three meetings, no two congregations alike. Not only this, but usually he can know little or nothing of what his audience will be till he faces them from the platform. The missionary needs, besides a vast fund of information, tact, readiness for any emergency and grace. These accomplishments must be rapidly and constantly portable by plain, dirt or mud roads, in all kinds of weather, hot winds or blizzards, drouth or flood. Twenty, thirty or forty miles a day in blazing sun, snowstorm or mud is not a trifle, but appointments must frequently be made weeks in advance, and kept if at all possible. Heroes for God indeed are these missionaries and humble followers on the frontier.

Contributions for the continuance of this work during the remainder of the present season are greatly needed. Already many of our readers who have taken an active interest in Mr. Sharp's missionary labors have forwarded their offerings, and nearly $500 of a total of $700 required have been received and acknowledged, leaving a balance of about $200 necessary for the support of the work. We trust that others among our readers, who have the spiritual welfare of the unevangelized little ones of the Southwest at heart, will also co-operate in this effort to introduce the Gospel, and raise the standard of salvation in those neglected districts.

"Marion Harland" off To the Holy Land.

The Famous Author to Study Home Life in Palestine For "Christian Herald" Readers. What She Expects to Do and to Write.

THERE is probably no woman in America at the present day so well known or so generally beloved as "Marion Harland," the graceful and brilliant author of many books that have endeared her name to English-speaking people everywhere and made it a household word throughout the Union. Mrs. Mary Virginia Terhune (as she is in private life) sailed last week in the steamship New York for London, whence she will proceed to the East, to undertake a task such as no American woman has yet attempted. It is a journey that calls for singular courage and high ability as essential to success, and "Marion Harland" fortunately possesses both.

"MARION HARLAND" (MRS. M. V. TERHUNE),
The Famous Author, now on her way to Palestine for "The Christian Herald."

From London she will go to Scotland for a few days, and then to Paris, Florence, Rome and Naples. From Brindisi she goes by steamer to Alexandria, and thence to Jaffa, by the way of the Red Sea. From that city, under the escort of David Jamal, the most famous of Syrian dragomen, who was the guide of Dean Stanley, the Duke of Edinburgh and Dr. Talmage in Palestine, she will set out on a tour of the Holy Land. Discarding conventional routes, and unaccompanied by any attendants other than her son, Albert Payson Terhune (a student of twenty), her dragoman and her maid, she will journey camel-back across the valleys and along the mountain slopes of Palestine, halting at every point of interest, and gaining an insight into the life and customs of the people by actual observation and personal contact. Her time will be devoted not to visiting those places to which the great army of tourists and pilgrims constantly flock, and with which the writings of innumerable travelers have made everyone familiar, but rather in studying the home-life of the land that gave birth to the Saviour of men, and which in almost every respect is precisely the same to-day as when Jesus sojourned on earth.

Few pilgrims have set out with higher enthusiasm on a journey of 20,000 miles than "Marion Harland" has done. When, several weeks ago, it was suggested by the proprietor of this journal that she should go to the Holy Land and write her experience there for the benefit of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, she very heartily entered into the project, declaring that it had been "the dream of her life" to make such a journey. Among the many attractive topics which she will describe in her weekly letters to be published in these columns are: A Christmas at Bethlehem, a wedding at Cana, housekeeping in Bethany, a sail on Lake Galilee, a week in Nazareth, a funeral at Nain, a woman's life in Palestine from the day she is born to the day of her death. She will tell American mothers how Oriental housewives conduct their homes, and how their children are trained, cared for and educated. Bethlehem's pearl-workers, the harems and bazars of "Damascus the beautiful," gloomy Gethsemane, the Monks of Mar Saba (the oldest convent in the world), the lepers, beggars, fortune-tellers, musicians and slaves of the Orient, the Druse solitaries of Mount Carmel and the nomad Bedouins of the desert will all receive illumination from her gifted pen. Moreover, these letters will be doubly attractive, since they will be abundantly illustrated by photographs taken by the lady herself expressly for this paper.

Mrs. Mary Virginia Terhune, whose portrait appears on this page, is a native of Massachusetts, and the wife of Rev. Edward Payson Terhune, a Presbyterian clergyman. She is a most prolific and successful author and editor, and has achieved an international fame under the nom de plume of "Marion Harland." Her books are so well known that they hardly need recapitulation here, the principal works being "Miriam," "The Christmas Holly," "At Last," "Eve's Daughters," "Judith," "A Gallant Fight," "Our Daughters and What Shall We Do With Them?" and "Loitering in Pleasant Paths," besides which she has produced nearly a score of other volumes, all of an elevating and instructive character, the whole forming a list such as no other distinguished female author in America, and very few in Europe, have equalled either in graphic intensity of interest or quality of literary style. For several months prior to her departure for Palestine she was engaged in the preparation of a new and fascinating serial story for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, entitled "The Royal Road," the opening chapters of which will soon appear. It is a masterpiece of dramatic narrative and description and will possess a special interest for all who are striving to make progress in the Christian life.

THE CRUELTIES OF HEATHENISM

A VIVID description of an occurrence deplorably common in Central Africa and often without the mitigating circumstances of this case, appears in The Church at Home and Abroad. "One moonless night," says the writer, "the Angoni swooped down on the innocent Waronde and before morning swept the village of Kayume out of existence. A warrior posted himself at every door to slay every man and boy as they rushed out. The captives, consisting of some three hundred women and girls, were tied together and coopped up like sheep, while the warriors feasted on the stores of food and drink. When the news reached the African Lakes Company's fort of Karonga, three hours distant, two of the Scotch workmen organized a rescue party. The surprised Angoni, unable to escape with both the women and the booty, began to spear the crowd of helpless victims, and no small number were butchered before the rescuers were able to drive them off. The Angoni soon fled in confusion, and were pursued for a time by the Scotchmen who, however, soon returned to do what they could for the miserable captives. A few days afterward Dr. Cross, the Livingstonia medical missionary, reached the place to tend the wounded and dying. All the survivors had fled to the reeds on the lake shore, where they were starving. Led by one of them, the brave surgeon crawled for hours on hands and knees among the reeds, seeking the wounded where they lay. He dressed the wounds of forty-seven who yet survived. One man had seventeen spear wounds; a child of two year shad seven. Numbers of young girls, and even infants at the breast, had two or three spear wounds. The list of the dead consisted of twenty-nine men, about a hundred women, thirty-two girls, and sixteen boys, while the Angoni raiders lost thirty dead and carried off their wounded."

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE

In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for anyone of these departments should never contain matters of interest to any other department:

Subscription Department in which only new subscriptions or renewals are handled.

Address Department where all changes or rectifications of name, address or date are made.

Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention.

Communications to two or three departments, each written on a separate sheet, may be enclosed in one envelope, but each separate sheet should have reference only to one of these departments.

BACK FROM AFRICA

Mr. Julius Abroe, of Perkins, Iowa, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the Sessions family, who a little over a year ago went to Africa to found a mission on the Congo, have returned to the United States. Myrtle Perry, who was with them in the "Dark Continent," has also returned, and is at the home of her parents. Two members of the family lie buried on the banks of the African river, victims of the fatal fever peculiar to that country.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF SEXTONS.

A SEXTON, like a poet, is born. A church, in order to peace and success, needs the right kind of a man at the prow, and the right kind at the stern—that is, a good minister and a good sexton. So far as we have observed, there are various kinds. The fidgety sexton. He is never still. His being in any one place proves to him that he ought to be in some other. In the most intense part of the service, every ear alert to the truth, the minister at the very climax of his subject, the fidgety official starts up the aisle. The whole congregation instantly turn from the consideration of judgment and eternity to see what the sexton wants. The minister looks, the elders look, the people get up in the gallery to look. It is left in universal doubt as to why the sexton frisked about at just that moment. He must have seen a fly on the opposite side of the church wall that needed to be driven off before it spoiled the fresco, or he may have suspicion that a rat-terrier is in one of the pews by the pulpit, from the fact that he saw two or three children laughing. Now, there is nothing more perplexing than a dog-chase during religious service. Give my love to the sexton, and tell him never to chase a dog in religious service. Better let it alone.

The lazy sexton does not lead the stranger to the pew, but goes a little way on the aisle, and points, saying, "Out yonder!" You leave the photograph of your back in the dust of the seat you occupy; the air is in an atmospheric hash of what was left over last Sunday. Lack of oxygen will dull the best sermon, and clip the wings of gladdest song, and stupefy an audience. People go out from the poisoned air of our churches to die of pneumonia. What a sin, when there is so much fresh air, to let people perish for lack of it! The churches are the worst ventilated buildings on the continent. No amount of grace can make stale air sacred. "The prince of the power of the air" wants nothing but poisoned air for the churches. After audiences have assembled, and their cheeks are flushed, and their respiration has become painful, it is too late to change it. Open a window or door now, [illegible] man's bald head, and the back of the neck of that delicate woman, and you send off hundreds of people coughing and sneezing. One reason why the Sabbaths are so wide apart is that every church building may have six days of atmospheric purification.

The good sexton is the minister's blessing, the church's joy, a harbinger of the millennium. People come to church to have him help them up the aisle. He wears slippers. He stands or sits at the end of the church during an impressive discourse, and feels that, though he did not furnish the ideas, he at least furnished the wind necessary in preaching it. He has a quick nostril to detect unconsecrated odors, and puts the man who eats garlic on the back seat in the corner. He does not regulate the heat by a broken thermometer, minus the mercury. He has the window-blinds arranged just right—the light not too glaring so as to show the freckles, nor too dark so as to cast a gloom, but a subdued light that makes the plainest face attractive. He rings the bell merrily for Christmas festival, and tolls it sadly for the departed. He has real pity for the bereaved in whose house he goes for the purpose of burying their dead—not giving by cold, professional manner the impression that his sympathy for the troubled is overpowered by the joy that he has in selling another coffin. He forgets not his own soul; and though his place is to stand at the door of the ark, it is surely inside of it. After a while, a Sabbath comes when everything is wrong in church; the air is impure, the furnaces fail in their work, and the eyes of the people are blinded with an unpleasant glare. Everybody asks, "Where is our old sexton?" Alas! he will never come again. He has gone to join Obed-edom and Berechiah, the doorkeepers of the ancient ark. He will never again take the dusting-whisk from the closet under the church stairs, for it is now with him "Dust to dust."

DO GOOD NOW.

THE prospect of a reformation in the next world is more improbable than a reformation here. In this world, life starts with innocence of infancy. Surely, it is easier to build a ship out of new timber than out of an old hulk that has been ground up in the breakers. If with innocence to start with in this life a man does not become godly, what prospect is there that in the next world, starting with sin, there would be a seraph evoluted? The sculptor has more prospect of making a fine statue out of a block of pure white Parian marble, than out of an old black rock seamed and cracked with the storms of a half century. Surely upon a clean, white sheet of paper it is easier to write a deed or a will than upon a sheet of paper all scribbled and blotted and torn from top to bottom. Yet men seem to think that, though the life that began here comparatively perfect turned out badly, the next life will succeed, though it starts with a dead failure.

Do you know what made the ancient deluge a necessity? It was the longevity of the antediluvians. They were worse in the second century of their lifetime than in the first hundred years, and still worse in the third century, and still worse all the way on to seven, eight, and nine hundred years, and the earth had to be washed, and scrubbed, and soaked, and anchored, clear out of sight, for more than a month before it could be made fit for decent people to live in. Longevity never cures impenitency. All the pictures of Time represent him with a scythe to cut, but we never saw any picture of Time with a case of medicines to heal. Seneca says that Nero for the first five years of his public life was set up for an example of clemency and kindness, but his path all the way descended until at sixty-eight he became a suicide. If eight hundred years did not make antediluvians any better, but only made them worse, the ages of eternity could have no effect except prolongation of depravity.

If, after the Gospel ship has lain at anchor before our eyes for years and years, and all the benign voices of earth and heaven have urged us to get on board, as she might sail away at any moment, and after awhile she sails away without us, is it common sense to expect her to come back? You might as well go out on the Highlands at Neversink and call to the New York after she has been three days out, and expect her to return, as to call back an opportunity for heaven when it once has sped away. All heaven offered as a gratuity, and for a life-time we refuse to take it, and then rush on the bosses of Jehovah's buckler demanding another chance. There ought to be, there can be, there will be no such thing as posthumous opportunity. Thus, our common-sense agrees with my text—"If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

I. M. Welch, Benton, Kan. "In reply to the question of 'Subscriber,' Farmingham, Mass: It was at the battle of Pittsburg Landing, Tenn., that 'ten thousand soldiers lay under the river banks and let the other soldiers do the fighting,' April 6th and 7th, 1862. Most of them, however, were got into line during the night of the 6th and morning of the 7th, and did good service on the 7th."

William T. Brady, Highwoods. What was the meaning of "S.P.Q.R." on the Roman standards?

They were the initials of the words "Senatus Populus Qui Romanus" (The Senate and People of Rome), and were adopted on the standards shortly after Rome became a Republic.

Mrs. M. L. Herndon, Silver Hill, Mo. Will you or any of your readers please tell me who the missionary was who visited the little boy spoken of in the verses beginning:

Into the tent where a gipsy boy lay,
Dying alone at the close of the day,
News of salvation we carried—said he
"Nobody ever has told it to me."

Subscriber, Rogersville, O. Is it a sin to have the fortune told?

Sorcery, witchcraft, enchantment and divination are classed in Scripture as among the forbidden indulgences. See Jer. 27: 9; Rev. 21: 8; Deut. 18: 10; Ezek. 23: 23; and other similar passages. Our duty lies in the present. The future belongs to God alone.

John H. Oliphant, Birmingham, N. J. What kind of a mark did the Lord put upon Cain?

The words have been interpreted as meaning that the Lord "gave a sign" to Cain, very much as signs were given to Noah later. The nature of the sign or mark is uncertain. It may have been recognized by Cain alone, or may have been visible to others.

H. M. Waller, Williamsburg, Va. Does Luke 20: 34-38 teach that only the righteous are raised from the dead?

It teaches the same truth that is taught in Rev. 20: 5, 6 and other passages, that there is to be a resurrection from among the dead which will take place a thousand years before the general resurrection. The seer said that it would be the privilege of the blessed and holy to be among those thus raised, and Paul expresses the hope that he would be accounted worthy to attain it. (Phil. 3: 11.)

John Gurner, Longville, Mass. What is meant in 1. Corinthians 3. 15, by suffering loss and being saved by fire?

That the man whose work was not of genuine character, who had been seeking worldly gain and popularity and not trying to win and build up souls, would lose the reward that Paul had been speaking of, which would be given to the preacher who built on the foundation of Christ, "gold, silver, and precious stones." This man's work he likens to wood and stubble which would not stand the day of judgment. His soul would be saved, but he would miss the reward promised to the faithful worker.

Charles W. Stone, Nuevo, Cal. 1. Is the idea that this earth is to be the abode of the saved throughout eternity taught in Ezekiel 37: 25; Rev. 5: 10, etc? 2. What is meant by the words in 1. Timothy 4: 10: "Saviour of all men especially of them that believe"?

1. The passage in Ezekiel is generally understood as promising a perpetual kingdom in the same way as the word forever might be used now, when we speak of some substantial structure as being built to last forever. The passage in Revelation refers to the millennium when Christ will reign for a thousand years. While many have inferred from certain passages of Scripture that the world will after being purified by fire become the abode of the saved, it is nowhere directly stated that it will be so. It may be; but the question is merely speculative. 2. That God's love goes out to all men, preserving them and sustaining life and that he is ready to save all eternally who seek salvation; but he is especially a Saviour to those who believe in Christ to eternal life. It is as though you spoke of some clergyman as being the pastor of his congregation but especially the pastor of the members of his church.

J. Pressley Barrett, Norfolk Va. Is the Christ of God able to cleanse us, but unable to keep us from sin? etc.

God does not deal with us as automatons. That he could keep us from committing sin, no one disputes; but as a matter of fact, he does not. The man does not live who does not commit sin. If he is a child of God he deplores it, repents of it, and strives to keep from it in the future, and beseeches God to keep him from falling. Sometimes he is brought to this condition by God's discipline: God interferes to prevent him continuing in sin and brings him back to himself by a road of sorrow and suffering. No child of God will say, "May I commit a sin a day or one sin an hour?" He will be anxious to avoid it and not to regard it as a privilege.

E. R. McGregor, Aurora, Mo. 1. Why was the Jew allowed to sell food to an alien that he was forbidden to eat himself as mentioned Deut. 14: 21? 2. How did the king of Babylon know that the being he saw in the furnace looked like the Son of God? 3. Was your answer about Spitzbergen's longest day on Sept. 6, correct? 4. Can a person join the Epworth League if he is an active member of a Christian Endeavor or B. Y. P. U?

1. The dietary laws applied to the Jews only. Aliens not being under the law might eat such food. As they had not the privilege of the Jews, they were free from the restrictions of the Jews. 2. He probably used the words as expressive of majesty and glory superhuman. 3. No. By a compositor's error, which escaped detection, the word hours was printed as months. 4. We are not sure that he would be eligible, but in any case, active membership in one such society is sufficient for anyone. A division of energy generally involves waste. He would do well either to be satisfied with his active membership, or resign it before joining another society.

Mrs. Henrietta E. Young, Salt Point, N. Y. Below is a leaflet concerning which I desire information. About what time could Napoleon have taken those MSS.?

> The following epistle was taken by Napoleon from the public records of Rome, when he deprived that city of so many valuable manuscripts. It purports to have been written at the time and on the spot where Jesus Christ commenced his ministry, by Publius Lentellus, the Governor of Judea, to the Senate of Rome, Cæsar Emperor. It was the custom in those days for the Governor to write home any event of importance that transpired while he held office:
> "CONSTANT FATHERS:—There appeared in these old days a man named Jesus Christ, who is yet living among us, and of the Gentiles is accepted as a prophet of great truth; but his own disciples call him the Son of God. He hath raised the dead, cured all manner of diseases. He is a man of stature somewhat tall and comely, with a very ruddy countenance, such as a beholder may both love and fear. His hair is the color of the filbert when fully ripe plain to the ears, whence downward it is more orient of color, curling and waving about his shoulders; in the middle of his head there is a seam or partition of long hair, after the manner of the Nazarites. His forehead is plain and delicate; his face without spot or wrinkle; beautified by a comely red; his nose and mouth are exactly formed; his beard is the color of his hair, and thick, not of any great length, but forked. In reproving he is terrible; in admonishing courteous; in speaking, very modest and wise; proportion of body, well shaped. None have seen him laugh, but many have seen him weep. A man for his surpassing beauty, excelling the children of man."

The story is apocryphal; there is no well-authenticated evidence that any such MS. ever existed among the public records of Rome.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE MENACED GARRISON.

OMINOUS news comes from Mashonaland, Africa, of the advancing horde of Matabeles upon the little garrison of Fort Victoria. The origin of the trouble, and the character of the Matabele assailants were described in this journal on September 27. Later news confirms the reports then received as to the gravity of the situation. A force estimated at fully ten thousand warriors, eager to win by slaughter their seats in the council of their nation, was marching toward Fort Victoria. They were evidently intending to massacre its defenders. No such numbers and no such equipment as they have would be needed for one of their customary raids on the Mashonas. The garrison of the Fort has been reinforced by all the troops that could be spared from Cape Colony, and now numbers about seven hundred men. Two regiments, under the command of Sir Frederick Carrington, have been sent out from England to the help of the garrison, which will raise the number to nearly three thousand; but it is unlikely that they will reach the field of action in time to take part in the first engagement.

Dr. Jameson, who is in charge of the defence, pending the arrival of Colonel Carrington, is reported to be a shrewd, capable man who knows the country and people thoroughly. He believes that the fort can be defended against open attack, even by so large a force as the Matabeles are sending against it, providing the enemy will fight in the open. The Maxim guns in the fort will do deadly execution on the Matabeles armed only with assegais. Experience has proved, however, that the Zulus, of whom the Matabeles are the most warlike branch, are too shrewd to make a direct attack, and that they are more likely to quietly surround the fort and attack it secretly. They are adepts at night surprises and will probably endeavor to set it on fire. Acute suspense is felt in South Africa and news is anxiously awaited. It is stated that the native tribes, including the Zulus, are in hearty sympathy with the garrison of the fort, all of them having at one time or another suffered at the hands of the Matabeles, who live wholly by war and robbery. They have steadily resisted all attempts to do missionary work among them, so that there is no hope of a peaceful solution of the trouble. To them more than any other people the wise king's words apply, "Even the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." (Prov. 12: 10).

THE GARRISON OF FORT VICTORIA AWAITING THE ATTACK OF THE MATABELES.

A Dangerous Associate.

A lady who has had a painful experience with sickness in her family, was walking in Central Park, New York, a few days ago, when her attention was arrested by the appearance of a man, whose face was disfigured by unsightly blotches, sitting on a seat near the entrance. A nurse girl was sitting on the same seat, with an infant in her arms and several children were playing around. The lady felt convinced from the man's appearance that he was suffering from small-pox in its early stage, and she was horrified at the danger those about him were were incurring. She beckoned them away, but could not make them understand their peril. Then she went to the entrance to the park to await the passing of some vehicle that looked like a doctor's carriage. One soon came in sight and she hailed it and was glad to find that its occupant was a physician. She told him her suspicions and he drove past the suspected man. He at once pronounced the case one of small-pox and bade the policeman on the beat call an ambulance, in which the patient was taken to the receiving hospital. He said that he did not know what his disease was, but had felt sick for some days and had that morning gone to a hospital for treatment, but as it would not be open for the examination of patients for two hours, he went to the park to pass away the time. He was guiltless of any intention of imperilling the health of others and the children did not realize their danger, but the mischief may have been done, all the same. It is so with the moral lepers that are to be found in society. Mere association of the morally corrupt with the innocent and unsuspicious often works injury to the latter, though on neither side is any evil intent. As the Apostle warns us, "Evil company corrupts good manners." (1.Cor. 15: 33, R. V.)

Arrested at the Prison Gate.

A much disappointed man was admitted to prison at Avon, N.Y., on Oct. 11. Two years ago he was arrested for murder and was tried and convicted. He was sentenced to imprisonment for life. He has served since that time in the prison at Auburn, N.Y. Recently he learned that efforts were being made to secure his pardon. A few days afterward, to his intense delight, he was called to the warden's room and informed that Governor Flower had signed his pardon and he was at liberty to depart. He lost no time in availing himself of the permission, but as he emerged from the prison gates, his countenance beaming with joy, he was confronted with a sheriff. The officer had heard of the pardon being signed, and remembered that he had a warrant against the man for burglary committed about the same time as the murder. It had never been served, as the man had already been sentenced to imprisonment for life. Now, however, that he was about to be released, the sheriff determined to act upon the warrant, and the man was arrested and committed for trial. His disappointment was pitiable, as he had been so greatly elated by his release. No such calamity can happen to those whom God forgives for Christ's sake. Although the pardoned man laments and deplores the sins of his past, he has full assurance that all his sins are blotted out by the blood of Christ. (Rom. 8: 33.)

The Telephone at Sea.

The welcome news is published that the Lighthouse Board has succeeded in its efforts to connect lighthouses and light ships with the life-saving stations by telephone. For several years experiments have been carried on under directions of the Board with this object, but until now, without success. The details of the plan which has accomplished the object have not yet been communicated to the press, but it is known that the core of the telephone wire is to be attached to the iron cable which holds the ship to its anchors and thus a circuit is established. It is believed that the discovery of the system will save many lives and many thousands of dollars worth of property every year. The chief benefit is expected to be attained at Nantucket Shoals, where so many wrecks have taken place, that they have been called "the graveyard of American shipping." The lightship there, is thirty miles from shore, but the Board expects no difficulty in establishing telephonic communication with it. If this can be done, many ships may be saved from wreck, for vessels are often seen from the lightship to be in danger, a long time before the actual catastrophe occurs. The men on the lightship can do nothing themselves to avert the catastrophe, but if they are provided with a telephone they can telephone to the life-saving station from which relief-vessels can be sent in aid of the imperilled vessel in time to save her from wreck. Perhaps some moral and spiritual wrecks might be averted, if a similar effort was made by those who first perceive the impending danger. Sometimes it is beyond the power of man to afford succor, but God's ear is ever open to appeals for help in such cases. (1.Samuel 12: 23).

A Lost Identity.

A mysterious disappearance which has puzzled a Kansas community for three years has just been discovered, but not accounted for. It was that of a wealthy man who had lived for many years at El Dorado. The Kansas City Star says that he owned several farms and had a fortune in bonds. He was County Treasurer and had served several terms. His sole amusement was fishing, of which he was very fond. Whenever he felt the need of recreation, he would look up two political friends, whose influence, like his own, was potent in State affairs, and with them would go for a day's fishing on the Walnut River. Three years ago he told his wife and family he was going for a three weeks' camping trip. He put some cooking utensils into his wagon with a quantity of food, his tent, rifle and shot-gun, and drove away. He never returned. After four or five weeks an organized search which cost several thousands of dollars was made for him. It extended to the Flint Hills, twenty miles away, and all the surrounding district, but not the slightest trace of him was found. Advertisements fully describing him were published far and near, and from time to time answers were received from persons who thought they had seen him, but in every instance they were found to have been mistaken. After a year, all hope of seeing him again was abandoned. It was supposed that he had been murdered or accidentally killed. His estate was probated and his accounts were perfectly straight. He had held some very large sums in trust, but the amounts were all accounted for and properly invested. There was no trouble in settling the estate and the property was divided according to law. Nothing was heard of him until a few weeks ago. It is now learned that he went from El Dorado to Parsons, where he applied for work as a farm-hand. He was employed, and although he had done no manual labor for over twelve years, he gave perfect satisfaction. He labored hard and lived frugally. He read the accounts of his own disappearance, knew of the grief of his family and friends, and of the efforts being made to find him, but made no sign. Early this year his health began to fail and recently he became seriously ill. When informed, at last, that death was near, he revealed his identity and instructed his new friends to write to his wife, when he was dead, and tell her of the fact. This was done and she identified his remains, but has found no clue to his motive among his effects. The discovery only deepens the mystery. Why a man of wealth and position, apparently enjoying life, should lay aside riches and station to become a farm-hand is incomprehensible. All realize that whatever his motive may have been, it must have been a very strong one to have impelled him to so great a sacrifice. It is much to be wished that there was a similar appreciation of the depth of love and infinite compassion that must have filled the heart of Christ when he took upon him the form of a servant and became obedient unto death. (Phil. 2: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Bible has been translated into 187 of the leading languages, which are spoken by about 600,000,000 people, less than half of the population of the globe.

Mr. E. P. Telford has commenced his work in England with a special mission in Nottingham, to continue for three weeks. The Sunday services will be held in the Albert Hall, which holds 2,500 people, and it is proposed to hold the week-night meetings in the churches in several sections of the town.

Congregational ministers throughout the country are requested to make Sunday, Nov. 12, foreign missionary day, and appeal to their churches for funds to maintain and extend the work of the American Board in foreign lands.

At the recent meeting of the Board of managers of the American Bible Society, grants of Bibles and portions to the value of $1,048 were made. Some of these are for colportage work in Yucatan, Venezuela and Colombia. The issues from the Bible House last month aggregated 89,169 volumes.

At the recent meeting of the Friends of the Indian at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., it was stated as an evidence of the independence and thrift of the Indian, that nearly five hundred of the students of the Carlisle Seminary had visited the World's Fair, paying their expenses with money saved from their own earnings.

Dr. Benjamin Labaree the famous missionary to Persia who is now in New York, believes that the alarmist reports of danger to American missionaries in Persia which have appeared in the daily press are somewhat exaggerated. There is always danger to missionaries in that land from the lower classes, but the intelligent Moslems frown on any acts of violence.

At the meeting of the American Board at Worcester, Mass., it was decided to appoint Rev. W. R. Noyes as one of the Board's missionaries to Japan. Mr. Noyes is the missionary whose appointment was recently revoked by the Prudential Committee. The vote on the appointment stood 106 to 24. Dr. Joseph Cook, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, Dr. E. P. Goodwin and Dr. William E. Parke were among the most vigorous opponents of the appointment.

The advantages of advanced Normal study are engaging the attention of the Sunday School workers of New York. The State Executive Committee has taken up the subject, and through its committee on Normal study proposes to vigorously push this branch of work. Diplomas signed by the State officers will be issued to all who pass the required examination. Those desiring to enroll as candidates for diplomas and those seeking further information are invited to communicate with Timothy Hough, Syracuse, N. Y., or E. W. Hawley, 29 Park Row, New York City.

Dr. Charles L. Thompson, pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, emphatically denies the statements recently published that the church is in financial difficulties and will soon be sold. Dr. Thompson says that there is not the remotest thought of selling the church property and no cause for such a thought; the last year has been the most prosperous ever enjoyed by the church; the collections have been large, and the income would fully meet the expenses.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

SAVING FAITH.

Preached last Sunday morning, Oct. 22, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: Acts 16 : 30, 31: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved? . . . Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

THE question of the text was asked by the Philippian jailer, and the answer was given by Paul and Silas, who were his prisoners. The great earthquake which shook the old prison to its deep foundations shook also the stony heart of the stern jailer awakening his fears and leading him to cry out for help in his despair. His first thought is of suicide. Believing that his prisoners had escaped he was in despair, expecting that with his own life he must pay for his supposed neglect of duty. It is altogether likely that the apostle Paul heard his exclamation of alarm and of determination to resort to suicide. The apostles immediately called out, "Do thyself no harm, for we are all here." This command is evermore the blessed injunction of religion. It constantly enjoins men to do no harm to themselves by evil habit, by suicide or in any other way. Christianity is the true friend of every worthy interest of our race. The jailer now understands that his first fear was groundless; for he knows that not one prisoner has escaped although the doors of the prison are wide open. He knows now that the rigor of the Roman law cannot be inflicted on him, as all committed to his charge are in safety. But immediately his thoughts take an entirely new direction, and a still greater fear fills his troubled soul.

The Momentous Question.

Never was a more important question asked than the jailer's; never was a more precious answer given than that of the apostles. But plain as is this reply it is not easy for all men to understand its meaning. The plainest and highest things of life are often difficult of explanation. It is not easy to explain to a man born blind the splendor and glory of the sunlight. We may be sure that if ever there was a time when the apostle Paul wished to put a volume of meaning into one sentence it was at this moment; we may be sure that he has here given us the very marrow of the Gospel. Think of this strange scene. The darkness, confusion and dismay, the wild cry of the jailer, and the calm, sweet, divine answer of the apostles! This jailer is starving; the apostles give him the bread of life. He is consciously sinful; they tell him of an Almighty Saviour; he is dying; they offer him eternal life. Not a moment is to be lost on their part; they must give the truth in its plainest, simplest, and speediest form. What did the apostles mean by the command given to the jailer? They demand of him not "doing;" they insist upon simple faith or trust; faith in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. May God help my tongue to make very plain the answer to the jailer's question, and your hearts fully to receive the truth!

The Succinct Answer.

In the first place, let me call attention to the act of saving faith—"believe." Both in the Greek and in the English tongues this is a suggestive and beautiful word. Some have supposed, but perhaps incorrectly, that its English form was derived from the Gothic "belifian," and that it thus expresses the truth, the doctrine, the principle, by which a person lives, or according to which he conforms his entire life. The latter part of the word is closely connected with leave, lief and love; it suggests the idea of what is dear, pleasing or lovely. The combination of ideas shows that he who is truly believed is truly beloved. When we turn to the Word of God we are able to illustrate its meaning by reference to a number of important passages. We constantly see that the Apostles as well as the Lord repeat this word and emphasize the duty which it commands. They do not tell inquirers to pray, or to cherish good feelings, or to perform acts of devotion. They never advise them to wait for deeper conviction, or for the manifestation of greater penitence. They never tell them to go home to read the Bible, to meditate, or to pray; never to try to make themselves better; but they evermore command them at once, there and then to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Apostles here instructed the trembling jailer at once to commit his agitated and guilty soul to the keeping of the Lord Jesus Christ; and they practically assured him that upon his obedience would come complete safety. They assume that he would understand what he was to do, and they command him to do it immediately.

What Is Implied.

The command to believe in this case is substantially similar in the meaning to the command to repent, as it is given by John the Baptist and by our Lord. He who truly repents rightly believes; and he who rightly believes truly repents. All the graces of the Christian life are simultaneous in their origin; they are like the spokes of a wheel, all start at the same moment when the wheel as a whole moves. Believing is coming to Christ. Our blessed Lord invited all who labor and are heavy-laden to come unto him. Those who are unconscious of their burden and go with it to his feet, will find immediate and complete deliverance. If Christ were personally and literally in the next room you could only as the result of the decision of your will move your body so as to come into his presence; always the will must decide to go before the body can move. Christ is nearer to us at this moment than if he were in the next room, and they who are willing at this moment to yield themselves to the Lord Jesus as truly as if by their physical eyes they could look into his dear face. Believing is receiving Christ. We are distinctly told that "as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." Here believing and receiving are synonymous terms. Salvation is offered without money and without price. You have simply to open your heart and receive the Lord Jesus as your friend and Saviour. He comes to your heart's door. He says, "behold I stand at the door and knock." You have only to rise, draw back the bolt, and admit him as your guest. Do not keep him waiting longer; do not practically command him to depart. If you open the door he will come in and will sup with you and you with him, and he will go no more out forever. Taking him to your heart is receiving him, and receiving him is believing on him as your personal Saviour. In the believing heart he evermore dwells. It is his home, and there he becomes a blessed guest and soon a gracious host.

Reposing Confidence.

Believing is committing all to Christ; it is trusting him with the whole heart. The apostle Paul said, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him." You are about to start to the country for the summer. You have a few valuables which you cannot take with you, and you are afraid to leave them in your home. You, therefore, take them to the Safe Deposit Company's office. You have entire confidence in their trustworthiness. You write your name and the amount of value upon the package. You then give this package over into the hands of the proper representative of this company. You know it will now be safe. The reputation of the company is excellent, and their ability safely to keep all that is committed to them is unquestioned. Your act of committal is an act of trust in their integrity and ability. Jesus Christ is your Safe Deposit Company. You have a soul of inestimable value. It must live when time shall be no more, a soul priceless above rubies and diamonds, a soul for whose redemption Jesus Christ gave his life. He is able to keep it and he asks you to commit it at this moment into his hands. Here and now, in the presence of angels and God, by an act of whole-hearted trust, give him your immortal soul, commit to him all your interests of body, estate, and spirit for time and for eternity. Say just now in the quiet of your heart, "here, Lord Jesus, just as I am I commit myself to thee; wash me, cleanse me, make me thy child, and keep me in time and eternity—Amen." So doing you have committed your soul to the Lord Jesus, so doing you believe in Jesus Christ; and having so done you shall be saved here and hereafter.

Believing is looking—"looking away unto Jesus." We are reminded by this Scripture of the children of Israel in the wilderness when bitten by the fiery serpents. When Moses had placed the serpent of brass upon the pole the people were commanded to look, and so looking they were assured of life. This was a look of trust, of hope, of faith. It was the look which the suffering patient gives to the skillful physician; it was the look which the poor widow who is to be turned out of her humble home gives to the philanthropist who says, "my good woman, dry your tears, fear not the landlord, look to me for the money to pay your rent;" it is toward God, toward the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world. It is wonderful how simple is this command. Do you say, "but I cannot see?" Stop a moment; you are not asked to see; you are simply commanded to look. Mr. Spurgeon, in referring to this act as descriptive of his own conversion, reminds us that the command in our English tongue consists of only four letters, and two of them alike; look, look, look! Turn thine eyes, O dying Israelite, to this serpent of brass; turn your eyes, O sinner, now to Jesus Christ. You cannot see, but you can at least look, and, thank God, "there is life for a look."

Believing is trusting. Trust is only another and simpler form of the duty taught in the command to believe. Suppose that a man on this street promises to pay the rent of every one on this block who is unable to do it himself, and publishes this offer in the daily newspapers. You hear of it, and give a moment's thought to the kindness of heart which prompts the offer; but yon are able to pay your own rent, and the offer has very little personal relation to you. But misfortunes come, and you are unable to meet your obligations. You are about to be turned out of doors. You remember that kind offer. You go with much humiliation to the philanthropist who made it. You acknowlndge your poverty; you express your sorrow over your helpless condition. He instantly says, "you are just the man

For Whom This Offer Is Made.

Go home, have no further fear, trust me." The moment you exercise this trust your fears are removed; you have believed in him and you are saved from this trying experience and humiliating position. Your faith has saved you. Why cannot men exercise similar faith in God? They trust a human philanthropist. Why cannot they trust Almighty God, the everlasting Father and gracious Redeemer? So far as the act of the mind is concerned, the exercise of faith in God is similar to the exercise of faith in man.

Faith is putting your case into the care of Jesus Christ as your lawyer. The apostle John uses these words, "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." You have a perplexing difficulty with a neighbor. You try to manage it yourself. You become hopelessly entangled in the intricacies of the case. You take it to a skillful lawyer, and you put it entirely into his hands. You have committed it to him, you trust him, you believe in him. He is to be your advocate. Jesust Christ, the righteous, is now your advocate with God. Put the case of your soul with all its sinful entanglements, with all its moral defilements, into the hands of this mighty advocate. He has never lost a case; he never will lose a case. "He is able also to save them to the utmost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." He is an advocate who has identified himself with his client; his client's interests are his interests. He is also an advocate who is at home with the judge. In a real sense he is both advocate and judge. He is an advocate who knows and has met all the requirements of the law. Put your case at this moment into his hands; retain him as your advocate. "Retaining" Christ is believing on him.

The Great Physician.

Believing in Christ is trusting him as the patient trusts the skilful physician. You are lying helpless upon your bed of pain. By your side stands a physician who has wrought marvelous cures. He is a man of gracious presence. His very face is a benediction. There is soothing, there is healing in his touch. You cannot but trust him; you do trust him. You say to him, "Here I am, doctor, I give myself unreservedly into your professional care. I shall take whatever you prescribe, and I shall do whatever you command." You have trusted that physician; you have believed on that physician. How simple is this faith! You can trust an earthly physician. Will you refuse to trust the divine physician? Is not Christ the great Physician? Did he not heal the sick, give sight to the blind, and even raise the dead? Will any man be so cold and cruel as to refuse to trust Jesus Christ as the physician for his sinful soul, while he trusts earthly physicians for the cure of his diseased body? Look unto Jesus now for the recovery of your soul as you would to an earthly physician for the healing of your body. O that men with sin-sick souls the world over would commit them to the great Physician, the mighty healer, the loving Redeemer, Jesus Christ!

Reliance on Another.

Notice, the object of saving faith—"The Lord Jesus Christ." We are not to put our faith in anything in ourselves. The element which makes this faith saving faith, is the character of him on whom it rests. True faith is a going out of self; true faith says, "not having mine own righteousness." Self-righteousness is a broken reed on which no one can safely lean. Self-righteousness makes the righteousness of Christ of no avail. As well might a man attempt to quench his thirst with sand as to satisfy the upbraidings of an awakened conscience by his own good deeds. Our faith must not rest in "frames and feelings," and not in works of righteousnessness which we have done. True faith cries out evermore:

> Thou, O Christ, art all I want,
> More than all in thee I find.

If our own goodness apart from Christ Jesus could save us, then the Cross of Calvary was either an unspeakable blunder or an unpardonable cruelty. Saving faith is self-renunciation; it is the resting of the soul on the person of Jesus Christ.

Believing in Christ is more than believing in a system of religious doctrines; it is more than trust in any rites or ordinances of God's house. It is trust in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ; it is as a sovereign medicine, as a remedy for all the evils of sin. It is, in a word, faith in Christ himself. The soul in this act casts itself on Christ alone. It is more even than believing in the promise of Christ for salvation. It has been well said that "the promise is but the cabinet, Christ is the jewel in it which faith embraces; the promise is but the dish, Christ is the food in it which faith feeds on." Faith rejoices in the cross of Christ, but really its joy is in the Christ of the Cross. It rests on Christ crucified, Christ risen, Christ enthroned, Christ glorified. All who have ever been saved were saved by faith in Christ as a personal Saviour. This was the Gospel preached at Eden's gate. Then salvation came from faith in the coming Saviour. This was the Gospel preached to Abraham; he exercised faith in the Christ of promise, and that faith was counted to him for righteousness. The doctrine of a personal Saviour was set forth in all the types and shadows of the old dispensation. Jesus Christ was the substance behind every shadow. To believe on Christ is the substance behind every shadow. To believe on Christ is the grand command of the Gospel. He is the rock on which true believers must evermore rest. He is the theme of our most joyous songs on earth, and he will be the subject of our highest praises forever in heaven.

Immediate Results.

In the last place, we emphasize the result of genuine faith—"thou shalt be saved." This is a blessed result. The salvation offered by the apostles to the jailer was full and free; and not only to him, but to all the members of his household who believed in the Lord Jesus. This faith immediately brought forth fruit in the life of the jailer; it was not a dead but a living faith. It manifested itself in an act of obedience, the act of baptism. It showed itself in acts of kindness to the apostles, whom lately he had treated so cruelly. The same hour of the night he took them perhaps to a fountain or tank, posibly in the court of the house, ancient houses usually enclosed a rectangular reservoir called the "impluvium" for receiving the rain, and washed their stripes. His former cruelty is immediately changed into humanity and tenderness. His was an immediate salvation. As the night closed he was an unbelieving heathen; as the morning dawned he was a baptized Christian. The obedience of baptism followed immediately upon the obedience of faith. His was also a great salvation. This man had formerly been a hard and cruel officer. His government was not accustomed to select tender souls for such employment as his; usually such positions were given as rewards to old and heroic soldiers. In his intention he was at the moment a self-murderer; his hand was lifted against his own life; in intention his guilt was as great as if he were a suicide. But for the apostle's interposition the dagger in a moment more would have reached his heart; thus the hand of mercy stopped him at the door of doom. But great sinner as he was, Paul commanded him immediately to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Nothing is more certain than that if a man truly believes in Jesus Christ he shall be saved. With hooks stronger than steel God has joined faith and salvation; with hooks equally strong he has joined faith and its appropriate manifestations in good works, and what he has joined let no man put asunder. The Lord Jesus uttered these words in connection with the great commission, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Elsewhere in Scripture we hear the truth, "He that believeth is passed from death unto life;" "he that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." This life is not reserved for a distant future. It is a present possession, it is an immediate blessing, it is a personal bestowment.

The centuries pass. For nearly two thousand years the jailer at Philippi and Paul and Silas have been in heaven, but the sweet words spoken by the Apostles on that memorable night, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," are still on the page of the Bible, are still uttering themselves from many pulpits, and are still bringing the blessing of salvation to thousands of sin-sick souls. Thank God, these words will never lose their power; thank God, the way of salvation is still plain and simple; thank God, the offer is still without money and without price. Are you saved? Have you thus believed in Jesus Christ? If so, you are saved; if so, you can give God thanks for this great salvation. Blessed be his name, it is still true that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life.

There is life for a look at the Crucified One,
There is life at this moment for thee:
Then look, sinner, look unto him and be saved,
Unto him who was nailed to the tree.
Look! Look! Look and live!
There is life for a look at the Crucified One,
There is life at this moment for thee.

A CHINESE INDICTMENT.

It is often useful to learn how we appear in the eyes of foreigners. The following extract from a Chinese tract shows how they look upon the character of the people who send missionaries to them: "It is presumptuous in the barbarians to endeavor to improve the inhabitants of the Celestial Empire, inasmuch as they themselves stand so sorely in need of improvement. They have shown a lack of benevolence by importing among the Chinese a poisonous drug, and thus injuring others for the sake of personal gain. They have sent fleets and armies to bereave other nations of their possessions, to which they have absolutely no right; therefore they cannot lay claim to be regarded as upright. They allow men and women to associate together and to walk arm and arm in the streets; therefore they condemn themselves as falling short in a sense of propriety. By rejecting the ancient doctrines they have shown themselves to be possessed of little wisdom. Veracity appears to be the only good quality which they can in any measure boast of. Therefore, lacking as they do four of the five cardinal virtues, how should they be able to improve others? Besides, they have shown lack of reverence for the inventors of the art of printing by recklessly treading on printed paper, while others have spent much money to circulate books for the amelioration of the age. Moreover, these self-constituted exhorters of the world are void also of filial piety. They forget their ancestors as soon as they are dead, put them into simple boxes which are only an inch thick, and do not sacrifice to their souls; nay, they will not so much as burn a strip or two of gold foil for their future welfare. Finally, they admit persons that have the advantages of wealth and rank to office without examination, and do not leave open the way for the promotion of poor and the lowly born. On all these accounts these foreigners appear to be inferior to the Chinese, and, therefore, in no way competent to instruct them in better ways."

A FREE GIFT OF OLIVE WOOD.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, no two being of the same family, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

AFFLICTION.

GOD would never send you the darkness
If he felt you could bear the light;
But you would not cling to his guiding hand
If the way was always bright;
And you would not care to walk by faith
Could you always walk by sight.
'Tis true he has many an anguish,
For your sorrowful heart to bear;
Many a cruel thorn-crown
For your tired head to bear;
He knows how few would reach heaven at all
If pain did not guide them there.

So he sends you the blinding darkness
And the furnace of seven-fold heat;
'Tis the only way, believe me,
To keep you close to his feet;
For 'tis always so easy to wander
When our lives are glad and sweet.
Then nestle your hand in your Father's,
And sing, if you can, as you go;
Your song may cheer some one behind you
Whose courage is sinking low;
And, well, if your lips do quiver,
God will love you better so.

ONLY THEE.

JESUS, I cling to thee,
Be thou not far from me,
Saviour divine;
I am so weak and frail,
Thy power can never fail.
O, let that power prevail
To keep me thine.

Jesus, I cling to thee,
For I would holy be,
Pattern divine;
Thy image make me bear,
Likeness both near and clear:
Lord, lend a listening ear,
Form me as thine.

—REV. N. W. CONKLING.

BETTER THINGS.

BETTER sit at a master's feet
Than thrill a listening state;
Bettter suspect that thou art proud
Then be sure that thou art great.

Better to walk the realm unseen
Then watch the hour's event:
Better the "Well done" at the last
Then air with shoutings rent.

A MOMENTOUS YEAR.

A Date at which Various Lines of Prophetic Chronology Appear to Focalize *

MOST students of prophecy, if not all of them, tell us that by the expression, "time, times and half," we are to understand 360 years added to twice 360 years added to half 360 years, making a total of 1,260 years. If we could be sure of the correctness of this, we should be indeed among the wise who shall understand.

We are also taught by them that the words, "the holy people," we are to understand as meaning Daniel's people, the Jews. This last no ordinary reader of the Book of Daniel will dispute. It is equally beyond dispute to students of history that the last and most complete act in the scattering of the holy people took place when the Saracens captured Jerusalem in A.D. 637, since which time the Mohammedan desolation has been there set up, and the Jewish people have been excluded from the temple area and treated as strangers in their own city and land. If we could be sure that "time, times, and a half," meant 1,260 years, and that in A.D. 637 the scattering referred to in verse 7 took place, then without possibility of doubt the year A.D. 1897 would witness the end of all sorrow for the Jews and the long hoped-for return of our Lord Jesus Christ. The two events are inseparable according to the Scripture.

The signs of the coming of our Lord are to many persons so apparent that we may, I think, with profit follow out the suggestion that A.D. 1897 may possibly prove an important year in the history of God's holy people. Let us search in the revelations made to Daniel, where are found special references to the continuance and end of sorrows and desolations which had befallen and were to befall the holy people.

We have in Daniel 8, such a revelation. Not only is a vision recorded, but also its meaning, as given by the angel Gabriel. In verse 17 it is said, "At the time of the end shall be the vision"—that is, that the evils set forth as touching the Jews would continue right through to the end. In verses 13 and 14 the duration of time from the starting-point given in the vision to the end, when "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," is given as 2,300 days.

Now, as to what is meant by the "sanctuary being cleansed," can there be other than one answer? and that answer, that the holy people will then have restored to them the temple area, on which to worship Jehovah, and that their city, Jerusalem, and their country, Palestine, will be forever free from Gentile domination. The time given is 2,300 days.

The commencing date of the 2,300 days must be sought. All the world knows that the Turk holds Palestine now, also that the Russian would like to hold it next; but, however, that may be, we have God's word that at the end of 2,300 days from some starting-point shown in this vision, neither Turk, nor Russian, nor anyone but the holy people, and their brethren, the Ten Tribes will hold it.

What period of time, then, is intended by 2,300 days? If we accept what is allowed by all, students of prophecy, that a prophetic day is a year of actual time, then 2,300 days mean 2,300 years, and as these are Jewish matters, 2,300 Jewish years are equivalent to 2,231 of our years. Now, where in the vision can we reckon from? In verses 5–7 we read of the "he-goat" advancing upon and trampling down the ram of verses 3–4. In verses 20–21, we have the angel Gabriel explaining to Daniel what the "he-goat" and "ram" represent. The ram, "Media and Persia"; the rough goat, "Grecia." The great horn that is between the eyes of the goat is the first king.

Now turn to history, and find when the first king, Alexander I., entered upon his swift trampling down of Media and Persia. It was B.C. 334. Now reckon 2,300 Jewish years from this date, and we reach A.D. 1897! Can it be that the words of the Lord in Dan. 12: 7, "All these things shall be finished," coincide as to the time when, with the words of the "wonderful numberer" of chap. 8, "unto 2,300 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed?" Does it not appear so?

The reader will now say, Having begun by the three and a half times of chap. 12, as dating from A.D. 637 and ending 1897, then another three and a half times should date back from A.D. 637, and so give us a total of seven times and a starting-point for the head of gold. Well, so they do! From A.D. 1897 back seven times, or 2,520 years, we reach the year B.C. 624, the year of Nabopolasser, the father of Nebuchadnezzar. It was in the reign of this Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, that the seventy years of captivity began.

VICTORY THROUGH CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 5. I. Cor. 15: 57; I. John 5: 3-5.

IT is significant how frequently the Christian life is represented in the New Testament as a conflict. Attainment is to be gained by overcoming. Every advance is the result not so much of growth as of effort. This aspect of our position is confirmed by experience. Every man who aspires to spiritual attainment finds himself hindered, opposed and held back. On all hands there are obstacles, and within him there is some treacherous power that is in league with the enemy. Like Longfellow's youth, he bears on his banner the watchword Excelsior, and like him he is beset with allurements and discouragements. His first need, therefore, is for strength to resist and to overcome. This strength, the Apostle says, he gets by faith. He that overcometh is he that believeth. At first sight there appears no connection between faith and strength, faith and valor. Yet we recognize such a connection in other matters. The soldier who believes in the cause he fights for is certainly a better soldier than the mere machine. He bears hardships better and is not so soon demoralized as is his unintelligent comrade. It is so in the courts. The counsel who believes in the justice of his client's cause is not perfunctory in his pleadings, but puts into them the earnestness of conviction. That kind of faith we recognize and understand. We perceive how it gives inspiration and stimulus. In the Christian's faith, the faith that is to give him victory in his struggle, there is all this and more. It includes a channel through which superhuman strength is imparted. An eminent preacher compares it to the car-coupling which attaches the car to the motive power. It does not produce motion but it ensures motion. It connects with a force that overcomes inertia. Viewed in this light we see no limits to the power of a faith which brings man into connection with omnipotence. And we are encouraged all through the New Testament to take this view of it. Christ spoke of a faith that could remove mountains, and said that it was only faith like a grain of mustard-seed. "All things," he said on one occasion, "are possible to him that believeth." Faith, therefore, is not the useless thing that it might appear in this fierce conflict. With it the Christian may overcome the traitor within him and the foes outside of him. It enables him to overcome the numerous obstacles, the temptations, the insidious influences represented by "the world." It enables him to hold in subjection his lower nature, through which he is drawn aside and enslaved. It is the gate by which he enters Christ's kingdom in this world; it is the sustaining power which keeps him true to his Master, and it is at last the power that will make him victor over his last enemy. He is in union with One who vanquished that enemy and escaped from the bond that holds all. Into that dark stream of death he steps with confidence, trusting that the power which has given him the victory in former conflicts will be with him in this, and with all the more confidence because this enemy has already been vanquished by Him in whom he trusts.

THE SECRETARIES OF THE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

The two ladies, whose portraits adorn this page, are well-known by name and reputation to thousands of our readers and many of them have been brought into communication with them. In every part of our country and in many foreign lands are women and girls who [illegible] members number a quarter of a million is no sinecure. To the fact that in both the departments of the office the duties have been performed so efficiently, so courteously and with so much tact and gentleness, is chiefly due the maintenance of the close bond of union between distant circles, and the Central Council and the enthusiastic fidelity of all its members. Wherever else an unsympathetic temperament has exerted a chilling influence, and arrogance and conceit have wounded sensitive minds, in the Secretaries' office there has been no shadow of these faults. It is well for the Order that it has been so, for it is there that they would have done most mischief. The most obscure circles, as well as the most influential, have nowhere found sincere sympathy, prompt help and wise counsel more surely than by addressing the Secretaries of the King's Daughters.

Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson has been the General Secretary of the Order from the date of its organization. Her early experience as an educator in the higher ranks, before her marriage, made her acquainted with the most pressing needs of young women and with the difficulties they had to encounter. After the death of her husband her thoughts turned back to the interest of her early womanhood with the hope of helping her less fortunate sisters. Several charming works designed to enlist sympathy with working women issued from her pen. Of these the best known are Among the Thorns, Amber Star, The Fair Half Dozen and One Little Life. She was also associated with Edward Everett Hale in the editorial charge of his Magazine of Philanthropy. Another sphere of activity she found in the Presidency of the Woman's National Indian Association. She subsequently held an important office in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and was Secretary of the Woman's Branch of the American Bible Society. To one whose best thoughts and activities had thus been consecrated to the service of her country women the Order of the King's Daughters presented an opportunity for their exercise in an effective manner and it had her enthusiastic support from the beginning. To her skill as a writer and to her remarkable power of lucid and incisive expression, the Order is largely indebted for its extension in this and other lands and for the fidelity with which its numerous circles have adhered to the principles on which it was founded.

Mrs. I. C. Davis.
Corresponding Secretary of the King's Daughters.

Mrs. Isabella Charles Davis has held the office of Corresponding Secretary since 1889. Prior to that time she had taken a deep interest in other fields of Christian work. The cause of Foreign Missions found in her an able and devoted advocate. By her thrilling eloquence and the subtle, sympathetic power to which we give the name of magnetism, numbers of her sisters in many States were moved to give and to work for the propagation of the Gospel in heathen lands and to feel that active sympathy with women whose lives are dark and joyless, which prompts them to send to them the good news of salvation. Besides this work Mrs. Davis engaged in missionary work of another kind at home. The working girls of the cities found in her a loving friend. As the head of an organization of their own, they confided in her in their difficulties and sent to her in their sicknesses and sorrows, and never appealed to her in vain. Such material help as it was in her power to give was freely given; in any case, kindly sympathy and sensible advice were always afforded. The experience Mrs. Davis had in both these spheres of labor fitted her for the responsible office which she now fills. It gave her the insight into human nature and the inexhaustible charity which never faileth, suffereth long, and is kind.

AN EPWORTH LEAGUE REVIVAL.

Pastors throughout the country are making the discovery that when they have an Epworth League in their churches they have the most effectual means of preparing the church for the Holy Spirit's work, and for taking care of the converts. One remarkable illustration is given by Rev. J. B. Holloway, of Covina, Cal., in a communication to the Epworth Herald. He says that in a church in Southern California there was an earnest desire for a revival, but in the circumstances of the church it was impossible to secure the services of an evangelist. He spoke to the Epworth League on the subject and found its members ready to help. They practised the singing of special revival music and in a few days were prepared for service. The meetings began, and for several evenings were given up to singing and prayer. On the following Sunday the pastor preached earnest soul-stirring, sermons, and in the evening many rose for prayer. After that day, the revival spirit was in force and the Epworth Leaguers were actively engaged in directing anxious souls to Christ. There were many conversions. One of them is a specimen of others. A young man, of whom few had any hopes, was surrounded one night after most of the people were already gone home, by three or four of the young people and urged to then and there give his heart to the Lord. He at first tried to treat the matter lightly, but they were not to be bluffed, so at the first opportunity he slipped out. All the congregation, even the pastor, had by this time gone except these few faithful leaguers. When the young man had gone but a few yards from the church, he turned to a companion who was walking pensively by his side, and said: "Jack, what do you think of this, anyhow?" "I believe it's all right," replied Jack. At this the young man turned suddenly, and laying his hand upon Jack's arm, said hurriedly, "Let's go back;" and suiting the action to the word, he returned and called to his besiegers, who were now starting away, to "come back." He led the way directly to the altar and, falling upon his knees, pleaded for salvation. When the news went abroad that he was converted, like the disciples of old, some of the people "believed not for joy," and "some doubted." On the following evening at the testimony service he arose and told how these Epworthian workers had besieged him on the previous evening, and even after he thought he had given them the slip and had started to go to the saloon he felt himself mysteriously impelled to return and surrender. This is only one testimony out of many to the valne of the Epworth League in such emergencies. Pastors of churches of other denominations have the same story to tell of their young peoples' societies.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The members of the Epworth League of St. Louis, Mo., are paying the expenses of one of their number who is receiving training for the work of a missionary.

At a convention of the Baptist Young People's Unions of West Virginia, at Charleston on October 10, a State Union was organized. Mr. D. L. Jamison, of Parkersburg, was elected President.

The Young Men's Christian Association in London holds a meeting every Wednesday for an hour at mid-day at its central rooms for business men. The meetings are largely attended and much appreciated.

A Volunteer Circle of the Christian Endeavor Missionary Institute has been formed in Chicago, consisting of all Student Volunteers belonging to the Chicago Union, and of all mission workers who cannot go into the foreign field.

The Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Societies held their annual convention at Reading this year. It was necessary, owing to the enormous number of delegates, to hold meetings simultaneously in the Presbyterian Church and the Metropolitan Hall.

The Maine state Epworth League held its first convention at Auburn. The following officers were elected: President, Rev. E. O. Thayer, Lewiston; Vice-President, Mrs. E. A Cobb, Biddeford; Secretary, Miss Carrie E. Miller, Lewiston; Treasurer, Mr. A. D. Russell, Augusta.

The second annual convention of the B. Y. P. U. of Connecticut was held at Danbury, October 16th and 17th, in connection with the meeting of the State convention. The programme included addresses by Rev. Messrs. E. M. Poteat, J. T. Dickinson, F. M. Hungate, J. B. Lemon, and J. D. Herr, D.D.

The calendar for the season of the City of London Young Men's Christian Association includes forty-nine evening classes for young men. The list includes languages (ancient and modern), all the ordinary subjects of a commercial education (amongst which a course of lectures by a barrister on mercantile law holds a prominent place), Civil Service classes, St. John's ambulance and gymnastics.

This is the testimony of an English pastor as to his experience with the Christian Endeavor Society connected with his church: "I have never asked an Endeavorer to do anything that he refused to do. I have asked them to call on strangers, and they have done it; to sit up with the dying, and they have done it; to call on the sick, and they have made over a thousand calls on sick people in hospitals and out."

The New Jersey Societies of Christian Endeavor held their annual convention at Trenton. President F. E. Clark attended and delivered an earnest address. Among the other speakers were Dr. John L. Scudder, of Jersey City; Rev. S. J. McDowell, of Friesburg; Rev. Judson Conklin, of Trenton; Ex-Postmaster General Wanamaker and Miss Clara Littell. The delegates present numbered fully fifteen hundred. The officers were re-elected.

Rev. C. E. Boult, of the Mariners' Temple, New York, speaks in the highest terms of the value of Floating Societies of Christian Endeavor in the work among seamen. He says: "We have on the roll fifty-six active members. Good work has already been done by these sailors, on the streets and on shipboard The C. E. badge, worn conspicuously, is a testimony that the wearer is a Christ-man, and is not ashamed of it. Then the pledge and card of introduction, which the sailor Endeavorer carries with him, and presents to the Christian Endeavor society in any port he arrives at, accords to him a ready recognition and a hearty welcome; this is most helpful to one, who otherwise would feel a stranger in a strange land.'

The Family and Home Circle

Java at the World's Fair.

A Diminutive But Interesting People, Who Suffer In Our Changeful Climate.—Their Industrious Habits, Dress and Customs.

NEAR the Samoans and only a little distance off from the German Village at the Chicago Exposition, is the Java Village, in which the visitor finds specimens of the smallest and most effeminate-looking race to be seen at the Fair. They are physically greatly inferior to the tall Arabs, the powerfully built Dahomeyans, Soudanese and the South Sea Islanders, and contrasted with most of the other foreigners in the various villages, they look like pygmies. They are an inquisitive little people with bright, beady, twinkling eyes that are ever on the watch. Industrious and painstaking, they set an excellent example to some of the other villages at the fair, whose occupants seem to have no better way of spending the time than loitering around idly and gazing at strangers. The Javanese, on the other hand, have been intelligently busy every moment since their arrival. Their buildings—skilfully very constructed straw huts which are the admiration of the Western people—are models of ingenuity and rude decoration. Several of these queer-looking dwellings are shown in the illustrations on this page, by our special artist. The grounds are gracefully ornamented with palm-trees. One of the illustrations shows a tasteful pavilion of reeds and plaited grass; another represents the peculiar-shaped, wooden carriage with its clumsy wheels and odd decorations, which are seen everywhere in Java. A couple of nimble-fingered Javanese weavers, working upon floor-mats and table spreads, are seen in a third panel, while the fourth shows a group of musicians, one of whom is making music by tapping metal blocks with mallets, while the other plays on an instrument that seems a modification of the violin. All the Javanese are exceedingly fond of music.

These merry little people find it difficult to keep well in our trying climate and several have already succumbed to lung diseases. One of the inhabitants of the village is a captive ourang-outang, a huge Sumatran ape, whose antics afford much amusement. Java should not be confounded with some eastern countries that have never enjoyed any form of civilization. It has passed through many remarkable vicissitudes and its history teems with bygone splendor, while its magnificent temples, with their wealth of carving, show that its people had at one time attained great progress in the arts. Java is a country of great natural beauty and fertility and is a perpetual source of wealth to Holland which claims its allegiance. The population is estimated at about 19,000,000. Gospel work has been in active progress among the Javanese for a number of years. When the Christian missionaries first entered the country they encountered much persecution from the Mohammedan rulers and people, until the Dutch Government interfered. Now all this changed, and the prospects for missionary work are cheering. Christian missions of various denominations now have 53 churches with large and growing memberships in four of the Java residencies.

Look at the Best Side.

There is a moral in this little incident that may be helpful to people who are apt to look at the worst side of things: A Christian lady had moved into a new flat. It was not conspicuous for its cheerful surroundings nor for its pleasant outlook. The average woman would have found there a commonplace shelter from the snow of winter and the rains of summer. A lady friend called, and was asked by the cheerful housewife to note the pleasant outlook from the parlor windows. "Yes," said the visitor, "I see a remarkably fine lot of chimneys." "Chimneys!" exclaimed the housewife, "why I never saw any chimneys before. I looked over the chimneys, and saw those magnificent trees that form the line on the horizon. I thought only of the trees and the sunsets."

And so she goes along through life, with eyes closed to chimneys and dingy roofs, but wide open to drink in all that is good. If the trees are in leaf, or if the leaves have been scattered by the wind, there is beauty in the old elms that sway in the gales beneath her window, bearing the raindrops or the snowflakes or radiant with the sunshine. Her cheerfulness is infectious; it fills her home and the lives of her companions.

A Good Bible Reminder.

Young people who are apt to forget the order of the books of the Bible might commit the following to memory with advantage:

The great Jehovah speaks to us
In Genesis and Exodus;
Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy:
Joshua and Judges sway the land;
Ruth gleans her sheaf with trembling hand,
Samuel and numerous Kings appear,
Whose Chronicles we wondering hear;
Ezra and Nehemiah now;
Esther and beauteous mourner show;
Job speaks in sighs, David in Psalms,
And Proverbs teach to scatter alms;
Ecclesiastes then comes on
And the sweet Song of Solomon;
Isaiah, Jeremiah then
With Lamentations takes his pen;
Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea's lyre
Sweet Joel, Amos, Obadiah,
Next Jonah, Micah, Nahum, come,
And lofty Habakkuk finds room;
While Zephaniah, Haggai calls;
Rapt Zechariah builds the walls,
And Malachi, with garments rent,
Concludes the ancient Testament.

A Boy King's Escapade.

Thang-Tai, the boy king of Anam, is just fourteen years old. A short time ago there was a day of great excitement at the royal court. Thang-Tai was missing. Etiquette requires that the king shall never leave the palace grounds. The whole court was in dismay; but the young potentate was not hard to find. Though he was a king, he was a boy, and it is natural for a boy when he has some money in his pocket to want to go out and spend it.

Now, that was exactly what the king of Anam did. Entirely alone, he had started on a "shopping" expedition through the streets of the capital. "Of course no one knew him, because he had never shown his face in public," writes a traveler, "he was simply a boy, like any other boy, and this was exactly what he wanted. But he was treated with respect by the shopkeepers, because he had plenty of money. Curiously enough, the thing which seemed to attract him most was a hair clipper, and when the frightened courtiers discovered him at last, it was with this implement in his possession. No doubt he intended to amuse himself by shaving the heads of all his dependents."

MOTHER.

BREATHE it gently, in a whisper;
'Tis a sweet, a hallowed word.
Saddened hearts swell with emotion
When the thrilling sound is heard.
Breathe it gently,—breathe it softly,
Touch a chord in every heart:
Many a heart will grow more tender,—
Many a pearly tear will start.

Mother! name that all hearts cherish:
E'en the child of sin and shame
Speaks in accents softer, milder,
When he breathes the hallowed name.
Breathe it gently in a whisper,
Lest some bleeding heart is riven;
There's but one name dearer to us,
And that cherished name is Heaven!

HOUSEKEEPING AND HOME-MAKING.

GREAT seemed the responsibility cast upon the shoulders of a newly wedded wife of our acquaintance. She felt the cares, as she took up her abode on the farm with her husband, for she knew that to keep house was not simply to keep free from dirt, but to make it as home-like and attractive as possible. Not much to do it with, very little pin-money to spend, so what was to be done? She did all her own work, washing, ironing, scrubbing, baking, etc., and was very happy. Sometimes a tear would escape and she would feel quite "blue," but when the husband came home all would vanish. She always greeted him with a smile, and in return would get a kiss and a kind word. They were working for each other, pulling the family burden together and trusting in the Heavenly Father. They didn't have much company, but when friends happened in, the little wife always welcomed them, and though they came at the usual meal hour, she always made the most of what she had prepared. She made it a rule not to make all manner of excuses for not having more or daintier food prepared.

This little wife always found plenty of leisure time, somehow, altho' there was but one farm-hand. She had her work planned beforehand and it was done systematically. She made curtains of bleached muslin, for the kitchen windows, and trimmed them with some lace that had been given to her. These were used for summer and for winter, crimson curtains of double-faced flannel took the place of the white ones. These made the room look cheerier and more cosy and warm for the winter. A pretty rag carpet was on the floor, and a few rugs made from scraps of cloth were very useful as well as ornamental. Thus, little by little, the house was made cosy and inviting. The little wife found her happiness in doing good and making the home happy. Although her cares have increased (she now has two little children), she says this is the happiest year of her married life. Husband is more contented, now the babies are here, and they have a glorious future before them. They are rich in their Christian home, in love and in happy hearts.

Don't Waste Your Time.

Of the Princess May, lately married to the Duke of York, one writes that she was too active to waste an hour. It frequently happened when a friend called that she would say: "You will pardon me, I know, if I get my knitting and do some work while we talk. There is really so much to do, it seems quite wrong to be idle." Sometimes it would be plain sewing, and always something to be given to the very poor. Neither her high station nor her learning nor her many accomplishments separated her from the destitute.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE SHOT IN THE WOOD.

NORMAN and Joyce were dining at Dangerfield Park, on the evening of the day when Fulk and Guy returned. They were almost as wishful to see Guy again as his own relations—more wishful indeed than some of them, for Mrs. Dangerfield and Yolante shrank from him increasingly as time went by, and the knowledge that her secret was shared by her daughter made the mother's heart many degrees heavier than it had ever been before. It was hard to call up an answering smile, when Guy spoke to her, hard to hold back the sense of chill disappointment with which she noted his complete restoration to health. And when he thanked her with serious gratitude for having "sent him away against his will," and told her that he believed from what he had heard that nothing else could have saved his life, she was conscious of a curious thrill she hardly knew if it were of pleasure or pain, which ran through her at his words, and she said within herself,—

"If he owes me his life, does he not owe me with it everything else. Have I not the right to all?" and then came the inevitable thought, "Suppose I had not let him go—where should we have been now?"

And the pang of shame which even now could not but follow such musing, was rendered four-fold more bitter from the fact that she read in her daughter's eyes, that she too shared it, and knew what was in her mother's mind.

Fulk was the great talker that evening. Always rather in advance of his years in reflection and powers of observation, his travels had seemed to make a man of him all at once. Cissy was almost shy with him for the first hour, he seemed so changed and developed, and he was the one to give the account of their travels, and relate such of their adventures and disasters as had not been duly recounted in letters. And whilst all this was going on, Guy sat a little apart with Monk and Joyce, and then they enjoyed a little personal conversation far more interesting than what was occupying the rest.

Yolante sat and watched them, and a certain hardness not unmingled with sadness came into her face. She lost the thread of Fulk's discourse and her mind went off on a journey of its own. There was one person in the room who noted this and watched her, and presently she started at hearing herself addressed.

"You are glad to get your travelers safe home again, I suppose?" said Norman by way of preface, and the girl gave him one of her inscrutable glances as she answered indifferently.

"Am I? Well, I do not know that I am. I do not see that it makes much difference to me one way or another."

With a look and a gesture he did not entirely understand, she rose and left him, and began playing stormily to herself at the other end of the room, where the grand piano stood. Guy, who never could keep away when there was music going on, came and stood beside her, but she seemed to shrink away from him, and would not answer when he spoke.

That evening, though outwardly so happy, left an uncomfortable impression on several minds, and Norman was so silent as he drove his sister home that she twitted him gaily, and asked if he had lost his heart. He answered her with unwonted gravity.

"I hope I may be no true prophet, Joyce, but I have an uncomfortable feeling about that family just now. There is something I do not understand going on. I should never be surprised at hearing something strange has happened."

The golden autumn days flew by as if on wings. In his delight at having his old comrade back, Monk seemed to grow backward into his boyhood again, and forgot [illegible] the graver manlier ways that had come to him with his new responsibilities. He was the very life of the house, teasing his sisters, plaguing his mother, playing tricks upon everybody, and acting as if he had not a thought or a care in the world. Joyce used to enjoy telling him that it was plain Guy still held the first place with him, and that she could never make him so happy: but she did not seem to resent this outbreak of boyish spirits, and Guy fed the flame in his own quiet way, and they wandered about the place from morning till night, generally with their guns over their shoulders and their dogs at their heels, but sometimes without any ostensible occupation, though on such occasions they were often busiest, for Monk had great ideas of improving the condition of his tenantry, and looking well after his property, and wanted to confide to Guy his pet projects, which he was turning over in his mind, and get his cousin's co-operation and approval.

"It is absolutely ridiculous the way they go on now," said Yolante with an impatient shrug, "Monk will be the laughing-stock of the place before long if he does not take care, and the worst of it is that Joyce does not or will not care, and takes Guy at Monk's valuation. I cannot think how any girl can be so silly."

"Things cannot go on like this forever," said Mrs. Dangerfield in cold measured tones. "If Guy is not going abroad for the winter—and there has been no mention of such a thing so far—he must find occupation for himself elsewhere. Dangerfield cannot and ought not to be his home. I am sometimes very uncomfortable about things as they are."

Yolante was afraid to ask what her mother meant, but Mrs. Dangerfield went on speaking of her own accord.

"I have never been comfortable since Monk made that absurd will, leaving all to Guy. I told him at the time that he was doing a foolish thing, and that in telling Guy of his intentions he was capping one blunder by another. As Guy went abroad and remained there so long it did not seem to matter much at the time: but I confess I never see them go out with their guns alone together without a shudder. One knows what thoughts are always being suggested to Guy by those people with whom he will associate himself despite all that can be said to the contrary: and there is and always has been something about Guy that I never fathomed. I have always distrusted that appearance of great fondness for us. After all why should he care so much for us, when but for our existence he would be in such a very different position?"

Yolante was silent. She knew that she did not like Guy, but that was because she had been jealous of him and had wronged him. It had never occurred to her to doubt his affection for them all, and for a moment she thought her mother's words were strained and hardly sincere: but when she realized the position in which her cousin stood and saw how but one life stood between him and the property which would make a great man of him, a sort of shiver ran through her, and she turned perceptibly paler.

It was perhaps a week after this conversation that mother and daughter, sitting in the dusky drawing-room, and waiting for the return of the boys who were out, Guy and Monk shooting, and Fulk on an expedition to Fordringham to see the Northesks, when a sharp twice-repeated pull at the front door bell made itself heard, and in a few moments the butler made his appearance with a look of such alarm and trouble on his face that both the ladies started to their feet before he had spoken a word.

"There has been an accident in the wood, they say, ma'am," began the old man in tremulous tones. "I don't know the rights of it yet: but the young gentlemen were out shooting—and—and—it's Mr. Dangerfield they are bringing home directly."

Mrs. Dangerfield's arms dropped to her side. Her face was white and rigid, and Yolante's eyes seemed to burn with lambent flame.

"I understand—I knew always it would be so," said the mother, speaking in the labored, mechanical way of one who dreams. "My son is dead—and it is Guy who has killed him."

Out into the hall stepped mother and daughter. The lamp had been lighted there, and shone full upon the oak panelling and thick warm rug. The front door stood wide open, and a flood of ruddy light streamed out into the gloom without, serving as a beacon light to guide the little procession now approaching so near that the heavy tread of those who bore the helpless burden might be distinctly heard.

A few seconds more and they must know the worst. Slowly up the steps came the bearers, and even at that moment it was with a thrill of relief that in one of these they recognised the face and figure of Geoffrey Northesk. It was no time to ask how he came there; it was enough that the best surgical help to be had in the neighborhood was on the spot. Fulk was another of the bearers, and his face was pale and set: but it was his eyes that first met the terribly imploring look on his mother's face, and he opened his lips to say.

"He is not dead."

That was all—no word of hope or confidence for the future, and on the rigid face, from which every drop of blood had receded, the seal of death seemed already stamped. One look and Yolante sank half-fainting upon a neighboring couch; but no one had a thought to spare for her just then.

Behind the mournful procession, his face as white as the wounded man's, his head bent as if beneath the weight of a crushing blow, came Guy, so changed and broken down that it took a keen glance to make sure that it was he. But as under Geoffrey's direction, the move toward the stair case was made without any pause in the hall, and Guy was still following mechanically, the touch of a hand upon his arm roused him from his trance, and he found himself face to face with his aunt, looking straight into a pair of eyes that seemed literally to scorch him with their flaming glance.

"Guy Dangerfield," the tones of the hoarse voice were very low, but not the less telling on that account, "farther than this you do not go. You will not be permitted to approach my son from this time forward. You will leave this house to-night. Soon, by your own deed, you may be master here—if you can clear yourself in the eyes of the law from this great crime: but this roof can no longer shelter you and me. My son's blood is upon your head—of that I am absolutely convinced, whatever the appearances may be."

As the sense of these words penetrated to Guy's understanding, a new look crossed his face. White as it was, there was a sort of quiet dignity about him that was not without a very slight effect upon Mrs. Dangerfield. She had intended to sweep past him without another word, now she almost involuntarily paused to hear if he had aught to say. The bearers toiling slowly up with their burden had hardly surmounted the first stairs. There was time for a brief dialogue before she could approach her son.

"Aunt Clare, do you mean what you have said? Am I to have no part in nursing Monk back to health—if he is spared to us?"

"I would sooner trust a tiger in the sick-room than you."

Guy seemed for a moment to shrink back before the vindictive light in those eyes. Then he bent his head, and looked up a moment later with an intense pleading in his glance.

"Is it any use to tell you that I am certain it is no carelessness on my part that caused this accident—"

"I can quite acquit you of carelessness," was the icy response. "I never accused you even in my heart of any careless inadvertence."

Guy looked at her—and then the horrible truth flashed across him—It was not as the author of a terrible accident she thus reproached him, but as the author of a deliberate and most cruelly treacherous crime. There was but one course open to him, and that was to leave the house that night, as indeed he had been ordered to do.

"I will go," he said, in the low dazed tone of a man who received a crushing blow, and Mrs. Dangerfield swept upstairs, whilst he sank down in one of the chairs, and covered his face with his hands.

Looking up a few seconds later, he saw Yolante; she, too, shrank away, and the fire flashed into her eyes.

"You, you, you," she panted. "How dare you stand there, under his roof? You have killed him. You know you have. And you dare to come and face us—as if we did not know what you had done, and why you had done it."

But if Guy had been overwhelmed by his aunt's fierce words—from her so unwonted, and therefore so crushing—he had had a few moments to recover himself now, and Yolante was not in the same position towards him, and he felt he could speak to her, and explain if she would but listen.

"Yolante," he said, standing up straight before her, "I cannot understand why you and your mother, without having heard a single detail of what has happened to-day, are willing to lay the whole blame upon me. But in justice to myself you must hear what I have to say. "It was getting dusk when it happened. We had decided to go home, and had started off in that direction. I was in front, as the path was narrow, and Monk, I suppose, saw something that delayed him, for by-and-by as he did not answer when I spoke, I turned round and did not see him. I expected I should hear his gun in a moment and so I did; and just then a hare ran out, and I fired, but I could not see if I had killed it. I called Monk, and he did not answer, so I went back for him, and found him lying on the ground with a charge of shot in him." Guy paused a moment and shuddered. "There is only one rational explanation of it. Monk is not very careful with his gun—he must have been carrying it carelessly and hurt himself. There was no one else with us. I wish to heaven there had been. You believe me, Yolante, do you not? You believe what I told you?"

The answer was inflexible and pitiless. Perhaps only the young could be so stern in judgment. "I do not believe a single word. I believe you did it yourself—and did it on purpose."

Guy sat down suddenly and rested his head on his hand. For a moment the whole place swam before his eyes. He did not know where he was or what was about to happen. Then out of the mists he heard another voice—and at that moment it seemed to him as the voice of an angel.

"I believe you, Guy—Yolante, how can you be so cruel, so wicked? Guy, dear Guy, look up—do not mind what she says."

"A great deal they can know about it if they think such things," said Humphrey's quiet voice. "Do not be afraid, Guy. Things will come right yet."

Guy looked up then, and saw that Humphrey and Cissy were standing beside him. It was not a time when many words could well be spoken, but those few were enough. Guy no longer felt an outcast from all his kindred.

Dr. Northesk had by this time arrived, and a celebrated surgeon from a neighboring town, who had been telegraphed for by Geoffrey on the first alarm, might shortly be expected. Fulk came down once, and said that Monk was still alive, though quite unconscious, but he did not know the extent of the danger, and could not stay to talk. He went back, and the slow hours crawled by. The other surgeon arrived and went upstairs, and presently after what seemed a very long interval Mrs. Dangerfield and Geoffrey came downstairs together.

In the hall the same four were still gathered. No one had moved from the place which seemed to afford the best centre for information of what was going on in the house, and all eyes were turned upon Geoffrey as he came slowly down the stair-case.

"He is slightly better," was the answer he gave to the unspoken question.

"You here still?" said Mrs. Dangerfield in icy tones to her nephew, who was standing leaning against the mantel-shelf with a face ashy from excess of agitation, "I thought I had made myself sufficiently clear."

"You did—I am going," said Guy, speaking with difficulty, "I had to wait for news of Monk."

"Mamma, mamma," cried the horrified Cissy, "you do not mean that you are so cruel as to think that horrible thing that Yolante said. O, Guy, Guy, don't look like that. People can't believe it of you."

"Silence, child," said her mother, for once speaking harshly and with audible irritation. "You know nothing at all about it. You are not competent to pronounce an opinion."

Cissy made no verbal response, but she went and stood beside Guy, and put her hand upon his shoulder.

It was a simple little action, but it told a tale of resolution and quiet independence which would hardly be credited in timid, retiring little Cissy. Geoffrey who had looked on and heard every word that had been spoken, understanding exactly what had been implied all through, now stepped forward, and faced Guy.

"You had better come with me," he said. "You have had about as much of this thing as you can stand. We will put you up for the night, and you can make your plans to-morrow."

Guy made no audible response, but he looked at Geoffrey with a world of gratitude in his eyes. He attempted no kind of leave-taking, but followed Geoffrey out of the door.

"You shall have your things to-morrow," said the harsh voice of his aunt as he went out into the darkness, and that was the last word that reached him as he drove from the doors of the old home.

A WORD TO A PREACHER.*

I CITE an illustration to show the word of the Lord comes to men to-day just as it came of old to the prophets of Israel. It is a personal experience of the famous Mr. Charles Finney, and it is best given in his own words. He writes: "When I came out of the pulpit in the afternoon an aged man approached, and said to me, 'Can you not come and preach in our neighborhood? We have never had any religious meetings there.' I inquired the direction and the distance, and appointed to preach there the next afternoon, Monday, at five o'clock, in their school-house . . . I went on foot to fulfil this appointment. The weather was very warm that day, and before I arrived there I felt almost too faint to walk, and greatly discouraged in my mind. I sat down in the shade by the way-side, and felt as if I were too faint to reach there, and, if I did, too much discouraged to open my mouth to the people. When I arrived I found the house full, and immediately commenced the service by reading a hymn. They attempted to sing, but the horrible discord agonized me beyound expression. I leaned forward, put my elbows upon my knees and my hands over my ears, and shook my head withal, to shut out the discord, which even then I could barely endure. As soon as they had ceased to sing I cast myself down upon my knees, almost in a state of desperation. The Lord opened the windows of heaven upon me and gave me great enlargement and power in prayer. Up to this moment I had had no idea what text I should use on the occasion. As I rose from my knees the Lord gave me this: 'Up, get you out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city.' I told the people, as nearly as I could recollect, where they would find it, and went on to tell them of the destruction of Sodom. . . . While I was doing this I was struck with the fact that the people looked exceedingly angry about me. Many countenances appeared very threatening, and some of the men near me looked as if they were about to strike me. This I could not understand, as I was only giving them, with great liberty of spirit, some interesting sketches of Bible history. . . . I turned upon them and said that I had understood that they had never had any religious meetings in that neighborhood; and, applying that fact, I thrust at them with the sword of the Spirit with all my might. From this moment the solemnity increased with great rapidity. In a few moments there seemed to fall upon the congregation an instantaneous shock; . . . the Word seemed literally to cut like a sword."

I need not quote more. At the second visit Mr. Finney learned for the first time that the place, on account of its wickedness, had been nicknamed Sodom, and the old man who had invited the preacher to visit it was nicknamed Lot, because he was the only professor of religion there.

I do not know any instance in the Old Testament of the Word of the Lord coming more aptly and powerfully, or in circumstances of greater need and dejection, to a Moses, a Samuel, an Elijah, or any of the prophets whose writings have come down to us.

Another example shall be from a page of modern missionary enterprise. The narrator, Dr. Edgerton Young, spent many years in preaching the Gospel to the Indians in the Canadian Dominion. He says: "On the banks of a wild river, about sixty miles from Beaver Lake, I visited a band of pagan Indians, after a painful and difficult journey, who seemed determined to resist every appeal and entreaty I could make to them. My faithful Indians, my companions, did all they could to rouse them by telling them of their own happy experience. But the people sat shrouded in their blankets, smoking in a sullen indifference, upright and motionless as mummies. Tired out in body and sad at heart, I threw myself on the help of God, and breathed a prayer for guidance in this hour of sore perplexity. God heard me, and springing up I shouted, 'I know where all your children are, all your dead children! Yes, I know most certainly where all the children are whom death has taken, the children of the good and the bad. I know where they all are.' The Indians quickly uncovered their faces and manifested intense interest. I went on: 'They have gone from your camp-fires and your wigwams. The hammocks are empty and the little bows and arrows lie idle. Your hearts are sad, and you mourn for the children you hear not, and who come not at your call. But there is only one way to the beautiful land where the Son of God has gone, and into which he takes the children, and you must come this way if you would be happy and enter it.' As I spoke, a big, stalwart man from the side of the tent sprang up and rushed towards me. 'Missionary, my heart is empty, and I mourn much, for none of my children are left among the living; very lonely is my wigwam. I long to see them again and to clasp them in my arms. Tell me, missionary, what must I do to please the Great Spirit, that I may enter that beautiful land and see my children again?' He sank at my feet in tears, and was quickly joined by others, who, like him, were broken down with grief and anxious for instruction."

Was not that exclamation, "I know where all your dead children are," a veritable word of God? Did ever any saint in Old Testament times receive a more direct or manifest message to deliver? It was the one point where the callousness of that congregation was penetrable. The missionary had no means of knowing where that point was. And the word of the Lord came to him. He gave it, and with such results as might be expected.

AN UNTAXED TEA PARTY*.

Soon the delicious odor of tea came from the kitchen, and the three women, so long deprived of that luxury, could not but enjoy it. When invited out to supper, they praised Mrs. Niles' biscuit and butter, but looked suspiciously at the tea. When a lady refuses her tea, she must be patriotic. The tea was poured and passed, and Mrs. Stevens raised her cup half-way to her mouth. When convinced that it was neither foxberry nor sage, she put it down.

"Why, this ain't foxberry, nor sage tea, neither, if I've got any taste," declared Mrs. Brown.

"So it seems to me," declared Mrs. Hill.

Yet the patriotic ladies, much to the disgust of Mrs Stevens, drained their cups. When they had done so, Mr. Brown looked their host in the face and remarked:

"Now, Mrs. Niles, you haven't been a-giving us boughten tea, have you?"

"I shouldn't think you would ask after drinking a cupful," the irritated Mrs. Stevens answered.

"For my part, I could tell it clear across the room by the smell."

Then Mrs. Niles, with a triumphant smile, which abashed and puzzled the committee, answered:

"Well, to tell the truth, it is as good a dish of shushou as I could make!"

The looks of horror and expression of dismay which followed this declaration were indescribable. The ladies pushed back their cups and Mrs Brown declared:

"I shan't cross my conscience, Miss Niles, by drinking your boughten tea. I love my country too well for that, and have too much respect for the committee."

"Nor I, neither; I'd just as soon drink poison," vowed Mrs. Hill. Mrs. Stevens, who was as calm as a summer's morning, said:

"You'll just as true be published in the papers as a traitor to the cause of the country, as you are alive."

Mrs. Niles very calmly answered: "I don't think so."

"Oh, Miss Niles, you've ruined yourself," almost sobbed Mrs. Hill. "If nobody else don't complain of you, I shall feel it my duty to go to the committee myself about it."

"Wall, I'm not afraid of any trouble about it," declared Mrs. Niles.

"Why not? I think it's high time you was afraid of it," said Mrs. Stevens.

"Because I haven't broke over the rules of the committee, not one of 'em. We had ten pounds of tea in this house when rules against buying and using India tea were first published; and you know families were allowed to use up what they had in the house. I'm very much obliged to you, ladies, for coming here to teach me patriotism; but I should like to see the woman, or man, either, who would go further, or suffer more than I, for the good of my country."

"Good for you, Mrs. Niles! now I like to hear you talk that way," cried Mrs. Stevens. Mrs. Niles continued:

"I've no idea of buying any more tea till our troubles with parliament are over, or till the committee takes off the restriction. But as we have this in the house, we might as well drink it once in a while and take the comfort of it, and give a cup to our friends when they come in and see us, as to let it lay in the cupboard and lose its strength and all be wasted. So now, ladies, just drink your tea and take the comfort of it. This tea wasn't taxed."

And they did. Even the patriotic Mrs. Stevens drank three cups and declared it the most delicious beverage she had ever tasted.

ANOTHER CASE.

INVALIDED FROM THE ROYAL NAVY.
CASE OF "HOPELESS PHTHISIS."
BROUGHT HOME TO DIE!
BUT CURED! BY THE TREATMENT OF MR. C. T. CONGREVE.

"Dear Sir—I have much pleasure in writing you to say that one of my sons, whose life was despaired of in consequence of Consumption having supervened an attack of inflammation of the lungs, has been completely restored to health by your invaluable treatment. I cannot speak too highly of your medicine, for a more complete and wonderful cure, I think, has never been effected by any other medicine. My son returned home in a hopelessly dying state. By accident I heard of your remedy, and determined to try it. My wife and other members of my family were surprised and delighted to notice some change for the better, after a few days only; and in a few months, I am glad to say, my son was entirely restored to health, and is now one of the strongest and most robust of our family.

As the publication of this case would, I think, do much good, you can make any use you like of this letter, &c. I shall write an account to my relatives living in Tasmania and Queensland, and should suggest you inserting this in the papers there.—I am, dear sir, yours gratefully, John B. Hardwicke, Selby-villas, Prettlewell-street, Southend, Essex."

In confirmation of the above, Mr. Hardwicke has sent me the certificate of his son's discharge from the Royal Navy: "Sydney Hardwicke invalided; case, Pneumonic Phthisis." Also a certificate as to his present state of health from a surgeon at Southend:—"I hereby certify that Sydney Hardwicke is sound in body and of good constitution.—Aug. 9, 1892.

OUR REFUGE.

WHEN our hearts are pulsating with pleasure.
And Time tells the hour with a song;
When Fortune with gifts fills our measure,
How gladly life rushes along!
Ah, we look thro' bright vistas of morrows,
And with pride in achieving, we plan;
And exclaim in the absence of sorrows,
"What a marvelous power has man!"

When our hearts are aweary of beating,
And the ways of the world seem awry;
When upon every hand we are meeting
Cold glances from each passer-by;
When we stand quite alone 'mid life's troubles,
And the wreck of fond hopes sadly scan,
We learn then the thinnest of bubbles
Are the pride and the power of man.

It is then, when we crave consolation,
That humbly our eyes turn above;
And the soul, sick with sin, finds salvation,
In the ways of the Master's love.
And we rest in his dear arms forgetful of sorrow that seemed dark and deep,
And like children grown tired and fretful,
We are lulled into peaceful sleep.

Marshall, Mich. —BERT H. WHITAKER.

CHINESE PERSECUTION

Many evidences of Chinese hostility to foreigners were seen by Mr. Stephen Massey during his recent tour in China. He writes: "Proceeding up the great river, the Yank-tse-kiang, towards Hankow, we hear a good deal of the recent anti-foreign riots in this valley. At Wuhu, the Roman Catholic Church, the Foundling Hospital and other mission buildings, and the Customs buildings, which were all burned or sacked and torn down, are being rebuilt. Further up the river on the opposite bank is Wusuch, where after twenty years of peaceful work, and having apparently the full confidence and good will of the people, the Wesleyan ministers were attacked suddenly, their houses and chapel burned down, a missionary (Mr. Argent) and a Customs officer (Mr. Green) were murdered, and the ladies, seeking refuge in the Yamen (the Chinese official quarters) had the doors shut in their faces, and were left exposed to the fury of the mob.

"From the river the chapel can just be seen in course of rebuilding. The Chinese heathen seem to be quite unable to believe in disinterested philanthropy, and so all the efforts which missionaries may make to benefit them are misunderstood and slandered, and this seems to be specially true of the Yang-tse Valley. It is dangerous to establish foundling homes, because those in charge of them are accused of taking out the eyes of the girls in order to use them in making photographic lenses and chemicals, and for refining silver."

AN ESCAPE FROM THE ZENANA.

From Mrs. Frater, one of the devoted ladies who is laboring among the women secluded in the zenanas of India, comes the following account of an escape: "About a fortnight since a young unmarried woman from a Kuhlin Brahmin family left her zenana. She is an only daughter, a bright, intelligent, handsome girl of nineteen years of age. We have visited her for three years, but a year ago she felt the power of God's love in her heart, and from that time ceased to worship idols, thus frequently incurring her father's anger. Two or three weeks ago she asked us if she might come out of her zenana and confess Christ, as she believed in Him. Many difficulties were in the way, but she was determined; so the night after the Holi festival she quietly forsook her old home and its religion for a new and untried world. Two hours afterwards we met her and took her to a place of safety. The following night she was brought down to Fyzabad at her own wish. On Tuesday, [illegible] down and laid a complaint before the magistrate that we had abducted the girl for the sake of her jewels. He said, 'The girl is only thirteen years of age,' upon hearing which the girl spoke up and said, 'Father, I am nineteen, you told me so last week.' The magistrate asked for her birth certificate; the father said, 'It is lost.' The girl, looking straight at him, said, 'No, father, you know it is in the box at home.'

Finally the magistrate, having satisfied himself as to her age, gave us permission to take the girl away. Before leaving the court she said, 'I will never go back home. I love the Lord Jesus, and I am determined to be a Christian. I will give up all my jewels and money, they are no use to me.' Mr. Frater baptised her the other day before a large congregation, and her answers were most clear and distinct."

A TEST OF FAITH.

It requires no small amount of faith on the part of an idolator to destroy the images which he has reverenced all his life. Sometimes there is reluctance to do this, even after public profession of faith. Miss Fourie, of Pa-chau, China, describes in a recent letter one case of the kind. She says: "In my last letter I mentioned a very earnest old gentleman named Yang, who still had his idols up in his house. Praise the Lord! now his idols are all burnt up.

"He had no peace whilst they were in his possession; one day he sent them to our house in a large basket. The next day we gathered all the Christians and enquirers together, and had a short service in the guest-hall. Then we went out in the court-yard, and the old gentleman set fire to his idols. There were four idols and three ancestral tablets; and, as he was putting the light to them, he said: 'They are false: I don't fear, I don't fear.' When the burning was over, Mr. Walter Taylor invited him to stay to dinner, and directly he had finished he said, 'Now I am going out to preach.' He comes through pouring rain to the services on the Sunday, and constantly testifies in the tea-shops and on the streets Another man also, who has spent the greater part of his life exhorting people to do good, hoping thus to secure for himself happiness in the next world, has been to our services and brought the books which he has been accustomed to use in his idolatrous worship, and his paper God, that we might burn them. He says there is one more idol in the house, but he cannot remove it until his sister-in-law gives her consent.

MISSIONARIES FOR INDIA

A farewell service for six missionaries appointed to go to India was held October 13 in Lenox Hall, New York. The missionaries are the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Clark, of Parkville, Mo., who go to Lodiana; the Rev. C. C. Meek, of Evansville, assigned to the Furrukhabod district; the Rev. G. H. Simonson, of New Albany, Ind., to Miraj; the Rev. E. D. Martin, of Danville, Ky., who goes with Mr. and Mrs. Clark to Lodiana, and Miss Abbie M. Stebbins, of Buchanan, Mich., to Dehra. The Rev. Dr. F. F. Ellinwood conducted the service.

INDIA'S HEATHEN MILLIONS.

The population of India equals the combined population of Russia, United States, Germany, France, Great Britain, Turkey proper, and Canada. If each person in India could represent a letter in our English Bible, it would take seventy Bibles to represent the heathen population of India, while the Christian population could be represented by the Prophecy of Isaiah. The people in India, holding hands, would reach three times around the globe at the equator. Could you put the women of India in a column eight deep, and allow a foot and a half for each woman thus walking in lock-step, you would have a column eight times across the continent of North America. Again, could you distribute Bibles to the women of India at the rate of twenty thousand a day, you would require seventeen years to hand each woman a Bible. Could you put the children of India in a column four deep, and allow a space of two feet for each child to walk in, you would have a procession reaching 5,000 miles. The widows of India would outnumber four cities like London, England. Give to each a standing space of one foot, standing ten abreast, and this closely-packed column would reach the full length of New York State. One in every six of the females in India is doomed to a desolate and degraded life. What a field India is for the Gospel!

"Shave your Soap"

—so the soap makers say, especially if you're washing delicate things. Now, in the name of common sense, what's the use? When you can get Pearline, in powder form for this very reason, why do you want to work over soap, which, if it's good for anything, gets very hard and difficult to cut. Besides, Pearline is vastly better than any powdered soap could be. It has all the good properties of any soap—and many more, too. There's something in it that does the work easily, but without harm—much more easily than any other way yet known.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 392 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Jordan Water.

Owing to the approaching close of the World's Fair I offer for sale my stock of water from the sacred Jordan stream, rather than carry it back to Palestine.

Having had the pleasure some years ago of meeting both Dr. Talmage and Dr Louis Klopsch at my bazaar in Jerusalem, the genuineness of the Jordan water is, in a measure at least, vouched for. Besides this, Consular certificates, fully bear out my claims in this respect. A nice glass-bottle bearing the sign of the Jerusalem Cross, and the words, "Jordan Water," blown into the glass, full of genuine Jordan Water, neatly and securely packed in a box, sent, all express charges prepaid by me, on receipt of fifty cents. I will send back your money if my stock is exhausted.

Have You been to the World's Fair?

If you have not, do you realize that only a few days remain in which to embrace this opportunity of a life-time?

A visit to the World's Fair is in itself a liberal education. You can't afford to miss it. Do you know that all trains of the Michigan Central, "The Niagara Falls Route," stop at Exits View Station, affording passengers the most comprehensive and satisfactory view of the great cataract, and that this is the only line from the East that carries passengers directly to the Exposition Grounds, with local stops at Sixtieth Street (Midway) Pleasance and Fifty-third Street (Hyde Park) within easy walking distance of over one hundred hotels?

Young Christians.

Their Loyalty to Jesus, the Church and their Fellowmen.

IN the opening address at the International Christian Conference held in Chicago, Oct. 8, Rev. E. M. Gates, LL.D., President of Amherst College said, among other remarks: "The Young Men's Christian Association originated in London, but it is in the religious life of our land that it has had its most marvellous growth, and has taken on a true international form, and through the International Committee, organized here, has reached all the nations of the world, and places its secretaries as leaders of the Young Christian manhood of Japan and India and Ceylon. The educational classes maintained in our cities by our Christian Associations are in line with the University Extension work of England. And the movement for the extension of the privileges of the University to the great masses of the people who cannot go to a University centre for study, while it started in England, and while the great need which exists in England was to a large extent met by our system of free High Schools and public schools in America, still answers so directly to the conception of Christian helpfulness which marks American life, that its results in our own land have been wonderfully broad, wide and deep, and the work takes on proportions here which its founders in England never contemplated.

"So the idea of the University Settlement among the poorest in our cities, originating in the Christian fervor of Arnold Toynbee, found immediate answer in the heart and the life of the noblest and most aspiring young men and young women of our Universities and Colleges. The fine old legend, of 'noblesse oblige,' is recognized in the world of intellect; and all the richest blessings that attended the recognition of this law of God where it reached the heart of one nobly born, are found now as the noblest born of the sons and daughters of God among us take up the blessed law of service, and give their lives to the enlightening and lifting up of those sodden masses of humanity that render terrible the worst districts of our larger cities.

"As these conceptions grow upon the Christian consciousness of the land, God's own promise is fulfilled, 'I will pour out my spirit unto all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams, and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my spirit.'

"The young in our churches feel the spirit of loyalty to Christ, of brotherhood with their fellows, and of desire to serve him to whom they owe all, while the "dew of their youth" is still on them; and the Christian Endeavor movement, latest and most marvellous of Christian organizations, girdles the globe with its millions of praying and working young Christians.

"Christian women feel the accursed inroad of the saloon upon the home; and combining to defend the sacred ties of home and to rescue husbands, brothers, and sons, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, binding together women of all nations, is the most significant outgrowth of the new revelation of Christian womanhood.

"There springs up a deep sense of pity and spiritual yearning for the millions who still sit in darkness. The movement known as the Students' Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions stirs the centres of higher learning, and binds together in ties of prayer and of deepened interest in foreign missions ten thousand young men and women who offer themselves for the work of holding up the Cross of Christ in the dark places of the world."

CHINESE PREJUDICE.

An interesting tour of the mission stations in China has recently been taken by Mr. Stephen Massey, who speakes in the highest terms of the heroism and intrepidity of the missionaries, both men and women. At Foochow he met Mrs. Alhok, the Christiain Chinese lady of whom he says, that since her husband's death "she has been much persecuted by her heathen relatives and defrauded of much of her property in consequence of her husband and herself having become Christians. She had some of the lady missionaries living in her house, and when I called upon her she sent her love to her many Christian friends, and desired them to know that though she had passed through much trouble her Saviour had kept her in peace.

"The Foochow Christians have not altogether escaped the violent raging of the heathen which has broken out lately in other parts of China. Mr. Philips of the Church Missionary Society, had his house burned down, and some rooms which he and his wife temporarily occupied filled with abominable filth at Kienyang, a pioneer station which he was opening for Christ far up among the mountains, and Dr. Rigg, the medical missionary about the same time was almost murdered. People at home want to know what the Chinese Christians are like, and here is a glimpse of one. When Dr. Rigg was attacked by the mob, they were dragging him along with the avowed intention of throwing him into one of the "horrible pits" filled with liquid filth, which abound throughout China, he was saved by the devotion of a Chinese Christian, who hurried up on hearing of the tumult, and throwing himself into the middle of Dr. Rigg's asailants, diverted their attention to himself. He was thrown into the pit, and his would-be murderers said, "Leave him, he is sure to die." Providentially, however, his life was spared, and afterwards, when he heard that Mr. Philips was in danger, he walked forty miles in one day to share the danger with him. Has not such a man given credible evidence of the reality of his conversion?"

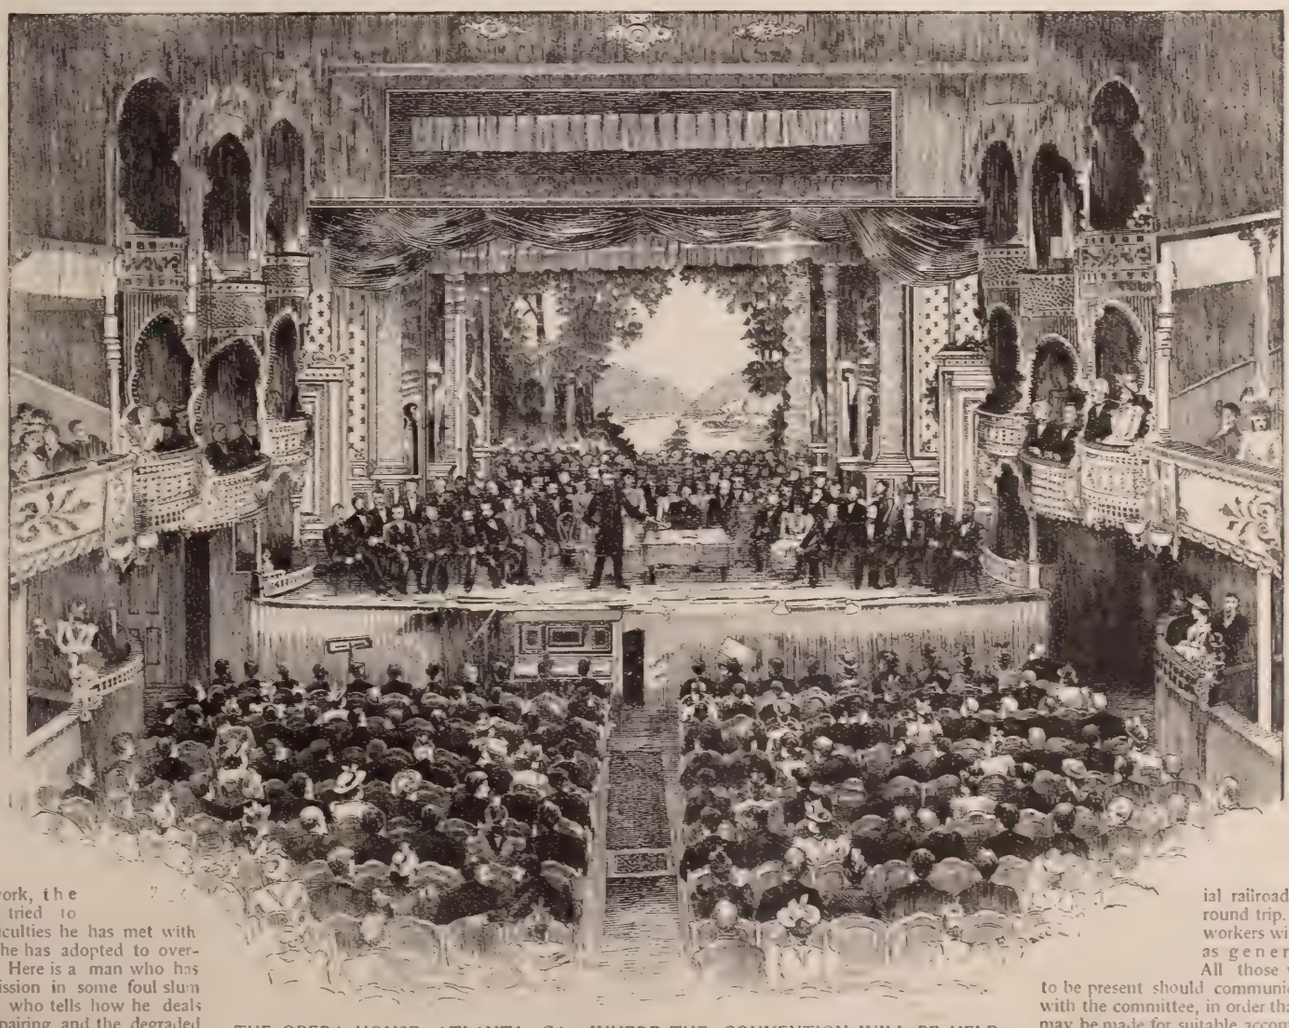
CHRISTIAN WORKERS IN COUNCIL.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the Association to be Held Next Week at Atlanta, Ga. —The Object of the Association, and Portraits of its Managing Committee.

EARNEST Christian workers throughout the United States and Canada have been looking forward for several months past to the Convention which assembles next week at Atlanta, Ga. It is the eighth annual Convention of the International Association of Christian Workers, whose membership now numbers over twelve hundred, and includes the most prominent laborers in Christian service on both sides the Atlantic. In former years, at Buffalo, N. Y., Hartford, Conn., Washington, D. C., and Boston, Mass., the announcement of the coming together of so many eminent servants of Christ attracted large numbers of Christian people from all sections, who listened with pleasure and profit to the stories of successful effort as they were told by the men and women who had been serving the Master in various spheres of labor. Fully five thousand persons attended the meetings in Boston last year, and as each Convention has been larger than its predecessor, there is reason to expect a still larger number at Atlanta this year. The charm of these Conventions lies in the originality of the addresses. Every speaker describes his own method of work, the class he has tried to reach, the difficulties he has met with and the means he has adopted to overcome them. Here is a man who has charge of a mission in some foul slum of a great city who tells how he deals with the despairing and the degraded drunkard; here is a woman who goes out night after night to seek her fallen sisters, and restore them to their homes, or find them employment in honorable service; here is a man who visits the jails and talks with the criminals and tells how men have come out of prison, as Jerry McAuley did, to devote the rest of their lives to Christ's service; here is one who has collected cast-off clothing and worn-out articles of household use and has had them renovated and made decent that he might have wherewith to give to poor outcasts who need help for the body as well as the soul: here is one who has opened lodging-houses where the homeless can be decently lodged, with religious surroundings; here are men who have organized boys' clubs, worked in University Settlements, established industrial homes, opened orphanages, have gone out after their day's business in Gospel wagons or Gospel boats on our rivers and canals, or have preached on street corners, or on the docks to the sailors, or organized Christian work among soldiers or policemen. Each has a story of thrilling interest to tell. There is no self-glorification, no advertising, no boasting, but a simple desire on the part of each speaker to place at the service of his brethren the benefits of his own experience. The inspiration of these addresses is wonderful. Men and women go away from these conventions to their own cities stimulated to engage in Christian work there. They have heard what has been done elsewhere, how apparently feeble instruments, full of faith in the power of the Holy Spirit, have attempted some work for Christ, depending solely on that power, and have been blessed with success surpassing their most sanguine hopes. They have learned, too, the practical side of the work. They have heard of mistakes at the beginning, of failures through inexperience, of methods tried and found useless, and finally success coming through unexpected discoveries of new agencies or plans. Thus the Christian from a spiritually lifeless, torpid community, leaves the convention not only encouraged to enter the field and strive to win souls, or to organize some philanthropic effort, but equipped with technical knowledge gained from the painful experience of others. Many a work in distant cities which is now lifting men out of the mire of sin and vice, helping them morally, spiritually, and temporally, has had its origin in these conventions. As an eminent divine of Massachusetts said, after attending last year's convention, when asked to describe it, "Bring together a missionary conference, a Gospel meeting in the slums, a revival service, an experience meeting, a gathering of souls waiting, like those in the upper chamber at Jerusalem, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, assemble believers by the thousand from many lands, hold three sessions every day and you have the externals of the Convention of Christian Workers."



THE OPERA HOUSE, ATLANTA, GA., WHERE THE CONVENTION WILL BE HELD.

The list of speakers at next week's convention indicates that it will be no less interesting add useful than the conventions of former years. Among them are Mr. J. A. Riis, the author of How the Other Half Lives, and The Children of the Poor; Prof. John R. Commons, Secretary of the recently organized Institute of Christian Sociology; David Allen Reed, of the School for Christian Workers; Rev. R. A Torrey, Superintendent of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute, Chicago; Mr. C. N. Crittenton, whose wonderful work in connection with the Florence Night Mission is so well known; E. P. Hammond, the Evangelist of the children; Mr. W. H. Howland of Toronto; John P. Quinn, the Anti-Gambling Evangelist; Major George A. Hilton, the conductor of the famous mission at Los Angeles, Cal Dr. Josiah Strong, author of Our Country; Mrs. J. K Barney, Rev. Thos. Bone, Rev. John H. Hector, Elder Rufus Smith, Rev. B. Fay Mills, Rev. Frank Russell, Rev. J. W. Simpson, Miss Bertha Wright, Rev. H. W. Pope, Mr. B. H. Warner, Mr. H. M. Moore, Miss B. B. Tyson and a large number of others. The singing will be under the charge of Mr. and Mrs. George C. Stebbins.

The sessions will be held in De Give's Opera House, a picture of which appears on this page. It seats three thousand persons and overflow meetings are to be held in neighboring churches. Preliminary prayer-meetings will also take place in the churches of Atlanta on Wednesday evening, Nov. 8, and the first session opens in the Opera House at nine o'clock on the following morning. Three sessions will be held every day, except Sunday, for a week, closing with the evening session of Wednesday, Nov. 15. Any church, mission, Y. M. C. A. or Christian Endeavor Society may send a delgate, who will have the advantage of special railroad rates for the round trip. All Christian workers will be welcome as general delegates. All those who intend to to be present should communicate promptly with the committee, in order that preparations may be made for suitable accommodation and for convenience of railroad travel. A committee of Christian friends in Atlanta have arranged for the entertainment of a thousand delegates and others will be provided for at moderate rates. For the convenience of delegates from the East,

BEFORE ELECTION SERMON.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., Founded on the Text: Exodus 20: 18: "And all the people saw the thunderings and the lightnings and the noise of the trumpet and the mountain smoking."

ON the eve of elections in the sixty counties of this State, and in all the counties of most of the United States, while there are many hundreds of nominees to office, it is appropriate and important that I preach this Before Election Sermon.

My text informs you that the lightnings and earthquakes united their forces to wreck a mountain of Arabia Petrea in olden time, and travellers to-day find heaps of porphyry and greenstone rocks, bowlder against bowlder, the remains of the first law library, written, not on parchment or papyrus, but on shattered slabs of granite. The corner-stones of all morality, of all wise law, of all righteous jurisprudence, of all good government, are the two tablets of stone on which were written the Ten Commandments. All Roman law, all French law, all English law, all American law that is worth anything, all common law, civil law, criminal law, martial law, law of nations were rocked in the cradle of the twentieth chapter of Exodus. And it would be well in these times of great political agitation if the newspapers would print the Decalogue some day in place of the able editorial. The fact is that some people suppose that the law has passed out of existence, and some are not aware of some of the passages of that law, and others say this or that is of the more importance, when no one has any right to make such an assertion. These laws are the pillars of society, and if you remove one pillar you damage the whole structure. I have noticed that men are particularly vehement against sins to which they are not particularly tempted, and find no especial wrath against sins in which they themselves indulge. They take out one gun from this battery of ten guns, and load that, and unlimber that, and fire that. They say, "This is an Armstrong gun, and this is a Krupp gun, and this is a Nordenfeldt five-barrelled gun, and this is a Gatling ten-barrelled gun, and this is a Martigny thirty-seven-barrelled gun." But I have to tell them that they are all of the same calibre, and that they shoot from eternity to eternity. Many questions are before the people, in the coming elections all over this land, but I shall try to show you that the most important thing to be settled about all these candidates is their personal, moral character. The Decalogue forbids idolatry, image-making, profanity, maltreatment of [illegible], murder, theft, incontinence, lying, and covetousness. That is the Decalogue by which you and I will have to be tried, and by the same Decalogue you and I must [illegible] office.

Of course we shall not find anything like perfection. If we do not vote until we find an immaculate nominee we will never vote at all. We have so many faults of our own we ought not to be censorious or maledictory or hypercritical in regard to the faults of others. The Christly rule is as appropriate for November as any other month in the year: "Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

Most certainly are we not to take the statement of red-hot partisanship as the real character of any man. From nearly all the great cities of this land I receive daily or weekly newspapers, sent to me regularly and in compliment, so I see both sides—I see all sides—and it is most entertaining and my regular amusement, to read the opposite statements. The one statement says the man is an angel, and the other says he is a devil; and I split the difference, and I find him half-way between. There never has been an honest or respectable man running for the United States Presidency, or for a judgeship, or for the mayoralty, or for the shrievalty, since the foundation of the American Government, if we may believe the old files of newspapers in the museums. What a mercy it is that they were not all hung before they were inaugurated! If a man believe one-half of what he sees in the newspapers in these times, his career will be very short outside of Bloomingdale Insane Asylum. I was absent two or three years ago during one week of a political canvass, and I was dependent entirely upon what I read in regard to what had occurred in these cities, and I read there was a procession in New York of five thousand patriots, and a minute after I read in another sheet that there were seventeen thousand; and then I read in regard to another procession that there were ten thousand, and then I read in another paper that there were sixty thousand. A campaign orator in the Rink or the Academy of Music received a very cold reception—a very chilling reception—said one statement. The other statement said the audience rose at him; so great was the enthusiam that for a long while the orator could not be heard, and it was only after lifting his hand that the vociferation began to subside! One statement will twist an interview one way, and another statement will twist an interview another way. You must admit is is a very difficult thing in times like these to get a very accurate estimate of a man's character, and I charge you, as your religious teacher, I charge you to caution and to mercifulness and to prayer.

I warn you also against the mistake which many are making, and always do make, of applying a different standard of character for those in prominent position from the standard they apply for ordinary persons. However much a man may have, or however high the position he gets, he has no especial liberty given him in the interpretation of the Ten Commandments. A great sinner is no more to be excused than a small sinner. Do not charge illustrious defection to eccentricity, or chop off the Ten Commandments to suit especial cases. The right is everlastingly right and the wrong is everlastingly wrong. If any man nominated for any office in this city or State differs from the Decalogue, do not fix up the Decalogue, but fix him up. The law must stand whatever else may fall.

I call your attention also to the fact that you are all aware of, that the breaking of one commandment makes it the more easy to break all of them, and the philosophy is plain. Any kind of sin weakens the conscience, and if the conscience is weakened, that opens the door for all kinds of transgression. If, for instance, a man go into this political campaign wielding scurrility as his chief weapon, and he believes everything bad about a man, and believes nothing good, how long before that man himself will get over the moral depression? Neither in time nor eternity. If I utter a falsehood in regard to a man I may damage him, but I get for myself ten-fold more damage. That is a gun that kicks. If, for instance, a man be profane, under provocation he will commit any crime. I say under provocation. For if a man will maltreat the Lord Almighty, would he not maltreat his fellow-man? If a man be guilty of malfeasance in office, he will, under provocation, commit any sin. He who will steal will lie, and he who will lie will steal.

If, for instance, a man be impure it opens the door for all other iniquity, for in that one iniquity he commits theft of the worst kind, and covetousness of the worst kind, and falsehood—pretending to be decent when he is not—and maltreats his parents by disgracing their name, if they were good. Be careful, therefore, how you charge that sin against any man either in high place or low place, either in office or out of office, because when you make that charge against a man you charge him with all villainies, with all all disgusting propensities, with all rottenness.

A libertine is a beast, lower than the vermin that crawl over a summer carcass—lower than the swine, for the swine has no intelligence to sin against. Be careful, then, how you charge that against any man. You must be so certain that a mathematical demonstration is doubtful as compared with it.

And, then, when you investigate a man on such subjects, you must go to the whole length of investigation, and find out whether or not he has repented. He may have been on his knees before God and implored the divine forgiveness, and he may have implored the forgiveness of society and the forgiveness of the world; although if a man commit that sin at thirty or thirty-five years of age there is not one case out of a thousand where he ever repents. You must in your investigation see if it is possible that the one case investigated may not have been the exception. But do not chop off the seventh commandment to suit the case. Do not change Fairbanks' scale to suit what you are weighing with it. Do not cut off a yardstick to suit the dry goods you are measuring. Let the law stand, and never tamper with it.

Above all, I charge you do not join in the cry that I have heard—for fifteen, twenty years I have heard it—that there is no such thing as purity. If you make that charge you are a foul-mouthed scandaler of the human race. You are a leper. Make room for that leper! When a man, by pen or type or tongue, utters such a slander on the human race that there is no such thing as purity, I know right away that that man himself is a walking lazaretto, a reeking ulcer, and is fit for no society better than that of devils damned. We may enlarge our charities in such a case, but in no such case let us shave off the Ten Commandments. Let them stand as the everlasting defence of society and of the Church of God.

The committing of one sin opens the door for the commission of other sins. You see it every day. Those embezzlers, those bank cashiers absconding as soon as they are brought to justice, develop the fact that they were in all kinds of sin. No exception to the rule. They all kept bad company, they nearly all gambled, they all went to places where they ought not. Why? The commission of the one sin opened the gate for all the other sins. Sins go in flocks, in droves, and in herds. You open the door for one sin, that invites in all the miserable segregation.

Some of the campaign orators this autumn, some of them, bombarding the suffering candidates all the week, will think no wrong in Sabbath-breaking. All the week hurling the eighth commandment at one candidate, the seventh commandment at another candidate, and the ninth commandment at still another, what are they doing with the fourth commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"? Breaking it. Is not the fourth commandment as important as the eighth, as the seventh, as the ninth? Some of these political campaign orators, as I have seen them reported in other years, and as I have heard it in regard to them, bombarding the suffering candidates all the week, yet tossing the name of God from their lips recklessly, guilty of profanity. What are they doing with the third commandment? Is not the third commandment, which says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain"—is not the third commandment as important as the other seven? Oh, yes, we find in all departments men are hurling their indignation against sins perhaps to which they are not especially tempted — hurling it against iniquity toward which they are not particularly drawn.

I have this book for my authority when I say that the man who swears or the man who breaks the Sabbath is as culpable before God as those candidates who break other commandments. What right have you and I to select which commandment we will keep and which we will break? Better not try to measure the thunderbolts of the Almighty, saying this has less blaze, this has less momentum. Better not handle the guns, better not experiment much with the divine ammunition. Cicero said he saw the Iliad written on a nut-shell, and you and I have seen the Lord's Prayer written on a five-cent piece; but the whole tendency of these times is to write the Ten Commandments so small nobody can see them. I protest this day against the attempt to revise the Decalogue which was given on Mount Sinai amid the blast of trumpets and the cracking of the rocks and the paroxysm of the mountain of Arabia Petrea.

I bring up the candidates for ward, and township, and city, and State office; I bring them up, and I try them by this Decalogue. Of course, they are imperfect. We are all imperfect. We say things we ought not to say, we do things we ought not to do. We have all been wrong, we have all done wrong. But I shall find out one of the candidates who comes, in my estimation, nearest to obedience of the Ten Commandments, and I will vote for him, and you will vote for him unless you love God less than your party; then you will not.

Herodotus said that Nitocris, the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, was so fascinated with her beautiful village of Ardericca, that she had the river above Babylon changed so it wound this way and wound that, and curved this way and curved that, and though you sailed on it for three days every day you would be in sight of that exquisite village. Now, I do not care which way you sail in morals, or which way you sail in life, if you only sail within sight of this beautiful group of divine commandments. Although they may sometimes seem to be a little angular, I do not care which way you sail, if you sail in sight of them you will never run aground and you will never be shipwrecked. Society needs toning up on all these subjects. I tell you there is nothing worse to fight than the ten regiments, with bayonets and abres of fire, marching down the side f Mount Sinai. They always gain the ictory, and those who fight against em go under. There are thousands nd tens of thousands of men being lain by the Decalogue. What is the natter with that young man of whom I ead, dying in his dissipations? In his lying delirium he said: "Now, fetch on he dice. It is mine! No, no! It is one, all is gone! Bring on more wine! Bring on more wine! Oh, how they attle their chains! Fiends, fiends, iends! I say you cheat! The cards are narked! Oh, death! oh, death! oh, eath! Fiends, fiends, fiends!" And e gasped his last and was gone. The ten Commandments slew him.

Let not ladies and gentlemen in this neteenth century revise the Ten Commandments, but let them in society and at the polls put to the front those who come the nearest to this God-lifted standard. On the first Tuesday morning in November, read the twentieth chapter of Exodus at family prayers. The moral or immoral character of the officers elected will add seventy-five per cent unto or subtract seventy-five per cent from the public morals. You and I cannot afford to have bad officials; the young men of this country cannot afford to have bad officials; the commercial, the moral, the artistic, the agricultural, the manufacturing, the religious interests of this country, cannot afford to have bad officials; and if you, on looking over the whole field, cannot find men who, in your estimation, come within reasonable distance of obedience of the Decalogue, stay at home and do not vote at all.

I suppose when in the city of Sodom there were four candidates put up for office, and Lot did not believe in any of them, he did not register. I suppose if there came a crisis in the politics of Babylon, where Daniel did not believe in any of the candidates, he stayed at home on election day, praying with his face toward Jerusalem. But we have no such crisis, we have no such exigency, thank God. But I have to say to you to-day that the moral character of rulers always affects the ruled; and I appeal to history. Wicked King Manasseh depressed the moral tone of all the nation of Judah, and threw them into idolatry. Good King Josiah lifted up the whole nation by his excellent example. Why is it that to-day England is higher up in morals than at any point in her national history? It is because she has the best ruler in all Europe, all the attempts to scandalize her name a failure. The political power of Talleyrand brooded all the political tricksters of the last ninety years. The dishonest Vice-Presidency of Aaron Burr blasted this nation until important letters were written in cipher, because the people could not trust the United States mail. And let the court circles of Louis XV. and Henry VIII. march out, followed by the debauched nations.

The higher up you put a bad man the worse is his power for evil. The great fabulist says that the pigeons were in fright at a kite flying in the air, and so these pigeons hovered near the dovecote; but one day the kite said, "Why are you so afraid? why do you pass your life in terror? make me king, and I'll destroy all your enemies." So the pigeons made the kite king, and as soon he got the throne, his regular diet was a pigeon a day. And while one of the victims was waiting for its turn to come, it said: "Served us right!" The malaria of swamps rises from the plain to the height, but moral malaria descends from the mountain to the plain. Be careful therefore, how you elevate into any style of authority men who are in any wise antagonistic to the Ten Commandments.

As near as I can tell, the most important thing now to be done is to have about forty million copies of the Sinaitic Decalogue printed and scattered throughout the land. It was a terrible waste when the Alexandrian library was destroyed, and the books were taken to heat four thousand baths for the citizens of Alexandria. It was very expensive heat. But without any harm to the Decalogue, you could with it heat a hundred thousand baths of moral purification for the American people.

I say we want a tonic—a mighty tonic—a corrective—an all-powerful corrective—and Moses in the text, with steady hand, notwithstanding the jarring mountains and the full orchestra of the tempest and the blazing of the air, pours out the ten drops—no more, no less—which our people need to take for their moral convalescence.

But I shall not leave you under the discouragement of the Ten Commandments, because we have all offended. There is another mountain in sight, and while one mountain thunders the other answers in thunder; and while Mount Sinai, with lightning, writes doom, the other mountain, with lightning, writes mercy. The only way you will ever spike the guns of the Decalogue is by the spikes of the Cross. The only rock that will ever stop the Sinaitic upheavals is the Rock of Ages. Mount Calvary is higher than Mount Sinai. The English Survey Expedition, I know, say that one Sinaitic peak is 7000 feet high and another 8000 and another 9000 feet high, and travelers tell us that Mount Calvary is only a bluff outside of the wall of Jerusalem; but Calvary in moral significance overtops and overshadows all the mountains of the hemispheres, and Mount Washington and Mont Blanc and the Himalayas are hillocks compared with it. You know that sometimes one fortress will silence another fortress. Moultrie silenced Sumter; and against the mountain of the law I put the mountain of the cross. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," booms one, until the earth jars under the cannonade. "Save them from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom," pleads the other, until earth and heaven and hell tremble under the reverberation. And Moses, who commands the one, surrenders to Christ, who commands the other.

Once by the law our hopes were slain,
But now in Christ we live again.

Aristotle says that Mount Etna erupted one day and poured torrents of scoria upon the villages at the base, but that the mountain divided its flame and made a lane of safety for all those who came to rescue their aged parents. And this volcanic Sinai divides its fury for all those whom Christ has come to rescue from the red ruin on both sides. Standing as I do to-day, half way between the two mountains—the mountain of the Exodus and the mountain of the 19th of John—all my terror comes into supernatural calm, for the uproar of the one mountain subsides into quiet, and comes down into so deep a silence that I can hear the other mountain speak—ay, I can hear it whisper: "The blood, the blood, the blood that cleanseth from all sin."

The Survey Expedition says that the Sinaitic mountains have wadys, or watercourses—Alleyat and Ajelah—emptying into Feiran. But those streams are not navigable. No boat put into those rocky streams could sail. But I have to tell you this day that the boat of Gospel rescue comes right up amid the water-courses of Sinaitic gloom and threat, ready to take us off from under the shadows into the calm sunlight of God's pardon and into the land of peace. Oh, if you could see that boat of Gospel rescue coming this day, you would feel as John Gilmore, in his book, The Storm Warriors, says that a ship's crew felt on the Kentish Knock Sands, off the coast of England, when they were being beaten to pieces and they all felt they must die! They had given up all hope, and every moment washed off another plank from the wreck, and they said, "We must die, we must die!" But after a while they saw a Ramsgate lifeboat coming through the breakers for them, and the man standing highest up on the wreck said: "Can it be? Can it be? It is, it is, it is, it is! Thank God! It is the Ramsgate lifeboat! It is, it is, it is, it is!" And the old Jack tar, describing that lifeboat to his comrades after he got ashore, said: "Oh, my lads, what a beauty it did seem, coming through the breakers that awful day!" May God, through the mercy in Jesus Christ, take us all off the miserable wreck of our sin into the beautiful lifeboat of the Gospel!

MOUNT SINAI, AND THE DESERT OF ARABIA PETREA

HINDOO HEATHEN ATROCITIES

In a recent address in England the Dean of Rochester said: "Seventy years ago the fires of Suttee were publicly blazing in the Presidency towns of Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta, and all over India—the fires of Suttee, in which the screaming and struggling widow, in many cases herself a mere child, was bound to the dead body of her husband, and with him burned to ashes. Seventy years ago infants were publicly thrown into the Ganges, as sacrifices to the goddess of the river. Seventy years ago young men and maidens, decked with flowers, were slain in Hindu temples before the hideous idol of the goddess Kali, or hacked to pieces in the Meras, that their quivering flesh might be given to propitiate the god of the soil. Seventy years ago the cars of Juggernaut were rolling over India, crushing hundreds of human victims annually beneath their wheels. Seventy years ago lepers were burned alive, devotees publicly starved themselves to death, children brought their parents to the banks of the Ganges and hastened their deaths by filling their mouths with the sand and water of the sacred river. For these scenes, which disgraced India seventy years ago, we may now look in vain. And need I remind you that every one of these changes for the better is due directly or indirectly to missionary enterprise and the spirit of Christianity. It was Christian missionaries, and those who sent them out, who denounced these tremendous evils. Branded as fanatics, and satirised as fools, they ceased not until one by one these hideous hallucinations were suppressed."

CROCODILE WORSHIP

Some of the heathen tribes of Madagascar invoke the forbearance of crocodiles, or seek protection with charms, rather than attack them. In all heathen lands respect is paid to them, and savages are everywhere reluctant to kill them. According to the natives, they will seize white flesh in preference to black or brown; but a dog is asserted to be the caiman's bonne bouche. One of the innumerable curious sights of India is the Nuggar tank of Kurachi. In former times, the crocodiles which inhabit it roamed the neighbourhood at their will, but so great were their depredations that the authorities were forced to build a wall round their haunt. In this tank one observer counted two hundred reptiles, from eight to fifteen feet long, and smaller ones innumerable. "The whole appearance of the place," says one writer, "with its green, slimy, stagnant water, and so many of these huge uncouth monsters moving sluggishly about, is disgusting in the extreme, and it will long be remembered by me as the most loathsome that I ever beheld."

THE GRACE OF LIBERALITY.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 12. II Cor 8: 1-12 Golden Text, II. Cor. 8: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE grace of liberality! Thank God that there are Christians who see that giving is something more than a duty, such as the giving of tithes exacted by the law, that it is, in its very essence, a grace, a something that comes from God. "All things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee." (I. Chron. 29: 14.) It is not peculiar to the present day that the poor are the best givers. Paul writing, to the wealthy Corinthians of whom he had never asked or received help for his own maintenance while residing and working about two years among them, cites the Macedonian churches as an example to them. "Moreover, brethren," he writes, "we make known to you the grace of God which hath been given in the churches of Macedonia, how that in much proof of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality."

How many people in comfortable circumstances have made the excuse, just when they were passing through some special affliction, or just when they had sustained some special loss, that this was not the time in which they could give, and they have felt themselves justified in withholding help from the distinct work of spreading the Gospel at home or abroad! Yet it was just under such circumstances Paul tells us that the Macedonian churches "abound unto the riches of their liberality." Whether the was reckoned according to the amount given, or according to the spirit in which it was given, we cannot be sure; but he who searcheth the hearts found in the churches of Macedonia, especially in that of Philippi, the grace which could pass current with him for liberality. The Philippian church was the only one which had communicated with Paul about giving and receiving; the only one which seemed to understand that a man of God who bore on his heart the burden of souls, and the care of all the churches, needed to be set free somewhat from the necessity of always working for his living, that he might have more time to be alone with God, and to preach the Gospel. This very same church, in addition to the care of Paul, took the lead also in the collection made among the Gentile churches for the poor saints at Jerusalem.

The grace of liberality in our day is a question of great difficulty, and one in which we need be very careful to follow the the leadings of God's Spirit, lest we err on the right hand or on the left. There are so many "disorderly" Christians, as Paul calls them, who are a kind of parasites, living on those who work honestly for their bread, or those who are called by a special grace of God to abandon their earthly cares to him. These make gain of the people's faith, and count it a wrong done to them if they are not maintained in idleness, although the very habitual mention of their need is proof enough that they are living no life of faith, but a life of expectation from the creature, an expectation for which the Bible gives no warrant. Besides these there are the habitual hypocrites, who are to be found attached to every church and mission, who institute a claim upon the charity of such a church or mission by the fact that they attend the services, and they assert [illegible]

The Christian is placed in a difficulty. He feels a kind of intuition that these imperious claimants are not those to whom he should give what God has intrusted to him, yet he may feel it difficult to refuse them and to make them his enemies. If he does give to them he is short the amount he has given them, to give to the work of God which has been laid upon his heart, and thus he is unfaithful in his stewardship. He cannot entirely prove the insincerity of the claimants, he suspects them and yet blames himself for his suspicion, lest, after all he should be mistaken. What can be done then? First, how do we stand in regard to our possessions? Have we the spirit of the primitive Christians, when none of them claimed "that ought of the things which he possessed was his own," (Acts 4: 32), and when they that bought were as though they possessed not? It is really a matter in which we have no choice how any of our possessions shall be disposed of? Is our oneness with the Lord such that we only want his will and have no desire such as Ananias and Sapphira to keep a little nest egg against a rainy day, lest the Lord should fail to provide? If it is so, then we may be sure that God will guide us if we let ourselves be guided, and he will give us a something that holds us back if we would give to those whom he would have to work for their living. And if they cover us with reproaches as those people mostly do who caricature faith life, we can afford to let the Lord answer for us. Only let us beware that Satan does not make use of these people to create within us a hardness of heart and suspiciousness which cannot come from God.

When once we are sure that it is of God we should give to such and such a Christian work then

"How Much shall we Give?"

This is a question which He only can answer to whom all belongs, if we are really, and not only professedly stewards, we shall find that the Lord will guide us in the most intimate way in this matter, and if it seems to us we have nothing to give, it is wonderful how out of nothing God can make something. Paul, speaking of the Macedonian churches, says: "For according to their power, I bear witness yea and beyond their power, they gave of their own accord beseeching us with much intreaty in regard of this grace, and the fellowship in the ministering to the saints." Such a joy was in these early Christians to strip themselves for the work of God. "And this, not as we had hoped, but first they gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us by the will of God." Here was the secret; themselves given, no longer their own, themselves a living sacrifice, how could they longer hold on to anything which had been theirs, all they were, and all they had, had passed out of their hands into the service of their Master.

It was just this whole-heartedness of the poor Macedonian Christians by which Paul sought to stir up the rich Corinthians—he desired to see in them "this grace also." Therefore as ye abound in everything, in faith, in utterance, in knowledge and in all diligence, see that ye abound in this grace also. Paul counts true Christian liberality as a proof of true Christian consecration. How can it be otherwise? Surely it is unbelief in God or else it must be selfishness which would make us cling to anything we possess down here! In the light of our Lord's return, we do not want to be weighed down by earthly possessions. He speaks of it also as a proof of the sincerity of their love to Christ, and he appeals to them: "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes that ye through his poverty might be rich!" Such a plea takes away every thought of mine and thine. How can such a thought as personal renunciation enter our hearts for a single moment in sight of the Cross of Jesus? Surely he who has redeemed us with his precious blood has a full right to all which he has purchased! A year had elapsed since the subject of ministering to the poor saints of Jerusalem had been first named to the Corinthians (1. Cor. 16: 1-3.) Now therefore, he says, "perform the doing of it, that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have: for if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." Our God is a Father, he never looks for impossibilities from his children, a willing mind is the first necessity. The "willing mind," the giving first ourselves to the Lord makes it a possible thing for him to accept gifts at such hands as ours; otherwise it will ill become us to offer, or him to accept them. But let no one think that he can put God under an obligation in giving to him. All the beasts of the forest are mine, he says, and so are the cattle upon a thousand hills. .. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee, for the world is mine and the fulness thereof." The heathen think to accumulate merit by their gifts, but David saw things in the true light when he said: "But who am I, and what is my people that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? (1. Chron. 29: 14) It is an unspeakable grace in God that he will take anything we offer, and it is grace given to us that we have the heart to give, all is from him from first to last.

THE WIDOW'S GIFT.

CHRISTIAN giving, as it should be practised, is described in the verses which form the subject of this week's lesson. It is easy to infer from the Apostle's words, that the Church at Corinth had made some very liberal promises of a collection for the Jewish poor when he was there; but that Titus, with his other bad news, had brought intelligence that little or none of the money had been paid. Paul is distressed, for, regarding their promises as certain of fulfilment, he had boasted to other churches of the liberality of the Corinthian Christians. Now, as he was about to visit Corinth again and some of the members of the churches to whom he had boasted might come with him, he would feel ashamed of his boasting, if the money was not ready, and the church would have reason to feel ashamed, too. What he says about giving, is still pertinent. It is a grace; it should follow self-consecration; it is a proof of sincerity; it had been inculcated by the example of Christ; and it should be done willingly, systematically and in proportion to the wealth of the givers. Further on in the same epistle, he encourages them to give, by the assurance that it is pleasing to God and will surely be blessed by him. We are not told in the New Testament what was the result of this appeal, but it was probably disappointing. The church at Corinth was a disappointing church. All through this epistle there is evidence of the fact. It is easy to read between the lines and see that the Apostle was pained by the conduct of the members. The tone of the first nine chapters is one of tender, gentle admonition. Farrar thinks that when Paul had written thus far, some one else came from Corinth, not only confirming the disagreeable report of Titus, but giving other bad news. The tone changes in the latter chapters, becomes stern, self-assertive and reproachful. Evidently the Apostle had learned that a party hostile to himself personally was being formed. Some enemy was at Corinth, bent on depreciating Paul. Doubts had been cast on his credentials as an Apostle; and the church was reminded that he had not seen the Lord and might be misrepresenting his teaching. Even his personal appearance had been ridiculed and as for his speaking—why it was contemptible. Paul was evidently deeply hurt and in vindicating himself shows plainly that he thinks the painful duty ought not to have been necessary.

Poverty abounded unto riches. The cause of foreign missions received a large and unexpected accession of funds in England a few years ago through an old woman's gift of a sixpence. A party of wealthy men was gathered around the table of a leader of society, at breakfast. Among them was the secretary of a missionary society who related an incident. He said that an old Scotch woman whose practice it was to give a penny a day for missions, was visited by some acquaintance of former days, who learning that she lived on oatmeal porridge, and seldom tasted meat, gave her sixpence to buy some. The old woman thought to herself, "I have long done very well on my porridge, so I will give the sixpence also to God." The host and his guests were profoundly impressed by the incident, the host himself saying that he had never denied himself any luxury for the cause of God. He therefore instantly subscribed $2500 additional, and others of the party followed his example, till a large sum was raised before they separated. That was the harvest of the old woman's small gift. There is nothing so fruitful as self-sacrifice.

First gave their own selves to the Lord. When this is done wholly the giving of money and service becomes an easy matter. But there is too often a reservation in self-surrender. When the people of Collatia were negotiating an unconditional capitulation to the Romans, Egerius, on the part of the Romans, inquired of the ambassadors, "Are the people of Collatia in their own power?" When an affirmative answer was given, it was next inquired, "Do you deliver up yourselves, the people of Collatia, your city, your fields, your waters, your boundaries, your temples, your utensils, all your property, divine and human, into my power, and the power of the Roman people?" "We surrender all." "And so," said he, "I accept you."

To prove the sincerity of your love. It should not be forgotten that liberality in giving was the Apostolic mode of proving whether a man really loved Christ or not. A story is told of an agent of a well known society which had the confidence of the churches, that there being a special urgent need he went on a collecting tour. He was entertained one night by the owner of an old mansion, who was noted for his parsimony. The agent was told that the owner would like to offer him a bed for the night, but every room was full except a chamber that had the reputation of being haunted. The agent said he had no objection to occupying it. He was told that the ghost would surely disturb his rest and was asked what he would do. "Oh," said he, "I shall offer him my collection book. My experience is that a man is not worried by many people anxious to become acquainted with him when he is known to be soliciting money."

Dr. Judson applied the test to a Karen convert. He wrote: A Karen woman offered herself for baptism. After the usual examination, I inquired whether she could give up her ornaments for Christ. It was an unexpected blow. I explained the spirit of the Gospel; I appealed to her own consciousness of vanity; I read to her the Apostle's prohibition (1. Tim. 2: 9). She looked again and again to her handsome necklace; and then, with an air of modest decision that would adorn beyond all ornaments any Christian in the land, she took it off, saying, "I love Christ more than this."

For your sakes he became poor. Gifts of money are not always the wisest or most effectual way of helping the poor. The example of Christ which the apostle here commends to his readers consisted in personal humiliation and personal sacrifice. An instance of beneficence more closely following that example than charity usually does, is that of a lady who, at the close of the war, quitted fashionable life went to a sandy island off the Atlantic coast, where about two hundred persons were living in poverty and ignorance, and established her home there, with the intention of benefiting the inhabitants. She began with teaching, by example, how to cultivate the land lucratively, and was imitated. Next she established a school for the children, and afterwards a church. Now the island is in a thriving region, with an industrious and moral population, the change being the work of one woman.

According to that a man hath. Few people are in the habit of giving systematically. The Bible rule under the old dispensation was to give a tenth of the income and it certainly ought not to be less under the new dispensation. Hohannes, the blind missionary of Harpoot, tells of a place where the Board had spent much money with little result. To this place he was sent. The people were to raise 600 piastres, and the Board to pay the balance of his salary. The people, who were extremely poor, said they could not raise so large a sum; while a neighboring pastor declared it was impossible for them to do it. All this gave the missionary great anxiety. He determined, however, to remain and take what was given. He called the people together and asked them each to give a tenth part of his income. The people agreed; and the entire sum, with a surplus to spare, was easily raised.

WORKERS IN COUNCIL.

special train will leave Jersey City, N.J., via the Pennsylvania, Richmond & Danville Railroad at eleven o'clock on the morning of Nov. 6, reaching Washington the same evening. Special services will be held in several Washington churches for the delegates. At eleven the following morning, when delegates from New England, Canada and other sections will have arrived, the train leaves Washington. Arrangements have been made for visits to various battlefields, including Bull Run, Kennesaw Mountain, Allatoona Heights and Sherman's battlefields. The delegate's expenses from New York for the round trip will be about thirty-five dollars. All particulars may be obtained by addressing Rev. John C Collins, Blair Building, New Haven, Conn.

The arrangements for the convention are in charge of a local executive committee, the chairman of which is the distinguished statesman who is now Governor of Georgia—the Hon. William J. Northen. This is by no means the first time that Gov. Northen, whose portrait we give, has taken a prominent part in religious assemblies. He has for eight years been the Moderator of the Washington Baptist Association, and has in many other ways manifested his interest in Christian work. He comes of an old Scotch family whose representative came to this country nearly two centuries ago and settled in North Carolina. Subsequently the family removed to Georgia, where the Governor was born some fifty-eight years ago. In his young days he was noted as a successful educator, and succeeded Dr. Carlisle Beman in the charge of the famous Mount Zion High School. He distinguished himself in the war, and at its close served his State in various political positions. He was also a trustee of Mercer University and of the Washington Institute. In 1890 the citizens of his State conferred upon him the highest honor in their gift by electing him Governor.

HON. WILLIAM J. NORTHEN, GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA.

Valuable as is the function of the Association of Christian Workers in bringing together once a year so many distinguished servants of Christ for mutual helpfulness, this service by no means comprises all its functions. It has charge of what is called a Bureau of Supplies, which is organized to supply Christian workers of all kinds with the various appliances needed in their work. Chief among these are the various kinds of Gospel wagons and push carts which are constructed to furnish a suitable platform for speakers, a place for the portable organ, and other conveniencies From the Bureau of Supplies may also be obtained the complete apparatus for the boys' clubs, floral cards for Sunday-schools and children's mission schools, contribution cards, and many different books helpful to workers in various spheres. The Association was called into existence at the first Convention, held in Chicago in 1886 At that Convention the benefit derived from the consultation of so many Christian workers of different denominations and different spheres of labor was so evident that a committee was appointed to call another Convention and "to do such other work as it might think wise for the advancement of special forms of aggressive Christian effort among those not reached by the ordinary ministrations of the Church." This committee afterward organized the Association by the addition of co-operating and sustaining members, who paid a small fee to furnish an income for office and clerical expenses. The affairs of the Association are conducted by the ten persons, whose portraits we publish, who form the Managing Committee. A more representative body of workers it would be difficult to get together. Drawn from various classes, with very varied experiences, they are united in the dominant object of their lives, the winning of souls for Christ.

Rev. S. P. Holcombe, whose portrait is No. 1 in the group, was formerly Superintendent of the Union Gospel Mission in Louisville, Ky., and is now engaged in evangelistic work. In his younger days he was one of the most notorious gamblers in Louisville, and since his conversion he has devoted himself largely to the reclamation of that class of men.

Miss Bertha H. Wright, No. 2 in the group, has served four years on the committee. She is an Episcopalian, and has done valuable work in Ottawa in connection with that church by gathering in the working girls of the city for religious education. She commenced with a small class of seven girls which now has a membership of over two hundred; a Young Women's Christian Association has been organized, and a home for friendless women established. Beside this, she conducts a regularly organized system of rescue work which has had marvellous success. The expenses of her various institutions have sometimes aggregated five hundred dollars a month, but the need has always been promptly met by the citizens of Ottawa, who know the value of the work she is doing.

Mrs. J. K. Barney, whose portrait occupies panel No. 3, is famous for her work in connection with the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She is one of the Union's most effective speakers and has visited every section of the country in her advocacy of the cause. A few years ago her average yearly record of travel was thirty thousand miles, and most of it was at her own expense. It was mainly through her earnest and persistent efforts that the appointment of matrons at police stations has become so general.

Panel No. 4 contains the portrait of Mr. John F. Barclay, who conducts the successful Gospel Mission on Marrietta street, Atlanta, Ga.

The fifth in the group is the distinguished Canadian philanthropist — thrice mayor of Toronto — Hon. W.H. Howland, who is Vice-President of the Association. Under Mr. Howland's administration Toronto won the position of being the city in which the Lord's Day was observed more generally and scrupulously than in any other city in the world. The moral tone of the city also generally improved under his sway. Although a busy and successful business man, Mr. Howland finds time for gospel work among the neglected classes and is at the head of several philanthropic organizations.

MANAGING COMMITTEE OF THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY.

1. Rev. S. P. Holcombe.
2. Miss Bertha H. Wright.
3. Mrs. J. K. Barney.
4. Mr. John E. Barclay.
5. Hon. Wm. H. Howland.
6. Rev. David A. Reed.
7. Rev. B. Fay Mills.
8. Mr. L. P. Tibbals.
9. Rev. R. A. Torrey.
10. Rev. John C. Collins.

Rev. David Allen Reed is the intimate associate of Mr. Moody and secretary of his school for young men at Northfield. He was for many years pastor of Hope Church at Springfield, Mass., which has been the mother of several other churches. Mr. Reed founded the Springfield School for Christian Workers, whose object it is to train young men for Sunday-school work and for assistant pastors. He has also established an Industrial and Technical School for practical instruction in various callings. The demands of those two institutions became so engrossing that Mr Reed recently resigned his pastorate that he might devote to them all his time.

Rev. B. Fay Mills is too well known to need any introduction to our readers. His evangelistic labors have made him honored and loved in every section of the country.

Mr. L. P. Tibbals, whose portrait is in the eighth panel, has done a grand work in New York with his cheap lodging houses. Many a man, decent and respectable, but temporarily stranded, has thanked God for putting it into the heart of Mr. Tibbals to open those houses in various parts of the city, where for a few cents he can have cleanly accommodation for the night. Many a man, too, ruined and undone, has in seeking a night's rest there found through the kindly sympathy and help given him the way to a new start upward in the moral and social scale.

Rev. R. A. Torrey, our readers already know, through the sketch published in this journal last January in our description of the Bible Institute in Chicago. Mr. Torrey is chairman of the Association of Christian Workers, and has occupied that position from the beginning of its existence.

Rev. John C. Collins is the secretary and chief executive. He was practically the founder and originator of the Association, and he has labored enthusiastically and indefatigably for its success. He is about forty-three years of age and is a graduate of Yale. His first work was done in the city missionary field at New Haven, Conn. In that work he gained an intimate and extensive knowledge of the needs of the people and set himself energetically to supply them. He conducted attractive services on Sunday evenings in a hall in the centre of the city, attended the police courts to talk with the prisoners, and visited the people in their homes. The work, however, which he most loves, and that in which his success has been phenomenal, is his work among young people. One of his happiest ideas was that of a Boys' Club, to which a penny savings bank is attached. This idea has now extended to other cities, and during the past four years nearly twenty thousand boys of the street have thus been brought under Christian influence.

Such is the Committee which has charge of the affairs of the International Association of Christian Workers. Their qualifications for their duties are not in their adherence to creed, or in their partisan denominationalism, but in their sympathy with every one who is in any way serving Christ by helping the needy. That sympathy is cordially given whether the help rendered is to the body or the soul. They believe that Christianity was intended by its Divine Founder to be a many-sided blessing to the world and that he is a true follower of the Master who is engaged in assisting the poor, in alleviating the sorrows of the distressed, as fully as he who is preaching the Gospel. Thus they strive to bring into contact and communication the workers in all fields. They make no inquiries as to the denomination to which a worker belongs before extending to him fraternal welcome. If he is on the side of Christ, if he is trying in any way to fulfil Christ's injunction of helpfulness, they recognize him as a brother, rejoice with him over his success, advise with him about his difficulties, encourage him to new effort and pray to God to strengthen him and bless him. The existence and progress of such an association is one of the most cheering signs of the times.

THE WORLD'S REFUGE

THE whole world will at last come into the refuge of Christ. The windows of heaven will be opened; God's trumpet of salvation will sound, and China will come from its tea-fields and rice-harvests, into the light. India will come forth, the chariots of salvation jostling to pieces her Juggernauts. Freezing Greenland, and sweltering Abyssinia, will, side by side, press into the kingdom; and transformed Bornesian cannibal preach of the resurrection of the missionary he has slain. The glory of Calvary will tinge the tip of the Pyrenees; and Lebanon cedars shall clap their hands; and by one swing of the sickle Christ shall harvest nations for the skies. In the rush of the winds that set the forest in motion, like giants wrestling on the hills, we see the tossing up of the triumphal branches that shall wave all along the line of our King as he comes to take empire. In the stormy diapason of the ocean's organ, and the more gentle strains that in the calm come sounding up from the crystal and jasper keys at the beach, we hear the prophecy: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God as the waters fill the sea."

CONCERNING ESCAPADES.

I KNOW of a few cases where marriage has been under the red-hot anathema of parents and all the neighbors, but God approved, and the homes established have been beautiful and positively Edenic.

But while we may admit that there are real cases of justifiable rebellion, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—yea, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, these unlicensed departures and decampments by moonlight are ruin, temporal and eternal. It is safer for a woman to jump off the docks of the East River and depend on being able to swim to the other shore, or get picked up by a ferry-boat. The possibilities are that she may be rescued, but the probability is that she will not. Read the story of the escapades in the newspapers for the last ten years, and find me half a dozen that do not mean poverty, disgrace, abandonment, police court, divorce, death and hell. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there." Satan presides over the escapade. He introduces the two parties to each other. He gets them to pledge their troth. He appoints where they shall meet. He shows them where they can find officiating minister or squire. He points out to them the ticket-office for the railroad train. He puts them aboard, and when they are going at forty miles an hour, he jumps off and leaves them in the lurch; for, while Satan has a genius for getting people into trouble, he has no genius for getting people out. He induced Jonah to take ship for Tarshish when God told him to go to Nineveh, but provided for the recreant prophet no better landing-place than the middle of the Mediterranean Sea.

The modern novel is responsible for many of these abscondings. Do you think that young women would sit up half a night reading novels in which the hero and heroine get acquainted in the usual way, and carry on their increased friendliness until, with the consent of parents, the day of marriage is appointed, and amid the sorrounding group of kindred, the vows are taken? Oh, no! There must be flight, and pursuit, and narrow escape, and drawn dagger, all ending in sunshine, and parental forgiveness, and bliss unalloyed and gorgeous. In many of the cases of escapades the idea was implanted in the hot brain of the woman by a cheap novel—ten cents' worth of unadulterated perdition.

These evasions of the ordinary modes of marriage are to be deplored for the reason that nearly all of them are proposed by bad men. If the man behaves well, he has a character to which he can refer, and he can say: "If you want to inquire about me, there is a list of names of people in the town or neighborhood where I live." No; the heroes of escapades are nearly all either bigamists, or libertines, or drunkards, or defrauders, or first-class scoundrels of some sort. They have no character to lose. They may be dressed in the height of fashion, may be cologned, and pomatumed, and padded, and diamond-ringed, and flamboyant-cravated, until they bewitch the eye and intoxicate the olfactories; but they are double-distilled extracts of villainy, moral dirt and blasphemy. Beware of them. "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. But he knoweth not that the dead are there."

INDIAN SUMMER.

SUMMER with fever heats has perished, and we twist a wreath of scarlet sage and China asters for her brow, and bury her under the scattered rose leaves, while we beat amid the woods and by the water courses this solemn dirge: "The summer is ended!" Those in this world who are far advanced in years, were once just like ourselves. There was a time when they could hardly bridle their exuberance. They laughed, they romped, they shouted, they sang. The world was as bright to them then as it is to us now. Though they are in the November of life now, it was June with them once. They take with placidity things that once would have made them blaze with indignation. Sometimes they may chide us because of our vivacity; but when two or three of the aged get together, I have overheard them talk in the next room about occurrences that make me believe that when they were of our age, they were just like us. How fast they did drive. What strong wrestlers they brought to the earth. In what a wilful mood they upset the sleigh, to see the victims crawl out of the snow-bank. How many "frolics" there were, and how many "quiltings." The aged do not talk much to us about these things. They wonder why we are not as cool as they are. Ah! the dear souls forget that July is never as cool as November.

In this climate, in the latter part of October, or the first of November, there is a season of beautiful weather called Indian summer. It is the gem of all the year. A haziness is in the atmosphere, but still everything is pleasant and mild. And so I see before me in life some who have come to that season. There is a haziness on their vision, I know, but the sweetness of heaven has melted into their soul. I congratulate those who have come to the Indian summer of their life. Their grandchildren climb up on the back of the chair, and run their fingers along the wrinkles which time has for a long while been burrowing there. In sunny afternoons, grandfather goes out in the churchyard and sees on the tombstones, the names, the very names that sixty years ago he wrote on his slate at school. He looks down where his children sleep their last sleep, and before the tears have fallen, says: "So much more in heaven!" Patiently he awaits his appointed time until his life goes out gently as a tide, and the bell tolls him to his last home under the shadow of the church that he loved so long and loved so well. Blessed old age, if it be found in the way of righteousness!

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD having old libraries or other literature suited to Sunday Schools, can send the same to Mrs. W. F. Bidwell, Wetmore, Nemaha Co., Kan., where they will be greatly appreciated.

Subscriber, Philadelphia. 1. Please inform me where Peter says some of Paul's Epistles are hard to understand. 2. Has Dr. Carl Peters written his African article for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD yet?

1. See II. Peter 3: 16. 2. No.

J. E. D., Georgetown, Del. What is your belief in regard to shouting and leaping in Divine service?

See answer to Julius P. Albroe, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD "Mail Bag," issue of Aug. 2 last.

Mrs. J. S. Garr, Alexander, Iowa. What is meant by the words "this generation" in Matt 24: 34?

The generation of which Christ had been speaking. The generation which saw the beginning of the events would witness the close when he would appear in his glory.

Subscriber. 1 By whom, and when was the colony of Liberia founded and what are its area and population? 2. Who is the author of "Home Sweet Home." 3 What is the sin unto death, which Paul says we are not to pray for?

1. It was founded in 1822 by American philanthropists (the American Colonization Society.) Its area is 24,000 square miles; population at last official estimate, 18,000 civilized negroes chiefly of American origin and 1,050,000 natives, of whom some are still half savage and some conform to civilized customs. 2. John Howard Payne. 3. Indicate the passage.

Arthur Drew, Howell, Mich. Did the ancient Jews believe in the immortality of the soul?

While the belief is nowhere directly stated in the early Jewish writings there are many passages which appear to indicate that it was general. The laws in the Pentateuch against holding communication with the dead imply a prevalent belief that the soul lived on after the death of the body. Saul's application to the witch of Endor (I. Samuel 28), shows that he believed in the continued existence of the soul. In Heb. 21: 16 the statement is made that the patriarchs expected to enter a heavenly country. Christ also referred to the belief as existing in the days of Moses. (See Luke 20: 37.)

Subscriber, Berkshire, N. Y. 1. Is the age of Paul at the time of his conversion known? 2. Why did he spend three years in Arabia? 3. How many years was he in active service for Christ? 4. Was Agrippa in jest when he said "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian"? 5. It has been reported that Dr. Talmage is a millionaire. Is this the truth?

1. He is supposed to have been between 30 and 40, but his age at that time cannot be accurately fixed. 2. Stanley suggests that he may have visited Sinai. The accepted inference is that before entering on his mission as an Apostle he sought seclusion in order that by conferring "not with flesh and blood," but with the Spirit, he might receive more deeply in his mind the commission given him at his conversion. 3. Biblical writers fix the date of his conversion at 37 A. D., and the traditional date of his death at 66 A. D., making the approximate duration of his Christian service twenty-nine years, less three years of seclusion. 4. It is generally supposed to have been spoken ironically. 5. No.

Geo. Gray, Pittsburg, Pa. I am superintendent of a small Mission Sabbath School near this city. Last Sunday being "Mission Day," I engaged a quartette of music (1 cornet, 1 violin, 1 trombone, and 1 clarinet, to accompany us in the hymns. Some of our teachers held that it was a sin to have them play on Sunday and consequently staved away from Sabbath School on account of the music. What do you think of music as an adjunct to Sabbath School?

The proper use of music in divine worship is authorized not only by Scripture but by a host of ancient and modern examples. In the Bible, we read frequently of the timbrel, harp, psaltery, dulcimer and other instruments being used in the Lord's service. To-day, in about every city in Europe and America, instrumental music is a prominent feature of worship. As to Sunday Schools, Mr. Wanamaker's has an instrumental band, Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle Sunday School is led by cornet and organ, Mr. Yatman's great revival meetings have a brass band. So long as the music is of a sacred character and rendered in a consecrated spirit it cannot be harmful, in either church or Sunday School.

E. V. T. Scottsburg, Oregon. How many Christians are there in the world?

This is not to be answered by figures, since God alone knoweth the heart. According to Schem's Statistics of the World, however, there are 420,000,000, and according to Sir Monier Williams of England, 430,000,000. In the United States there are about 23,000,000 members of Christian Churches of all denominations, and 20,000,000 (estimated) adherents.

H. G. Cronk, Apopka, Florida. Who were the writers of the Book of Judges, Ruth, 1-2 Samuel, 1-2 Kings and 1-2 Chronicles? I have the names of the writers of all the other Books in the Bible.

Judges is supposed to have been written by Samuel; the authorship of Ruth is uncertain; I. and II. Samuel are attributed to Samuel, both being edited after his death; the authorship of Kings is unknown; Ezra is supposed to have penned the Chronicles. Our correspondent is remarkably fortunate if he has the names of the writers of "all the other books," as the most eminent Biblical scholars have been unable thus far to decide their authorship.

J. A. Westervelt, Sprakers, N. Y. Is it possible for any for whom Christ died to be lost through the neglect of another?

The subject of predestination is too large for discussion in this place. Apart from that aspect of the question, your own experience and observation will convince you that many who die of their sins might have been saved if the Gospel had been earnestly and faithfully presented to them. The heathen abroad and the heathen in the slums of our great cities are cases in point. The success which of late years has attended the efforts to reach both classes justifies the belief that had those efforts been made as earnestly in former years, many who have been lost might have been saved, and the same principle applies to individual effort.

Mrs. M. C. Mansfield, Lexington, O. Is it wrong for Christians to wear their best clothes to church?

The expression, "best clothes," is one whose meaning changes according to the circumstances of the individual and the station in life. Modest and becoming garments should be worn to the house of the Lord, and not clothing of a character so pronounced that it will distract the attention of other worshipers. No true Christian will indulge the vanity that makes a display of dress, and especially in church. At the same time, scriptural precedents instruct us to honor the service of the Lord by appearing before him in clean garments. When the high priest entered the sanctuary he put on "holy garments" of clean white linen, and the clothing of the priests worn in the temple service, was also sanctified. This was doubtless intended not only as a part of the service itself, but as an example to the congregation. See also the very plain injunction in 1. Peter 3: 3, 4.

TWO EMINENT FRENCHMEN DEAD.

FRANCE has suffered the loss of two of her distinguished sons in one week. On October 17 died Marshal MacMahon the famous general and second President of the Republic, on the following day died Charles Francis Gounod, the famous musical composer. Marshal MacMahon was eight-five years of age. He was the descendant of an old Irish family whose undying allegiance to the House of Stuart cost it its estates and finally involved it in exile. The family followed the last of the Stuarts to France and settled there. The late Marshal was educated at St. Cyr, and after his graduation joined the army. He distinguished himself in Algiers and rose so rapidly in rank that in 1848, when he was under forty years of age, he was Brigadier General. He further distinguished himself in the Crimean War by leading the French column in storming the Malakoff, which was the key of the Russian position at Sebastopol. In the war against Austria in 1859, he also did splendid service. Napoleon III. made him a Duke and gave him a Field Marshal's baton. In the Franco-German war he was defeated and severely wounded at Sedan. He loyally supported M. Thiers in reorganizing the army and the country, and on M. Thiers resigning the Presidency in 1873, MacMahon was almost unanimously elected. He held the office until 1879, when he resigned. Since that time he lived in retirement, engaged chiefly on the writing of a history of his times. Gounod, who is best known as the composer of Faust was seventy-five years old. His musical genius manifested itself in his childhood and he was sent to Italy at the expense of the French government to cultivate it. While there, he produced several sacred pieces of some merit, but little was heard of his talent until 1851, when he produced his Sappho. Six years later his greatest achievement, Faust, was given to the world, and all Europe rang with his praise. He afterward produced several Oratorios and Operettas, but it is on his Faust that his fame rests. He had been living for some time in retirement when an attack of apoplexy prostrated him, from which he did not recover. Like the brave soldier on the previous day, he was conquered by the universal enemy against whom there is no defence either in fame, or power, or genius, but over whom the humblest Christian may triumph through Christ. (I Cor. 15: 54-57).

A Dispute Over a Cemetery Lot.

A painful dispute took place a few days ago at a funeral at Hempstead, L. I. The funeral was that of a child, and the mourning parents and friends followed the body to the cemetery. On their arrival, they found that no grave had been prepared to receive it. The authorities at the cemetery informed them that their family lot had been exchanged for another in a different part of the cemetery. The parents insisted that the lot belonged to them, that one of their children was already interred there, and that no exchange had taken place. They remembered that a year ago a lady came to them and offered to purchase the lot, or to give them in exchange a lot belonging to her in another part of the cemetery, but they declared that they had never entertained the offer. On the other hand, the lady claimed that they had consented to the exchange, and the cemetery authorities, although unable to find any documentary evidence of the fact, say that the exchange would not have been recorded on their books if the original owners had not given their consent. The difficulty stopped the funeral ceremony, and the body of the child was taken to the receiving vault, where it will have to remain until the dispute is settled. It is well for the child that it is the destination of his body only that is in question. He will suffer no detriment by it remaining in its temporary abode, however long the dispute may continue. Happily, the destination of a soul is not so determined, or many men who are safe in heaven would have been long kept out, if they were not excluded altogether. (II. Timothy 2: 9.)

An Author's Delirium.

The curious and distressing fancies which torture a man in the delirium of fever are graphically described in a letter recently sent by Mr. Robert Louis Stephenson, the famous novelist, to a friend. He says: "During an illness at Nice I lay awake a whole night in extreme pain. From the beginning of the evening one part of my mind became possessed of a grotesque notion. I thought the pain was connected with a wisp or coil of some sort. I knew naught of what it consisted, nor yet where it was, and cared not; only I thought, if the two ends were brought together, the pain would cease. Now, all the time with another part of my mind, which I venture to think was myself, I was fully alive to the absurdity of this idea, knew it to be a mark of impaired sanity, and was engaged with my other self in a perpetual conflict. Myself had nothing more at heart than to keep from my wife, who was nursing me, any hint of this ridiculous hallucination; the other was bound that she should be told of it. I believe it must have been well on in the morning before the fever (or the other fellow) triumphed, and I called my wife to my bedside, seized her savagely by the wrist, and, looking on her with a face of fury, cried, 'Why do you not put the two ends together and put me out of pain?' I have called the one person myself, and the other the other fellow. It was myself who spoke and acted; the other fellow seemed to have no control of the body or the tongue; he could only act through myself, on whom he brought to bear a heavy strain." The experience must have been very distressing, and was doubtless due to the great man's brain being temporarily enfeebled by the fever. A similar result is produced when the moral powers are enfeebled by habitual sin, and the man says, "What I would that do I not, but what I hate that do I." (Rom. 7: 15.)

The Capital of the Cherokee Strip.

The extraordinary progress of a town in the recently opened Cherokee Strip is described in a letter from a newspaper reporter, who went there in the rush as a settler. He says that in Perry, which is the capital of the Strip, there are nearly a thousand contested claims. Some of the lots have sixteen claimants, who are awaiting the arrival of the Commissioners from Washington to adjudicate the claims. The town has a population of 15,000. It lies one hundred and fifteen miles south of Wichita, Kan., in the most fertile and picturesque portion of the Cherokee Strip. It was built in a day. In three weeks the improvements have been wonderful. Thousands of tents and rough board buildings are scattered along the broad streets and avenues. Every one is used for business. Already six daily newspapers and two weeklies have been started. There were more lives lost in dispute over claims than were ever reported. Some of the contests were very fierce and in more than one case both of the contestants were killed in the fight for the possession of a lot. One dispute ended more agreeably. There were only two claimants to that lot and as one was a bachelor and the other an unmarried woman they concluded not to wait for the Commissioners, but to combine their claims by marriage. They are busy cultivating their claim, not caring whether the Commissioners decide that it belongs to the husband or to the wife. This was an exceptional case, not many of the disputes could be adjusted in that way. If, however, Christ's teachings were literally obeyed by his followers, the principle which settled this dispute would settle all disputes, in which Christians are engaged, for, as it was in the early days of the Church, men would cease to contend for any possession. (Acts 4: 32.)

A Hunting Cruise.

The dynamite cruiser Vesuvius reached New York on Oct. 21 after a long cruise in search of derelict vessels. Several of these have been reported lately as drifting in the "steamer lanes" of the Atlantic. As they are level with the water's edge and very srrongly built they are a source of serious danger to ocean steamers, and the Vesuvius went out to destroy them. She steamed around in search of them for several weeks but did not find them. She did find, however, two large wrecks, the masts of which protruded from the water and were strong enough to pierce the side of a ship that might collide with them. The Vesuvius destroyed both. The plan adopted was to send down a diver who attached a dynamite torpedo to the keel of the sunken vessel. When it was safely fixed it was set off by an electric wire. There was a vast upheaval of the waters, a tremendous scattering of fragments, and a mass of loose timber came to the surface and floated away toward shore. That was all that was left of that menace to navigators. As soon as the cruiser is re provisioned she will set out on another cruise after the derelicts. We presume that if she finds any that can be saved and are worth saving, she will not destroy them, but tow them to port. That would be a more profitable occupation. It is so with human derelicts that abound in society. All of them are worth saving, and by divine power may be saved. While the Church deplores the mischief they do and ardently desires that it may be terminated it wishes that Christ's own methods may be used and the derelicts be sought and saved, not destroyed (Luke 9:54-56)

A Romance of the War.

A wedding took place at Louisville, Ky., on Oct. 18, which resulted from an engagement made thirty years ago in the turmoil of the war. The bridegroom at that time was a brave Confederate soldier twenty years of age. His company was surprised during one of the later campaigns and he was taken prisoner. He was sent to the military prison at Rock Island, Ill. While waiting there for an exchange some parcels of clothing were sent to the prison by Southern ladies for the Confederate prisoners The one which fell to the share of this young man came from a lady at Shelbyville, Ky. He wrote to thank her for it and a correspondence followed. After the declaration of peace he went to see her and they became engaged. The young man, however, had to find some occupation by which he could earn a livelihood and the girl had an aged mother and an invalid sister whom she could not desert. They agreed to let the marriage be deferred until a more propitious time, and they separated. The young man drifted about the Southern States for a long time before he could obtain remunerative employment, and afterward he experienced several reverses. Recently he went into business at Macon, Ga., where, for the first time, success attended his venture. Then he looked up his old love, found her still unmarried, and renewed his offer. Both are now over fifty, but a happier couple is seldom seen than they made as they stood up for the marriage ceremony at Louisville. It is much to be wished that those who pledge themselves to Christ when they are in adversity were as faithful to their promises as this young man was when prosperity shines upon them. (Ps. 66: 13, 14).

BRIEF NOTES.

From our stock of Oxford Teacher's Bibles we have thrown out a case into which a little dust had settled. They are perfect in every respect and are the same as those we used in our Premium Department. We will mail these Bibles, about 500 in number, at One Dollar each to such of our subscribers as may desire to avail themselves of this opportunity.

The King of Samoa has issued a proclamation forbidding, under pain of heavy penalties, any native Samoan or Pacific Islander to sell or to give away any intoxicating drinks.

A large meeting was held in St. James Lutheran Church, New York, on Oct. 21 to bid farewell to Dr. David A. Day who was returning after his brief vacation to his mission field at Muhlenberg, Liberia. Dr. Day has labored there and in other African stations for eighteen years.

A colporteur was recently arrested in the Galata district, Turkey, for selling the Epistle to the Galatians, on the ground that it was a seditious document. The Turkish authorities called for a certificate of the author's death to assure themselves that the document was not of recent origin.

Reports from the home of Dr. Charles P. Deems contain the gratifying intelligence that he is so much better as to be able to take an occasional drive. He is unable to walk without assistance, his voice is still indistinct, and he is unable to give expression to his thoughts fluenrly, but his progress is encouraging.

Miss Frances E Willard and her friend, Lady Henry Somerset have gained a good deal of popularity among the miners of England who have suffered much privation during the recent strike. Miss Willard gave her watch to be sold for the benefit of the distressed families of the miners and her friend redeemed it for her for $25.

At the recent Convention of the International Missionary Alliance Rev. A. B. Simpson said that more than one hundred new missionaries had been sent out during the year. The gifts offered at the Convention for the foreign missionary work amounted to $31,000. This was in addition to the $30,000 contributed at Old Orchard a few weeks before.

At a recent session of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions, Southern Presbyterian Church, held in Nashville, Tenn., the Rev. Dr. Chester, recently pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn., was elected Secretary of Foreign Missions to succeed the Rev. M. H. Houston, D.D., who resigns to engage in active missionary work in China.

A remarkable revival is reported from Patchogue, L. I., as the result of the labors of Evangelist Arthur J. Smith of New York. The meetings have been held hitherto in the Congregational Church, but are to be transferred to the M. E. Church now. The converts belong to all classes, many of them having been non-church goers and some of them open scoffers at religion.

During the last six months, to September 1st, 1893, 185 colporters of the American Tract Society labored in thirty-three States and Canada. They visited 78,651 families, circulated by sale and grant 53,000 volumes of Christian literature; addressed 2,824 meetings; found 6,035 families destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and 5,195 families without the Bible.

Dr. Albert H. Henderson and wife sailed on Oct. 18 in the Paris for Mone, Burmah. The field is among the Shans a very wild class of people. Dr. Henderson acquired his medical education in Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt's Medical Missionary College and was fourth on the roll of honor at his graduation from the University Medical College of New York City. He was one of the seven young men who went on the Evangelistic tour last summer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Gospel Stage.

A press despatch to the New York Recorder from Baltimore, Md., states that a remarkable scene was witnessed in the South Western Police Court of that city on Oct. 18. The judge had some doubt as to the truth of an assertion made by one of the witnesses and asked her if she was sure her statement was true. She raised her hand toward heaven and called God to witness that it was true. She immediately tottered and fell forward unconscious. It was twenty-four hours before she recovered and it was then feared that she would become insane.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

RUNNING A WINNING RACE.

Preached last Sunday morning, Oct. 29, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text: Heb. 12: 1. "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us."

IN the preceding chapter the writer described with great fullness the heroes and heroines of faith. That chapter is a magnificent picture gallery on whose walls hang the immortal portraits of the victors through faith. They had fought a good fight; they had won a glorious victory. We are still in the fight; we are still running the race. But there is sympathy with us in our trials and triumphs. Heaven is nearer earth than we sometimes suppose. Earth is not a small island in God's universe cut off from all communication with the mainland. The spirits of just men made perfect are in some sense cognizant of and interested in our struggles; most of all, Christ himself is our great example and helper.

Attention is called, in the first place, to the encouragement we have in running the race. The exhortation here continued was really begun in the 10th chapter and the 19th verse; but at that point it was broken off that the writer might introduce the wonderful examples of triumphant faith which occupy the remainder of that chapter. Now he returns to the subject then dropped for the purpose mentioned; and now he continues the exhortation with accumulative force, and with increased momentum he expresses his argument with irresistible power. He assures us that we are surrounded by Numerous Witnesses.

It is evident that the language here is suggested by the games with which the writer and readers were familiar. In those games multitudes of spectators occupied the circular seats in the amphitheatre; and from that vantage point they could easily see all that was occurring in the arena. This thought is enlarged until the heavens are the great amphitheatre, and saints and seraphs, angels and archangels are the witnesses of the struggles and triumphs of Christians in their earthly course. To deny this reference is to miss the very point of the writer's thought. Christians are, in some sense, surrounded in like manner with the worthies to which reference was made in the previous chapter. Perhaps the writer does not intend to positively affirm that they are familiar with earthly occurrences, in the same sense as were the spectators in the games; but he seems to teach that in some sense they are interested and encouraging witnesses of our earthly trials.

We know that these athletic and other games aroused an absorbing interest in that early day. The successful champions were crowned with great solemnity, pomp and rejoicing. With tears of gratitude and joy their friends bore them away in triumph. Cicero tells us that a victory at the Olympic games was not much less honorable than a triumph at Rome. The witnesses of these games were very numerous; so the writer in this case speaks of "so great a cloud of witnesses." These heavenly witnesses, like in the circus, are represented as being above and around us. From their heights in heavenly bliss they look on with sympathy and affection. It was common for classic writers to speak of a multitude as a "cloud." Not less fitting, but more, is the word cloud used in this higher and divmer revelation. In this case, as in the old games, a multitude of spectators gives courage to the combatants, stimulating them to win the victory. We must not press this thought too far, but we may catch its sweet lesson, and feel its heavenly inspiration.

Among those witnesses are some of the dearest friends we have ever known on this earth. Yonder on some heavenly height is perhaps the pastor of our youth, he who led us to Christ, he who buried us with Christ in baptism, he who welcomed us to the table of the Lord; he who guided us in the early days of our Christian life. Yonder are perhaps the father who prayed for our conversion, and the mother at whose knee we knelt in childhood's holy hours, and under whose sweet exhortations we yielded our hearts to Jesus Christ. Let us catch the lesson which their presence teaches, and feel the inspiration which their sympathy imparts. But the greatest of all forms of encouragement here given is that we are to look unto Jesus.

A Precaution.

We observe, in the second place, that there is not only encouragement given, but precaution suggested as we run the Christian race—"Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us." The word here translated "weight," does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament. It means primarily that which is crooked or hooked, and then whatever is suspended by a hook or or crook. The word is occasionally found in classic writers referring to pride and its various manifestations. Usually, however, it means a weight or burden. No doubt there is a further allusion here to runners in the games, who were careful to lay aside any superfluous weight, which might interfere with the freedom of their movement in running. Their clothes were made in such fashion as not to impede their running; they were careful also in their training to remove unnecessary flesh and whatever else might prove a hindrance or impediment. These athletes teach Christians important lessons at this point. They not only removed all that was unnecessary in their clothing, but unnecessary weight in their own person. The word here might be applied to every weight of every kind that might obstruct the progress of the racer; thus it will apply to weight of the person, or weight on the person. A distinction is here made between weights and sins. Not all weights are necessarily sins; but almost any weight may become a sin. It is important to observe this distinction. Many things proper in themselves become vastly improper when improperly used. We may make vices out of our virtues; we may make our gifts and graces hindrances and impediments in the Christian race. Many a man's external circumstances become weights because of his internal conditions. Similar circumstances in the case of another man may become helps rather than hindrances. To run well we must remove to run well we must run light. The weight with one may be one thing, and with another, another. In one case it may be pride, worldliness, bad temper, a corrupt imagination, an unholy affection. With another it may be love of personal beauty, love of adornment, even undue devotion to commendable culture, commendable with appropriate limitations and relations. But whatever it may be, it must be heroically and determinedly laid aside. Unimportant in itself, if we honestly feel that it is interfering with our progress in the Christian life, we must promptly set it aside. Love of money, love of praise, love of success—a thousand things, not necessarily wrong, but wrong when they become inordinate, wrong only when they come between us and our duties to Christ—these we must set aside, though they be dear to us as a right hand or a right eye. Above all things beside we must run our race so that we may win the victory. Thanks be to God, all runners may be winners. In the old games many ran, but only one could win. Here all may run and all may win. May God help you that you may all "so run that ye may obtain."

We are also to lay aside "the sin which so easily doth beset us." The word which describes this sin is deeply interesting, alike in its composition and significance. The word "sin" is distinct from and in advance of the word weight. Every sin may be a besetting sin, but not every weight is even a sin. Both weights and sins, however, are to be put away that we may run successfully the appointed race. The word descriptive of this sin does not elsewhere occur in the New Testament, nor in the whole range of Greek literature, as learned commentators affirm. This fact makes its interpretation somewhat difficult. Its composition shows that it means the well-standing-around sin, or putting the Greek thought into words more directly derived from the Latin, the well-circumstanced sin. It is the sin which has everything in its favor, time and place, desire and opportunity. Some have rendered it, "the sin that hangeth on us," others "the sin which specially winds around us and and hinders our course:" and still others, "the sin which doth naturally enwrap us." We may suppose that the word is suggested by the fact that the garments ordinarily worn, if not put off, would wind around the legs of the runner and hinder him in his course. We are, then, to lay aside the sin, whatever it may be, which clings fast to us, and will not readily part from us, but which clings as a Cumbersome Garment.

As the runner stripped for the race, so must we lay aside both weights and sins which would hinder our progress and perhaps entirely defeat our purpose. While we are commanded to lay aside "every weight," we are especially commanded to lay aside the easily-besetting sin. The word translated "and" in this connection has the meaning of particularly or especially. What are the sins which may be described as easily besetting? They are different in the experience of different men; what may hinder one, may be of slight importance in the case of another Christian. We can, however, lay down some general principles, which will apply to sins of this class in the case of all men.

There are certain sins which may be called constitutional. They belong to us in our bodies and souls alike. Tendencies to them may have been inherited, and indulgence in them may have greatly strengthened the inherited propensity. Strong on most other points, we may be weak at some given point. We must not, however, try to throw aside our own responsibility on the ground of inherited tendency. We are in danger of throwing back to our ancestors responsibility which is our own. There is a great truth in the law of heredity, but nevertheless for the indulgence of the propensity, and for its consequences, we alone are responsible.

neither God nor common sense will allow us to throw back upon parents or others. Every man has his weak point, except he be weak all over; that weak point he must especially guard. No chain is stronger than its weakest link; when pressure is put upon it every other link may stand, but the chain fails of its purpose because of one weak spot. A bow in the hand of a boy a day or two ago seemed to be entirely strong except at one point, a point at which the carpenter, in cutting a wedge, had made a slight nick in the bow itself. The boy adjusted the arrow, drew the bow with force to send the arrow to a distant mark; and, at the point where the edge of the chisel had touched it, the bow snapped. The bow was only as strong as its weakest point. So is it with the resolution, conduct, and character of every man or woman. That point must be most carefully guarded and constantly strengthened. Knowledge of one's weakness is necessary to the formation of a worthy character and to victory over inherent evil tendencies. A holy life will consist in part in discovering our weak points that we may so fortify them as to become invincible.

There are also habitual sins, which may become easily-besetting sins. These may be the outcome of the constitutional trend of which we have spoken. The tendency may be gratified until it becomes a habit, and the habit may be indulged until it becomes character, and the character may be so developed as to determine destiny. These are those to which we were exposed by natural temperament, and which we freely indulged before making a Christian profession. There is danger that they will return with irresistible power; danger that by laws of memory and association we may fall before their onset. It has been well said that when we bury our sins at conversion, we must not too often visit their graves, lest they have a resurrection. The man who was intemperate before conversion must not expose himself by association with drinking men or by visiting saloons. A man I knew some years ago, who had reformed, said that the click of the glasses would arouse the old and fierce appetite to such a degree that he often had to run past the open door of a saloon. The smell of liquor will have a similar influence in the case of other men. No man who has been redeemed from the power of his cups should heedlessly expose himself again to danger. If a man will continually put his head into the lion's mouth, he ought to know that one day the lion will be likely to close his jaws. Men who have been infidels are in danger of a return to their scepticism, and men who have lived lives of gross impurity, will be attacked on the side of their lower and viler nature. Against the enemy who approaches us at any one of these weak points we must be constantly on our guard. There is danger that we may tempt the devil as truly as he may tempt us.

Professional Sins.

There are also certain sins which may be called professional sins, against which we must guard. They may become our easily-besetting sins. It is exceedingly difficult for men to rise above the moral standard of their profession. A subtle and almost mysterious atmosphere surrounds most professions. They have their own standards of attainment; "they all do it" is often a dangerous fact. The man who yields to a moral wrong in his profession, to which he would not yield outside, must guard himself at the point where his profession specially touches him. Every merchant, physician, lawyer and clergyman knows the significance of these remarks. They apply with equal force to farmers and mechanics; and, indeed, to all classes and conditions of men and women. We must watch lest we lose the simplicity of our faith and the spirituality of our life, lest our position as politicians, or members of any of the professions, shall reveal our weak point and cause us to fall before the onsets of Satan.

Lastly, we have the exhortation, "Let us run with patience, the race that is set before us." The word here translated "patience" is more strictly perseverance, or patient endurance. This exhortation is of prime importance. It is worth much for us to know that life is a race, and that it is an appointed race, and that it must be run with great endurance else victory is impossible. Encouraged by the triumph of the sainted witnesses, who won the prize, and especially by our great Exemplar, we are to run our race with patient endurance. The race becomes vastly easier when we know that it is appointed by the infinite wisdom and love of our God. We sometimes think that no path is as rough and thorny as ours; and that no cross is so hard and heavy as ours. We often think that if we could change position with other men our lot would be vastly easier. We forget that we do not know how heavy their cross is, and that if God gave us our choice, perhaps, after all we would select the very cross which we are now bearing. Let us rest assured that our race in not the result of accident or caprice. The path in which we run is chosen for us as being most conducive, in the judgment of the omniscient God and loving Father, to our good and to his glory. Let us then be patient and heroic as we run the race so that at last we may win the crown. Perseverance is one of the noblest graces in the Christian life. "Patience is genius," said Buffon; "patience is power; with time and patience the mulberry leaf becomes satin," says the eastern proverb; "the world is his who has patience;" says the old Italian proverb, "a stout heart breaks ill-luck;" "if I have lost the rings, here are the fingers still," says the Spanish proverb. Perseverance is often

Looking Unto Jesus,

The Noblest Element

of Christian endeavor. "Hard pounding, gentlemen, but we will see who can pound the longest," said Wellington at Waterloo. The spider climbing the twelfth time on a beam of the roof, and falling each time, but succeeding when it climed the thirteenth time, gave Robert Bruce, as he took shelter in the barn, and who had also failed twelve times, courage to make the thirteenth endeavor in which he met and defeated Edward and was crowned king. Dr. Judson must labor in Burmah seven years before he has a convert, but his faith never failed. His reward was abundant. Cyrus Field toiled anxiously and ceaslessly for thirteen years, often with aching head and sinking heart, wandering in the forests of Newfoundland in pelting rain and stormy nights, praying that he might not taste death until his work was accomplished, before the Atlantic cable was laid. We are told that Mr. Edison's phonograph long refused to say the word "special;" it dropped the "s," and could say only "pecial." Mr. Edison worked for seven months from eighteen to twenty hours a day to make the phonograph utter that single sound. The difficulty was that the material in his cylinders was not of a proper consistency. He required material delicate enough to receive impressions not more than a millionth part of an inch in depth, and yet firm enough so to carry the needle as to produce the vibrations which had made the impressions. Scientists said that it could not be done; but he said that it must be done, and he did it. If men will make such heroic efforts in fields of scientific learning, how much more ought we in gaining the crown of everlasting life. If men did so run in the Grecian games to gain a crown of laurel, how ought we to run when the prize is a crown of everlasting glory!

O, enter the lists to-day! Just now step out of the broad way of sin and death, and enter this narrow path, and finish your course with joy unspeakable and full of glory. God grant that some in the race may be encouraged to-day, perhaps amid many trials, to run with patient endurance; and that some others now looking unto Jesus may begin to run for the prize of eternal life!

President Clara Barton and her Committee aiding the Sea Island Sufferers.

SO great have been the loss of life, the suffering and the destitution caused by the recent cyclone and floods in the Sea Island district between Charleston and Savannah, that the section is now little better than a wilderness. Fully 30,000 people for the next eight months will have to be provided with all the necessaries of life.

As the recent calamity is one that appeals to the sympathies of the entire country, the American National Red Cross has undertaken to conduct the work of relief, and Miss Clara Barton, together with her Committees, has established a relief headquarters at Beaufort, S. C. Governor Tillman and the Central Relief Committee have placed the responsibility of receiving and distributing supplies in the hands of the Red Cross and the relief work will now be prosecuted with systematic vigor.

President Clara Barton thus describes the situation in the destitute districts:

"There are two means of earning a livelihood among the inhabitants of these Sea Islands—farming and mining in the phosphate fields. The farm interests have been almost completely destroyed and there is nothing to be done on the farms till spring. The storm swept away the machinery and boats of the phosphate mines and it will be six months before they can resume work. The other sources of revenue are meagre and will not supply the demands of the thousands in need of food and shelter. The sanitary condition, never the best, is now naturally as much worse as could be imagined. With but little clothing, less food, decaying vegetation, stagnant water, exposure to the weather, medical assistance miles away, few medical supplies, what but sickness can be expected, without prompt attention and immediate relief? One bright spot is the superb work of the marine hospital service under Dr. Magruder's control through the direction of Dr. Wyman. As far as this service has reached, it is directing the clearing of wells, the burial of carcasses, and the drainage of the soil wherever practicable.

"There will not be work for the people for months. The fishing boats of the people were swept to sea, their poultry, in the main, drowned, and on many islands cows and goats were destroyed. The entire seacoast belt of islands, extending south from James Island to Hilton Head Island, with 30,000 population, has been devastated. Crops were ruined, houses swept away, clothing destroyed, sickness is breeding and perhaps half of these poor people will be dependent upon public charity for support, if they are not already so. There is a severe winter season ahead. The men, so far as I have been able to see and hear, are willing to work where there is anything to do, but there is little if anything, and there will be less when winter comes. If they leave the islands, their families, generally large ones will be left behind entirely destitute and practically helpless.

"The appeals for help have been generously responded to up to this time, and have doubtless saved many lives. The fund has been almost entirely expended in the purchase of grist, bacon and flour, the principal staples of food, and these supplies have been judiciously and honestly distributed. But the work has just begun. Months and months of bread have to be supplied."

Governor Tillman, Miss Barton and a party made a tour of investigation among the afflicted islands and found the reports of suffering fully confirmed. The entire forces of the Red Cross are now actively at work and all aid sent to the headquarters at Beaufort will be distributed to the best advantage among the needy part of the population.

"THE LORD WILL KEEP HIS OWN."

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

I KNOW not if to-morrow's sun
Will bring me joy or pain;
If blessings will descend from heaven
Or sorrows fall like rain,
Or if the skies be overcast
With clouds like funeral pall,
Or if the sun will rise and shine,
Or if it rise at all;
I only know that down my path
Of earth o'er brier and stone,
I shall be safely led, because
"The Lord will keep his own."

I know not if my path of life
Still winds through many years,
Or if before to-morrow's morn
I bid farewell to tears;
I know not which of all my friends
Will be the first to go,
And leave me wandering lonely through
This vale of sin and woe;
I only know my heavenly Friend
Will never leave me lone,
But walk forever by my side
And always "keep his own."

I know not how Christ cleansed my sins,
I only know that he Did take my sinful heart and give
A spotless one to me.
And through this heart that he has cleansed
His wondrous love does flow,
And here abides that perfect peace
The world may never know.
I know not now whose lives are pure,
Or whose hearts are like stone;
I only know my heart is Christ's,
And he will "keep his own."

I know that pleasures are but fleet,
While pain is everywhere,
But God thinks best to give us all
Some little taste of care;
And oh! I know this night of earth
Will sometime pass away,
And all will be forgotten when
We wake in Heaven's day;
And with all sin, and strife, and pain,
And tears forever flown,
There'll be but comfort, peace, and love
When God does claim "his own."

CHANGELESS.

AMID earth's changes, Lord,
Its shadows and its fears,
Its broken pledges, shattered plans,
Its sorrows and its tears,
Thy children trust thy own sure word,
And wait the eternal years.

O, dearest trust in God,
That fights our darkest days,
O, sweetest calm that lifts a psalm
Forever to God's praise,
Glad are the pilgrims on the road
When he ordains their ways.

THE TWO WITNESSES.

Their Testimony, their Decline and Final Extinction for Three and a Half Years.

BY THE LATE SIR A. BLACKWOOD.

THE great Revealer declares to his servant John, in the eleventh chapter of Revelation, that the two witnesses are to be killed by an agency from the abyss; that their corpses are to be exposed to public contempt, their death being a cause of universal rejoicing; but that they are to be resuscitated, and to be raised, in the sight of all, to a position of glorious exaltation. In my opinion the two witnesses represent the Protestant Churches which are to lose their vitality, their life. The olive-trees are to become destitute of oil; the light of the candlesticks is to be extinguished. They will no longer be filled with the breath of the Spirit, no longer feed upon the Bread of Life, no longer lift up their voice in testimony for God.

They are to be slain by "the wild beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit." This wild beast is identical with the fourth wild beast seen by Daniel (chap. 7), and consequently denotes the fourth great world empire, or Rome. The various aspects under which that power appears—first Pagan, then Papal, and finally Democratic—are presently described. This is the power that makes war with the Witnesses, overcomes, and at length, kills them. The life of the Protestant Churches is to be destroyed by the power of Rome (Rev. 11:7.) This end is accomplished "when they shall have finished their testimony." The war of the wild beast or Rome, against them, has been carried on during the period of their testimony."—i. e., throughout the 1,260 years of their witness for Christ and against anti-Christian error (the 1,260 days of Rev. 11:3.)

For three years and a half (three and a half prophetic days) these dead churches, whose witness to Christ and his truth is then no longer heard, becomes the gazing-stock and scorn of the representatives of Christendom ("they out of the people and kindreds and tongues and nations," i. e., deputies therefrom) who will treat them with grossest ignominy. They are "cast out of their graves as abominable branches, carcases trodden under foot" (see Isa. 14:19) There is "none to bury them, (they) are become a reproach to their neigbors, a scorn and derision to them that are round about." (Psa. 8::3.)

Dwellers upon the earth will rejoice over vanquished Protestantism. Their troublesome testimony is silenced. Evangelical truth, is suppressed. The dwellers on the earth can be happy now. No unpleasant witness to the truths of God will be heard. The realities of holiness and sin, of death, judgment, and eternity, of the Cross of Christ, of heaven and hell are put on one side. The Protestant Churches will have, some of them, modified their creed and standards to obtain or preserve State recognition, while others, in order to abolish it, will subordinate their Christianity to their politics. In one way or another, the churches will have ceased to testify. They will have abandoned their Protestant attitude. It may be that, cap in hand, they will humbly sue to be included in the imposing organization presented by a reunited Christendom, but though they "lay their body as the ground, and as the street to them that went over," they will obtain no favor in the sight of the representatives ahd rulers of the worldly religious Church that has the upper hand, and exercises universal sway. They do not even "suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves."

This state of things will last for three years and a half, and no longer, (Rev. 11:9). The period is accurately, divinely measured. At its end a revival takes place. No human agency is mentioned: "the Spirit of life from God enters into them, and they stand upon their feet." No longer crouching, cringing, ashamed of their previous history and the noble testimony of their ancestors—in fact, void of vitality and power—they will be once more erect, bold, and steadfast. The functions of living churches will again be exercised; the holy oil will pervade the branches and fill them with beauty and fruitfulness; the light of the candlesticks once more shines forth with divinely-imparted brillance. The testimony of Jesus will be sounded forth anew in all its truth and sweetness.

The revival of the Protestant Churches will be as conspicuous, as notorious, as their shameful death had been, and the world that hated their testimony and thought it forever silenced, will be amazed and alarmed by their resuscitation by the direct intervention of God. All this appears to be yet unfulfilled. Yet are there some striking indications of the probability of the earlier stages of this prophecy soon being realised.

THE TEST OF LOVE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 12. II.Cor. 8: 1-9; 9: 6-8.

GIVING, in the cause which Paul advocated, was doubly a test of love. If a man loved his fellow-men, the knowledge that some were in need would certainly move him to relieve their need. If he loved God and was a follower of Christ, he would give for Christ's sake. Thus, to neglect giving, was to show that there was not the love for God and men in the heart that there ought to be. It was a serious condition that these men were in; they had faith, utterance, knowledge, diligence and love for their teacher, but they lacked this grace of giving. They were apparently selfish Christians and Paul shows them why selfishness was worse in a Christian than in any one else. They were rich because Christ had become poor for their sakes, therefore, if they were really followers of Christ they would make sacrifices for the sake of others. If a man refrained from giving to those who were in need, he did not have the spirit of Christ and was not following him. There is no flaw in the Apostolic argument. No wife would believe that her husband loved her, however much he protested that he did, if he habitually neglected her, was unmindful of her wishes, spent his income on himself, while she lacked food and clothing. Christ was not there, but he had so identified himself with his people that he had said, "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto these my brethren ye did it not to me." In withholding the help from the Jewish Christian poor, for whom Paul pleaded, these Corinthians were withholding gifts from Christ himself. The inference that they did not love him was logical. They had given another proof, too. Paul intimates that while he was serving them as their pastor, he had toiled for his own support and had actually accepted help from other churches, while he was laboring for the Corinthians. Evidently it was a church that needed admonition on this matter. Paul would not command; it was a subject on which commands were out of place. The gifts ought to be spontaneous, as they would be if the people loved Christ. The Apostle was concerned, not about the lack of the gifts, but about the barrenness which their absence implied.

This test is not worn out nor discarded. They who love God, love their fellow-men still; and their love is not idle. It is one of the invariable signs of genuine conversion that love to the whole world springs into life. Especially is there love toward those who have fellowship with us in the blessed hope. They are brethren and their need is our concern. If they lack the necessaries or even the comforts of life, while we have more than we need, their cry goes up to heaven against us and we shall not be held guiltless. If the men who break to us the bread of life are suffering poverty and if the agencies which are engaged in propagating the Gospel in the world are restricted in their efforts by lack of funds, while we are hoarding our money, we shall be called to account for it. Pointing to the hoarded thousands, Christ asks, "Lovest thou me more than these?" Dare we refuse to give while we call ourselves followers of him who was rich, yet [illegible]?

THE Y. W. C. A. IN INDIA.

For several years past Christian women in the city of Madras, India, have been accustomed to meet together occasionally for mutual counsel and help. So much benefit was derived from these meetings that it was decided to have a regular organization as a Young Women's Christian Association. Arrangements were made and the Association was regularly constituted at the beginning of this year. So great was its success that since that time five branches have been opened in as many districts of the city and all are prospering. The meetings held, exclusive of the business meetings of the Board of Managers have been 197 in all, and of these 128 were for Bible study and prayer. Among the others were sewing parties, social gatherings and receptions. There are now 316 members on the books. "The object of the Association," says Mrs. E. M. Organe, the secretary, in a letter to the Indian Witness, "is to promote the highest interests of young women of all classes, and to help them in every possible way to become fitted for the great responsibilities that devolve upon the rising generation. We aim at cultivating the physical and intellectual as well as the spiritual part of their natures. The special needs of such work, if brought before Christian young women, would be the means of calling forth offers of service that are so sorely needed in many places. Ways and means would also probably be indicated in which the young women in large centres might help in the work of spreading the Gospel message among their non-Christian sisters, for we are convinced there are many only waiting to be shown how to set to work. I merely add that we hope at no distant date to welcome from England or America a lady worker who shall give her whole time to the development of Associations in this City and Presidency. For this we have earnestly prayed and have obtained the cordial co-operation of our friends in the far west." The extent of the sphere to be occupied may realized when we know that the population of the city of Madras is more than half a million and of the Presidency nearly forty millions.

THE NEW BUILDING OF THE W. C. A. OF PHILADELPHIA.

THE PHILADELPHIA W. C. A.

Last week the Women's Christian Association of Philadelphia had the pleasure of moving into its new home, a picture of which appears on this page. For more than two years, the officers and members have suffered the sickness of deferred hope. Their former home, endeared to them as the scene of many happy meetings and the centre of useful work, was wrested from them by one of the railroad monopolies which are the curse of our land. Only after long and expensive litigation could the Association obtain such compensation as would enable them to secure a new site and part of the cost of a new building. Work was commenced on the structure more than a year ago, but trade disputes and other troubles caused delay, and it is only now that the Association is once more under its own roof. There is, however, some consolation for the ladies who have labored so strenuously for the cause, in the beauty and convenience of the new building. It was worth while waiting to have so magnificent a home. We sincerely hope that the wealthy citizens of Philadelphia, who know how valuable is the work the Association is doing, will munificently subscribe to relieve it of the incubus of debt which burdens it, and will, until it is removed, curtail its usefulness. It is expected that fully $100,000 will be needed to cover the entire cost, in addition to the amount received for the old building from the railroad. The site, the building and the furnishing have cost $335,000.

The building is an ornament to the city. It is practically nine stories high. It stands on the corner of Eighteenth and Arch streets and occupies an area of 132 by 120 feet. The material is buff brick with granite facings. There are accommodations for 250 boarders and about fifty transient guests. Beside these rooms there are all the rooms necessary for the business of the Association and for the common use of its members. These include a large auditorium with a seating capacity of one thousand, an amusement hall, a restaurant where 250 can dine at the same time, a large library, fifteen class-rooms, several committee-rooms, parlors, sewing and reading rooms and all the rooms needed for that valuable department of the Association's work, the School for Training Domestic Servants. Over all is the model roof-garden which in the summer months will be a refuge for those members who cannot afford the luxury of a sojourn on the mountains or the sea-side. The privilege of living in the building is restricted to self-supporting women and an idea of the value of that privilege is gained from the fact that board, lodging and washing will be afforded for three dollars a week. For a small extra sum the inmates can have tuition in book-keeping, stenography, type writing, dress-making and many other studies. The Association was organized twenty-three years ago and its life has been a continuous growth in usefulness. Mrs. Franciscus, the President, Miss Sarah Cadbury, the Secretary, and other officers of the Association have made it their life study to find out the needs of their sisters and the best way of supplying them. The result is this model Association.

A SPHERE OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

A suggestion that merits the consideration of young people's societies of all denominations is made by Mr. A. S. Orne, of Haverhill, Mass. Circumstances in connection with a sphere of work in which he was engaged led him to seek a home for some destitute children where they would receive a religious education and the knowledge of some business by which they could earn a livelihood. The difficulty he experienced in finding such an institution led to his making further investigation. To his astonishment he discovered, that although there were numerous institutions under he control of the Roman Catholic Church, in which destitute children, orphans, foundlings, deserted children, and the children of criminals were willingly received and cared for, the Protestant churches had made little or no effort of the kind. The Roman Catholics appeared to have appreciated the value of such material for their church, while Protestants had been oblivious of it. Yet in all the States in which Mr. Orne conducted his investigations he found hundreds of children on their way to becoming a public charge as criminals who, might in all probability, be saved to lives of honesty and usefulness by religious training. The question arises, whether it would not be possible to have an institution in every State in which such training could be given. It might be on a small scale at first with only a score or a hundred inmates. The value of the work would soon be realized and its extension would come naturally. The difficulty of course would be one of funds. Although in England George Muller, Pastor Spurgeon and Dr. T. J. Barnardo have established such institutions and have been enabled to carry them on for many years, doing an inestimable amount of good, the need here, which is quite as pressing, has not been so met. In the absence of men of their strong faith, might not such a work be undertaken by the young people's societies? A very small subscription from every member, if lodged in the hands of a State Union of Christian Endeavor Societies, of Epworth Leagues and Baptist Young People's Unions would, in the aggregate, suffice to build and equip and support an Orphanage in the State. It might be under the charge of a joint committee and be conducted on undenominational lines. We heartily commend the project to the attention of our readers in the honest conviction that it would be no less pleasing to Christ than the effort already being made by the Societies to send the Gospel to the heathen abroad.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The number of Christian Endeavor Societies in Great Britain has increased to 750.

At the Kansas City, Mo., Epworth League Convention the report showed 790 members and 423 juniors.

The B. Y. P. U., of Oak Park, Ill., have the pledge printed in large type, handsomely framed and hung where all can see it in their prayer-room.

One hundred simultaneous missionary meetings were held in Chicago on a recent Sunday, under the auspices of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Missionary Institute.

The banner won by South Dakota at the National B. Y. P. U. Convention at Indianapolis has been confided to the Brookings Union, which had the best record for Bible reading in the State.

The second Sunday in November and the week following have been set apart by the Young Men's Christian Associations of the world as the annual day and week of special prayer for their work in behalf of young men.

At the State Convention of the B. Y. P. Unions of Indiana 94 societies and 21 Associational Unions reported. The total number of members 4,859. Prof. Moncrief declined re-election to the Presidency. His successor is Rev. A. B. Chaffee of South Bend.

The local Societies of Christian Endeavor of New York held their annual meeting in the Marble Collegiate Church on October 26th and 27th. Dr. John F. Scudder's address was on the question, "What ails our Society?" Dr. Parkhurst spoke on "the Christian Endeavorer as a citizen."

The services held during the summer by the Waugh Epworth League in Schott's Alley, Washington, D. C., a hive of Italians and negroes, were blessed of God to several conversions. The League has now rented two rooms in the Alley where work will be carried on through the winter.

The Chinese Endeavor society which meets in the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago sent eleven members to the recent annual meeting of the South Side Union. This meant the loss of half a day's wages to several of the "boys," who had to furnish substitutes when away from work.

The Epworth League of the Washington Avenue Church at Kansas City has found a source of income in collecting foreign postage stamps which it sells to collectors, the proceeds going to the support of the Bethany Hospital. The request for these stamps has met with a prompt response from all quarters.

The State Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Georgia has issued an appeal to the Associations throughout the country for help for the convalescents at Brunswick. Many young men, he says, who have recovered from the epidemic are temporarily in need of the common necessaries of life. Donations are to be sent to W. M. Lewis, Atlanta, Ga.

Teaching Blind Girls in China.

A Lady Missionary Describes a most Interesting Christian Work in Canton.

Miss Nyrup.

EVERY reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD having the spiritual welfare of the unevangelized millions of China at heart will be interested in the following extracts from a letter written by an American lady missionary concerning her work among the blind children of Canton. Mary W. Niles, writes:

"Ten years ago, when I first had occasion to pass through the streets of Canton by night, I was surprised to meet blind girls of the age of fourteen years or more, over-dressed in gay shams or jackets, with their cheeks painted and flower-bedecked hair. A woman carrying a musical instrument led them there. These girls were the property of cruel mistresses who sent them out to spend their nights in low places of amusement or upon the streets. I pitied them but passed on, not thinking that I had any duty in respect to this practice. Later, Sin Lan, a bright slave girl of seventeen years of age, was brought to the hospital by her mistress for healing. Mrs. Kerr has a little school in connection with the hospital, and this girl memorized rapidly the first and second primers and the Gospel by Mark in Chinese. At length she applied for admission to the church and passed an examination which astonished the elders, and yet they dared not admit her to membership. Was she not owned body and soul by those who would not permit her to live a Christian life? When, at length, she became hopelessly ill, her mistress deserted her. Then again she was examined for church membership. I was quite overcome with the beautiful testimony of her faith in Christ. She desired a new baptismal name (Koi-Chan), meaning transformed to the truth. In a few months she went from us, rejoicing, to her heavenly home.

"I soon learned to long for a school for blind girls. In 1888 a blind baby was brought to me who had been picked up on the street, and I was told that if I would promise to cure her eyes the family who had found her would support her. 'If not?' I asked. 'Then,' said they, 'there is nothing but to give her to the owner of blind slaves.' The thought flashed upon me, 'Who has more responsibility in this case than yourself?' Then I said to the woman, 'You may leave her with me.' Afterward, I wondered if this might not be the beginning of a school for blind girls. But who was to open one?

"In 1889 a blind girl named A-Un came to me. A woman who was negotiating to buy her older sister brought that sister to me. If I said that there was no cure, that settled the bargain. She told me that the mother was poor and could not keep her. Not a tenth of a cent has been paid for any one of the eleven girls now under my charge. Two weeks later the mother brought A-Un and wished to give her to me. After several months the mother came again to me in great distress, saying that she saw A-Un so happy and contented, while her sister was most wretched, would I not take her also? 'Yes,' I replied, 'if you will redeem her from her mistress.'

"A Chinese lady, not a Christian, has supported A-Un ever since she has been with me. It costs but thirty dollars a year to support one of these blind pupils. In 1890 the British and Foreign Bible Society offered to publish the Bible, or portions of it, in the Braille system for the blind. As yet, however, not an entire Gospel for the blind in the Cantonese dialect has been prepared.

"In 1891 a little school was opened for four little blind girls who had already memorized one of the Gospels in Mrs. Kerr's hospital school. A blind teacher who had been educated in the Berlin Foundling House, was employed, and the experiment of teaching Cantonese by the Braille system was begun. A new pupil was soon received from the hospital in Hong-Kong. Our teacher proves to be thorough, neat, orderly and systematic. She can teach reading, writing, knitting, music, and the performance of household duties. Her pupils are learning very nicely, and all can read. The teacher writes out with care all the lessons that the children are taught to read. Some of them can write and knit. One is making very satisfactory progress in music. Two new pupils have come, and four little ones in the family will soon be old enough to go to school. We are crowded for room, so that the teacher and one of the pupils sleep in the contracted school room.

"When recently a Chinese gentleman, becoming interested in this school, of his own accord proposed to take my subscription book to the Chinese officials so as to enable me to build a house, to my surprise, in a few weeks the subscription book was returned, accompanied by more than a thousand dollars. It will go toward the purchase of a suitable home for these blind girls.

"Miss Nyrup, a Danish lady and a devout Christian, has agreed to assist me for the next two years. We expect to rent a comfortable house for the present. I ask the prayers of Christians for my little flock. I have reason to hope that each one may be used greatly to advance the Kingdom of Christ in China. They are very obedient, affectionate and prayerful children, already well grounded in Christian truth and untrammeled with superstitious notions. Lin-Shan, the teacher, takes a volume of her German Bible in raised letters and goes to the hospital wards for an hour each day, translating the precious truths of the Gospel into Cantonese, and explaining their meaning. An interesting group of women is always gathered around her. Her success as a Bible reader inspires me with great hope for the future usefulness of her pupils."

Be Courteous in Small Things.

Politeness has been defined as love in trifles, writes Rev. Dr. Drummond. Courtesy has been defined as love in little things. And the secret of politeness is to love. Love cannot behave itself unseemly. You can take the most untutored persons and put them in society, and if they have love as a reservoir in their heart, they will not behave themselves unseemly. They simply cannot do it. Carlyle said of Robert Burns that there was no truer gentleman in Europe than the ploughman-poet. It was because he lived to love everything—the mouse, and the daisy, and all the things, great and small that God made; and so he could go into any society of the day. We heard the other day from one speaker on a certain platform about the meaning of the word "gentleman." It means a gentle man—a man who does things gently, with love. "Love doth not behave itself unseemly."

A Lesson from a Plant.

As I look at my century plant, now in full bloom, says a writer in The Interior, it seems to me a symbol of our American aristocracy. Certain of our families who have not risen above the common level for several generations, send up, now and then, a millionaire, an orator, a statesman or an inventor. There is a rapid development—an efflorescence of genius that attracts the admiration of multitudes. Then the great man dies, and his descendants are but ordinary folks. One can count on the fingers of a single hand the eminent men who had eminent fathers, or whose sons attained to eminence. God evidently does not believe in any permanent aristocracy, but that of position won by individual energy. And yet, as the flower stalk of the agave is rooted in that lowly bunch of leaves, and depends for its development upon their healthy condition and vigorous growth, so our great men, as a rule, are born and bred in homes of intelligence and virtue. Hence if we common folks are true to God, ourselves and our children, even though our own lives are spent in poverty and obscurity, we may be known and honored by the next generation when some son or daughter of ours becomes conspicuous.

AN EVENING PRAYER

O GOD! to-night I cannot lay
Before thy throne, in fitting way,
My soul's great needs; I only bring
My childhood's simple offering;
From heart to lip the dear words leap,
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

So rough the way, so sharp the fight,
So oft the wrong o'ercomes the right,
My heart grows faint, my strength is small;
But day and night God ruleth all,
And softly as the shadows creep,
"I pray the Lord my soul to keep."

A solemn thought my being thrills,
With awe and fear my bosom fills,
For with the passing of the night,
My soul from earth may take its flight;
But trustingly this prayer I make,
"If I should die before I wake,"

O! let some portal open wide,
That I may enter and abide
In heavenly mansion bright and fair,
Which Christ hath promised to prepare;
If I should die ere morning break,
"I pray the Lord my soul to take." "C."

SWEET TEMPERS.

IT pays to keep sweet—that is, sweet in temper and disposition, writes Rev. H. A. Ott. "Nothing is so distressing as a soured disposition, sour words, sour glances, sour actions. Nobody can afford to be sour. It does not pay to say unkind things to your next door neighbor. No one can afford to be snappish, churlish, cross or ugly when something is done which fails to please. Such a course soon creates a sour disposition, and if it is cherished, in the course of time we get soured against everybody and everybody's heel is lifted up against us. We cannot afford to be sour, because of the effect it has on our own happiness.

No amount of natural talent, education, or the highest culture, can atone for a sour disposition and make us lovable. We are lovable precisely in proportion as we are sweet in temper and loving in act and deed. If we take no interest in anybody, we need not expect them to take any interest in us. If we are unsocial in our life, repelling on account of our cutting words, we need not be surprised if the world treats us coldly and indifferently. "He that hath friends must show himself friendly."

Sour people can aid a pastor very little. When he wants a new member visited, or a sick person cheered, he puts to work the amiable, tender and affectionate. Indeed, he trembles lest the new members be discouraged and disheartened by lack of cordiality. Let us keep sweet, be sociable and sympathetic, be loving and lovable, for then in the highest degree can the Master use us, and we can be servicable in his cause.

Selfishness in Church-going.

A lady remarked the other day: "I don't go to church now, because in no church in my neighborhood can I get any comfort." This lady seems to have thought that the only reason for going to church was in order to get something. Another and a better reason for going would be to give something and to do something. We should go to church in order to obey this command, and to do an act of service that is pleasing to God. This cultivates our religious feelings and prepares us for the duties of the week. Then we give something to our fellow-man by going. Our example benefits him, and his devotion is warmed by ours. A number of sticks burn better together than one alone. So long as we hold the what-can-I-get theory of church-going, we shall get little by going to church. We shall merely sit in the seat of the scornful, and criticize the preacher and the choir. If one goes to church with the true devotional spirit of Christian service in the heart, there will be no room left for selfishness. The words of the preacher will then come to our spiritual ears tipped with living fire, and the music will be rapturous to our souls. There will be no need of complaining that one "cannot get any comfort out of the services."

CHAPTER XIV.

CALLED TO ACCOUNT.

FOR about ten days Monk lay hovering between life and and death, none daring to say how things would turn, though as the doctors all agreed, each day that passed by without the appearance of unfavorable symptoms was in itself a gain. He was never fully conscious during these days. He knew Joyce, and would be restless if she were long absent from him. He did not attempt to talk, and he evidently knew very little as to what passed around him. Sometimes he would speak to his mother by name, and look at Fulk and ask why he had come back without Guy: but there was no attempt at consecutive thought, still less at any kind of conversation, and although Geoffrey was satisfied with his state, and told them that they must not expect to see any rapid recovery, it seemed very long before they could trust themselves to hope, and still longer before the danger of relapse was at an end.

It was about a fortnight after the accident—and with regard to that occurrence nothing had been elicited that had not been known from the first, the incident still remained wrapped in a kind of mystery—that Monk one evening opened his eyes, and looked about him with something in his glance that had been lacking hitherto.

Joyce chanced to be with him and alone. Mrs. Dangerfield who had taken the night watch, as indeed she generally did, was now lying down in the adjoining room.

"Joyce," he said in a very weak voice, but one in which the old ring was plainly audible, "what does all this mean?"

"You have been ill, Monk, and I have been helping your mother and sisters to nurse you. That is what it is."

"How good of you, Joyce," he said. "I can't now think what it was all about—I never was ill before."

"It was an accident," said Joyce softly, she did not know how far she ought to gratify Monk's curiosity, and was afraid every moment of some question that she would find it hard to answer, but he was so rational and so completely himself, and he put his questions with such calmness that it was difficult to refrain from answering him.

"An accident?" he repeated, seeming to reflect, "O, I think I begin to remember. Were we not out shooting, Guy and I?"—he paused suddenly, and looked round him. "Where is Guy? I had an idea he had not come back. Where has he been all this time?"

Joyce paused for a moment, and then said in a quiet and matter-of-fact tone: "He has been staying in the same house as Geoffrey and Cicely Northesk. He has taken rooms there for himself. You know he had some idea of doing that before he came home. It has been settled since he got back."

A puzzled look came over Monk's face

"How long have I been like this?"

"A fortnight."

"And how long has Guy been gone?"

"A fortnight, too."

There seemed nothing for it but to give truthful answers. Monk was too much himself to be put off with anything but the exact truth.

"Then you mean that he went away at the time I was so ill. What does it all mean, Joyce? I can see by your face that there is some mystery about it all."

"Now, Monk, you must not get excited, or you will be worse, and they will tell me I am a bad nurse, and send me away. The reason that Guy went away was because it seemed to some people that he must have been the cause of the accident—I am not sure if he [illegible] for him altogether that he went away with [illegible] I have always known that when you were able to tell what happened we should understand how things were really. But in the confusion nobody seemed able to give an account of it, and as it was Guy who was with you, don't you see—?"

Monk's face wore a look that Joyce did not entirely understand. He lay silent for some time, and then said slowly,

"Do you mean to say that he has been treated as if any blame could possibly attach to him!"

"Some people blame him," answered Joyce, "but not many. I never believed he had anything to do with it at all."

Monk smiled and pressed her hand.

"Where is my mother?" he asked.

"She will be here soon. She is lying down now. She has been sitting up a great many nights lately."

But Mrs. Dangerfield had been aroused by the sound of voices, and had risen and come forward to the door-way to listen.

Monk saw her, and his face lighted with its old bright smile. For the moment all was forgotten in his sense of the welcome he was getting from those about him, from whom he seemed to have been sundered for a long time by the dim clouds of oblivion in which he had been so long wrapped. He was tired even by the short dialogue he had held with Joyce, and was content to keep very quiet the rest of the day, seeing his sisters and brothers, and showing that he recognized them, but not attempting any conversation.

Joyce knew, however, that he had not forgotten what she had told him, for he never asked for Guy: but she was certain he was often thinking of him by the way he listened for Geoffrey's step, and the searching glances he sometimes cast on his mother and Yolante. He had known before this that these two had lost their old affection for Guy, and he was wondering if they were at the bottom of this sudden defection of his best friend.

Geoffrey did not come till the following afternoon, having had a critical operation case in town to chain him to the spot, and in the interval Monk had made great strides. He greeted Geoffrey with somewhat of his old heartiness, and enjoyed the satisfaction and surprise of the young man in the sudden ground gained.

"I want to see Guy," he said, before Geoffrey left, speaking naturally, though his glance wandered to his mother's face, "will you send him here, please? I cannot think why he has been away so long. Now that I am getting better I shall want him. I know he will gladly come."

But Mrs. Dangerfield stepped forward, and laid her hand upon Monk's. "My dear boy, you must wait a little longer before you see your cousin. I will explain to you by-and-by why I ask it. For the present you must trust the wisdom of your mother's decision. Guy must not come here."

"Why not?"

"It would not be right. I could not permit it. Monk, you know that I would do nothing to distress you needlessly."

Monk looked straight at the speaker, and then at Geoffrey. "What does this mean?"

Geoffrey heartily wished it had not happened, but Mrs. Dangerfield was too determined a woman to be restrained in any course of action she meant to pursue.

"It means that for the present you had better let things stand as they are, and not trouble your head over them until you are stronger, when you can set them right at your leisure. It will be enough for Guy to know that you have asked for him, and it must be enough for you to know that he is well and as happy as present circumstances will allow him. Now that you are round the corner he will be able to enjoy life again."

A bright look crossed Monk's face, and there was energy and resolution in his next words. "Tell him that I am a new man today, and intend to go on as I have begun, and that the first day I can get out I shall come and see him. And we shall make everything out together when we meet, and laugh at the folly of people who want to make a mystery of everything."

And after that Monk never spoke Guy's name in his mother's hearing and she became [illegible] that no word had passed up between herself and her son an impalpable but very real barrier, and that from that day forward some new element entered into their mutual relations with one another.

Monk did not speak much, but he lay with all his faculties about him, more observant and alert than he had been in old times, his wits sharpened as it seemed by illness, and his easy-going kindliness somewhat changed in the manner of its manifestation. When all danger was at an end he saw somewhat less of Joyce, who only paid him regular visits, without taking part in the actual nursing, and it was Fulk who was his main confidant, and from Fulk that he learnt what had actually occurred, and what was the meaning of Guy's sudden departure from the Park.

Fulk, as has been said before, had long suspected that there was some under-current in their lives which neither he nor his brother understood, and whilst he and Monk were left so much together during the days of the patient's convalescence, he told him of his vague suspicions, and they talked freely to each other and tried to piece together bit by bit the puzzle to which the key seemed wanting.

But though they made out plainly enough that their mother had some reason for disliking Guy, and that she had infected Yolante with her own feelings and opinions, they could neither of them guess at the motive of this alienation.

"Does Guy understand the cause?" Monk asked.

Fulk hesitated and pondered. "I do not think he does: but he knows more than we do. Guy has a secret of his own, and sometimes I think that his secret may have some connection with this one. You know he was pretty bad when we were traveling, and whilst we were together in the hotel, not quite certain whether he was not going to have another inflammation, which would probably have made an end of him at once, he gave me a sealed letter, which he said I was to give to our mother in case he died, but to return to him in case he got better, which of course I did afterwards. He never made the least allusion to it then or since, only colored up a little and tossed it into the fire. Of course I have not the faintest notion what was in it: but I have often wondered."

"Have you seen Guy lately?"

"Yes."

"What is he doing? and what does he think of it all?"

"He is taking it very quietly, but keeping himself very much away from people. You know that ugly rumors got afloat, and people always do seem to love to spread a scandal, and gloat over it, even when they profess not to believe it themselves. It makes him very reluctant to show himself, and he spends his time working for Geoffrey, and for the clergy down there in that waterside parish, who have the sense to see the stuff he is made of, and not trouble about silly talk. He is very eager for news of you—and he would be delighted to see you again, but he knows he cannot come here, and I think he is quite right under the circumstances to keep away. Yolante's tongue is so bitter that they had better not meet. It is she who is doing most of the harm; it seems as if some fiend of malice possessed her."

"Poor Yolante," said Monk. "I cannot tell what has come over her lately. She never used to be like she is now."

Fulk shook his head, but had no more to say on the subject. It was all part of the puzzle he was plainly unable to unravel.

Monk did not require actual night nursing now, but he was not yet left quite alone. Mrs. Dangerfield generally sat up with him till about one o'clock, after which if he were sleeping, she would go to bed and leave him to the care of his brother, who slept in the adjoining room, and Fulk always slept soundly until warned by his mother that she was leaving his brother's room.

Habit had made made him wake up pretty regularly at one o'clock, whether he was aroused or not. One night when he thus awakened, it was to hear the sound of low but very earnest voices proceeding from the adjoining room, and to his surprise Monk was not one of the speakers, for the voices both belonged to women, and one was undoubtedly that of his mother, though he hardly knew it, for the strange ring of fear, almost amounting to terror which dominated its customary calm evenness of tone.

Greatly astonished, and under the impression that his mother might be in some difficulty, the nature of which he could not divine, Fulk hurried into his clothes, with the idea of presenting himself and putting an end to the perplexing interview, whatever its nature might be. As he did so he could not avoid hearing some words—words spoken by the strange voice to his mother in an almost threatening tone—which sent a strange thrill through him, and for a moment arrested his movement.

"You have destroyed it—you know you have—the paper that would have given him his rights. Do you dare to deny it? I say I know that you have found it and have destroyed it."

Monk was sleeping the heavy dreamless sleep of a healthy convalescence, and was too much used to the sound of low-toned voices about him to be in any way disturbed by the dialogue carried on at his bedside. But his mother was cowering—literally cowering in her chair before a tall, veiled woman who held out her hand in a threatening manner.

At the sight of his tall figure in the doorway both women suddenly turned, and Mrs. Dangerfield sank in her chair half fainting from excess of agitation. As Fulk sprang to her side, the spranger moved silently to the door and vanished. For a moment neither thought of staying or hindering her, and when they looked round she had gone. Mother and son were left face to face.

A few minutes later a messenger was riding swiftly from Dangerfield Park to Dr. Northesk's house, and a telegram was sent for Geoffrey. His sister, Cicely, received it and aroused him instantly. She did not know the cause of the urgent summons, and as he did not return for several hours, her anxiety increased. She feared that Monk had suffered a relapse, and Guy, who came in and heard her story, had the same fear. It was nine o'clock before he came in, and then his sister saw at once that something unusual had happened.

"Who is ill?" she asked, and Geoffrey's answer was no small surprise to both.

"Mrs. Dangerfield. She had a kind of seizure in the night. She is better, but in a very curious state."

"My aunt," said Guy, "I have never known her ill before. Has she overdone herself nursing Monk?"

"No doubt she has weakened herself by her unremitting attentions, and the anxiety has told upon her without question: but there has been something more at work to cause this sudden break down: and she will not open her lips or give us the slightest clue to the trouble that is plainly preying on her mind."

"Do you mean that something has happened to cause this, and that she will not say what it is?" asked Cicely.

"Partly so. What we can learn is this—and it is certainly strange enough. She was watching in Monk's room last night as usual, till her customary hour for retiring, and Fulk was next door in the dressing-room. He heard voices just at the time when he generally relieves guard, and when he went to see what was the matter, found a strange woman in converse with his mother, seemingly talking in a threatening manner to her. He heard hardly any words, because as soon as he appeared she slipped away, and his mother's state engrossed him. Who she is, and how she got into the house are questions that nobody seems able to answer. Fulk has an idea that it is the woman who was your nurse, Guy."

A curious flash crossed Guy's face, not unnoted by Geoffrey, who went on speaking.

"Mrs. Dangerfield is suffering from shock to the nervous system, and from something almost like paralysis, though it hardly amounts to that yet. The difficulties are increased by her apparent determination to conceal from everyone the cause of her illness. It is plain to everyone that something is preying on her mind, and it is doubtful how much we can do for her so long as this weight remains."

"Geoffrey," said Guy slowly, "do you mean that there is less chance for my aunt's recovery if you, as her doctor, have no idea of the thing that is or may perhaps be troubling her?"

Geoffrey paused for a moment before replying, and then he said slowly and thoughtfully:

"It depends so much upon the character of the anxiety—whether it is one of the kind that we can relieve her from. If it is something which she heard that is preying upon her mind, it might be useless for us to know the truth: we might not be able to give her any relief?"

"No," said Guy thoughtfully, "I don't suppose that you could."

The emphasis upon the pronoun was so marked that both his listeners looked up eagerly at him.

"Do you mean that you could, Guy?" asked Cicely breathlessly.

He did not answer for a moment, and then he gave a quick look from one to the other, and said:

"I think perhaps I might—but I do not know; it might perhaps make things worse."

THE BOOK SHELF

The Founding of Georgia.*

TO the English government, Oglethorpe proposed to plant a colony of unfortunate prisoners for debt in the unoccupied country below Savannah. His colleagues readily assented, and, in his report to the House of Commons, he laid his scheme for the colony before that body. The plan had the advantage of securing a promising domain to the British crown, which otherwise might fall to the Spaniards in Florida. The colony would also relieve the South Carolinians from danger, besides taking from prisons and placing in homes a large class of worthy British subjects. The king and parliament favored the project. American colonization had already proved fruitful to the English government. An appropriation was made for this object, and, on the 9th of June, 1732, the king granted a charter for founding the colony of Georgia; the name being given as a compliment to King George II., the reigning monarch of Great Britain. Twenty-one "noblemen and gentlemen" were entrusted with the management of the new settlement, who were constituted "Trustees for settling and establishing the colony of Georgia." One of these trustees was Oglethorpe. To them was given the powers of legislating for the colony for the space of twenty-one years, at the expiration of which time, a permanent government was to be established by the king or his successor or successors, in accordance with British law and usage. The great philanthropist, who had managed and planned this scheme for the benefit of the unfortunates in his realm, tendered his services to accompany the emigrants and assist them in making their first settlement. Never did any project more completely commend itself to the hearts of the British people. Donations from all ranks and classes were freely given to assist the emigrants in planting comfortable homes in the wilderness. A generous gift was made by the Bank of England, and the House of Commons, from time to time, voted money, amounting in the aggregate, in the course of two years, to $160,000. The trustees chose Lord Viscount Percival as president, and a code of regulations for the colony, with agreements and stipulations, was speedily prepared. Everything being in readiness, thirty-five families amounting to one hundred and twenty emigrants, men women and children—sailed from Gravesend for Georgia in the ship Anne, of two hundred tons burden, on the 6th of November, 1732. Oglethorpe, who was commissioned as the first governor, went with them, and the Rev. Mr. Shubert, of the Church of England, also accompanied them as their spiritual guide. The trustees of the colony, in the hope of growing silk in Georgia, sent with these emigrants a dozen Piedemontese silk-workers.

THE BIBLE ON LYING.†

GOD who can justly take life, cannot lie. A lie is contrary to the very nature of God. "It is impossible for God to lie." And if God cannot lie, God cannot authorize another to lie. What is unjustifiable in God's sight, is without a possibility of justification in the universe. No personal or social emergency can justify a lie, whatever may be its apparent gain, or whatever harm may seem to be involved in a refusal to speak it.

The Bible opens with a picture of the first pair in Paradise, to whom God tells the simple truth, and to whom the enemy of man tells a lie; and it shows the ruin of mankind wrought by that lie, and the author of the lie punished because of its telling. The Bible closes with a picture of Paradise, into which are gathered the lovers and doers of truth, and from which is excluded "every one that loveth and doeth a lie;" while "all liars" are to have their part "in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death." In the Old Testament and in the New, God is represented as himself the Truth, to whom, by his very nature, the doing or the speaking of a lie is impossible, while Satan is represented as a liar and as the "father of lies."

While the human servants of God, as represented in the Bible narrative, are in many instances guilty of lying, their lies are clearly contrary to the great principle, in the light of which the Bible itself is written, that a lie is always wrong, and that it cannot have justification in God's sight. The idea of the Bible record is that God is true, though every man were a liar. God is uniformly represented as opposed to lies and to liars, and a lie in his sight is spoken as a lie unto him, or as a lie against him. In the few cases where the Bible narrative has been thought by some to indicate an approval by the Lord of a lie, that was told, as it were, in his interest, an examination of the facts will show that they offer no exception to the rule that, by the Bible standard, a lie is never justifiable.

Take, for example, the case of the Hebrew midwives, who lied to the officials of Pharaoh, when they were commanded to kill every Hebrew male child; and of whom it is said that "God dealt well with the midwives; . . . and . . . because the midwives feared God, . . . he made them houses." Here it is plain that God commended their fear of him, not their lying in behalf of his people, and that it was "because the midwives feared God" not because they lied, "that he made them houses." It was their choice of the Lord above the gods and rulers of Egypt that won them the approval of the Lord, even though they were sinners in being liars; as in an earlier day it was the approval of Jacob's high estimate of the birthright, and not the deceits practiced by him on Esau and his father Isaac, that the Lord showed in confirming a blessing to Jacob.

Abraham is called the father of the faithfull and he was known as the friend of God. But he indulged in the vice of concubinage, in accordance with the loose morals of his day and of his surroundings; and when he was down in Egypt he lied through his distrust of God, apparently thinking that there was such a thing as a "lie of necessity," and he brought upon himself the rebuke of an Egyptian king because of his lying. But it would be folly to claim that God approved of concubinage or of lying, because a man whom he was saving was guilty of either of these vices. Isaac also lied, and so did Jacob; but it was not because of their lies that these men had favor with God. David was a man after God's own heart in his fidelity of spirit to God as the only true God, in contrast with the gods of the nations round about Israel; but David lied, as David committed adultery. It would hardly be claimed, however, that either his adultery or his lying in itself made David a man after God's own heart. So all along the Bible narrative, down to the time when Ananias and Sapphira, prominent among the early Christians, lied unto God concerning their very gifts into his treasury, and were struck dead as a rebuke of their lying.

The whole sweep of Bible teaching is opposed to lying; and the specific injunctions against that sin, as well as the calls to the duty of truth-speaking, are illustrative of that sweep. "Ye shall not steal; neither shall ye deal falsely, nor lie one to another," says the Lord, in holding up the right standard before his children. "A lying tongue" is said to be "an abomination" before the Lord. "A faithful witness will not lie: but a false witness breatheth out lies," says Solomon, in marking the one all-dividing line of character; and as to the results of lying he says, "He that breatheth out lies shall not escape," and "he that breatheth out lies shall perish." And he adds the conclusion of wisdom, in view of the supposed profit of lying, "A poor man is better than a liar;" that is, a truth-telling poor man is better than a rich liar.

It would seem to be clear that the Bible, and also the other sacred books of the world, and the best moral sense of mankind everywhere, are united in deeming a lie incompatible with the idea of a holy God, and consistent only with the spirit of man's arch-enemy—the embodiment of all evil.

AFRO-AMERICAN PROGRESS.*

From the very first time since the Afro-American had a right to exercise his freedom in this country, his course with regard to church, State and society, has been followed with more than ordinary zeal, and his progress in the various pursuits undertaken by him have been noted with an exacting eye, characteristic of the most watchful. Why he has been watched in this peculiar way is not hard to be seen when the circumstances surrounding his life have been taken into consideration. When one remembers that he was brought from Africa only two centuries ago, an uncivilized and barbarous creature, and settled in a country where he was deprived of the privilege of becoming even properly civilized; when one remembers that during the aforesaid period he had not one iota of opportunity to understand the most unpretentious business act in state and church, when one remembers that he was not allowed (if he desired), to think of a business transaction in any of its ramifications, were they ever so small; when it is remembered that the whole world was closed against him for centuries, save that of labor in the field of his owner, and when it is remembered that he faced the world as freeman, laborer, mechanic, student, scholar, lawyer, doctor, engineer, business man, journalist, etc., under the most embarrassing circumstances, the desire of mind and heart for a complete knowledge of his development, grows into a mountain of curiosity. Thus it can be said that he is the cynosure of all nations.

If the above be true (which everyone in fairness will admit), the next thought that would likely present itself is: Has the Afro-American made any commendable progress amid the multiplicity of disadvantages which have beset him? We freely assert that he has; and it is with this thought in mind that we deal with the facts of his journalistic career of sixty-three years, dating from the first paper published in New York city, March 16, 1827, to the present auspicious year of 1893. And from our observations we predict that the nineteenth Century will close with a halo of journalistic sunshine about his head, and the Twentieth Century open with succeeding new events indicative of his triumphant success.

21 Years of Pain

I suffered with eczema or salt rheum, in such terrible agony at times that I could not walk about the house. I had so many failures with medicines that when a friend urged me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, I hesitated, but finally took it. The hoped for benefit was noticeable at the outset, and I have taken twelve bottles. I am completely well and feel like a new woman. I can't thank or praise Hood's Sarsaparilla enough for what it has done for me. MRS. JOSEPHINE BOYCE, 18 Division Street, Peekskill, N. Y. Be sure to get Hood's because

A Famous Divine Dead.

Rev. Philip Schaff, Chief of the American Board of Revisers, Passes Away.

FEW men in the present day have attained such eminence in learning, and especially in the domain of Sacred Literature and Church History, as the late Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, whose life of usefulness closed in New York a few days ago. Dr. Schaff was born at Coire, Switzerland, in 1819, and was educated at the leading European universities, where he won the highest honors. In 1842 he was first recognized as an authority on Biblical Exegesis and Church History and soon thereafter became an instructor in the German Reformed Theological Seminary at Mercersburg, Pa. His extraordinary learning and activity were quickly felt in his new field, and his translations and lectures gave rise to what became known as the "Mercersburg Theological Movement." His lectures and writings at Mercersburg extended over a period of twenty years. His liberalism at one time subjected him to a charge of heresy, but on his trial before the Synod in 1845, he was honorably acquitted.

THE LATE REV. PHILIP SCHAFF, D. D., LL. D.

In 1854 Dr. Schaff went to Europe as the representative of the German Reformed Church in America, to two important religious convocations—the Ecclesiastical Diet at Frankfort and the Swiss Pastoral Conference at Basle. On his return he was invited to occupy the chair of Ecclesiastical History at Andover Theological Seminary, which he held for five years, being afterward elected Professor of Church History at the Hartford Theological Institute. He afterward held various professorships in Union Theological Seminary, and found opportunity, even in the busiest part of an extraordinarily active career, to devote time to official duties in connection with the New York Sabbath Committee and as a prominent member of the Evangelical Alliance, of which he was one of the founders. As instructor, historian, commentator and advocate of Christian principles, he was equally known and valued throughout the United States, and by thousands of Bible scholars and students in Europe also.

Perhaps the greatest work of his life and that in which he rendered the largest service to his day and generation, was the part he bore in the Revision of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures. He was the president and the organizer of the American Committee of Revisers, one of his duties being to select from among the great body of the American clergy those who were to assist in the important work of revising the New Testament. The Revised New Testament was published in 1881 and the Old Testament in 1885.

He was a most prolific and able writer, his style either in German or English being equally clear and cogent. Among his leading works are "A History of the Christian Church," "A Companion to the Greek Testament and the English Version," the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge," "The Creeds of Christendom, with a History of Critical Notes," "Through Bible Lands," "The Person of Christ," "Bible Dictionary," and the "History of the Apostolic Church." The last effort of his pen was a contribution to the World's Religious Congress at Chicago, "The Reunion of Christendom," which he was too ill to deliver in person. He never fully recovered from the effects of a stroke of paralysis which he experienced a year ago.

FROM GRATITUDE TO WORSHIP

The instinct of worship is stronger in the heart of some of the heathen than among ourselves. A remarkable case illustrating the fact is related by Rev. E. O. Dunlop who has been itinerating on the West Coast of Siam, who says: "A poor fellow who had been beaten over the head and cut with a large knife, was abandoned by native doctors. They pronounced his case hopeless. I was invited to care for him; the lancet and poultices soon eased his pain. On the third day I asked him concerning his object of worship, and was both surprised and grieved by his answer, for he said, 'Since you have helped me I have resolved to worship you; and last night and this morning I have made my offerings to you.' I at once urged the sufferer to worship the true God. He also told me that after the native doctors abandoned him he secreted a knife and had determined to end his sufferings by suicide. He gradually turned from all else to the worship of the true and living God."

AN EVANGELIST'S PERIL.

Mr J Malcolm Sawers tells of some Remarkable Experiences in his Gospel Car in Minnesota.

IN a recent letter, Mr. J. Malcolm Sawers, who has been evangelizing in the Northwestern part of Minnesota for the past month, gives an intensely interesting account of his experences. He writes: "This part of the State has been in excitement over a number of murders which have taken place on and near the railroads. It is overrun with men out of work, most of them having gotten through with their engagements on the harvest field. While side-tracked at one of the small towns, a representative of about twenty desperate-looking characters ran after me and stopped me just before getting on the car, demanding money to buy bread, the only alternative being to grant his request. A few minutes afterward, the same request was made by another of the gang from Mr. Johnson, our present Chapel Car assistant, which of course had to be granted also. It was about 6:30 P. M., the night was cold. All of the gang disappeared but two who stopped for the meeting, after which, "when night's dark mantle had covered all," in the stillness of the night, a number of those same fellows came back and congregated near the car in a deep ditch, and began talking over operations. One of them took away our coupling link, which had the effect of causing us to breathlessly await further developments, for it was now midnight. We were certain that no harm should befall us, having committed ourselves to our Saviour's care, but it sent a tremor through us which we shall not soon forget. They were laying plans to plunder the post-office, and if needs be, do some shooting.

"The next place we came to we had a similar experience, where four murders had been committed only three weeks before, and in the morning we found that one of these murders had been committed on the very spot where we had been side-tracked, and to add to our greater horror, three desperadoes, able-bodied fellows with liquor in them, secreted themselves between the wheels, right under our living apartment at eight o'clock, but two little boys providentially noticed them, and acquainted me with the fact, when they were secured until the chief of police arrived, who took them under his affectionate care the remainder of the night, marching them out of town in the morning with a trusty promise that if ever they should be found in town that they should run the risk of getting five years in the penitentiary. Nearly all of the male portion of the town carry fire-arms, such being the necessity of the case.

"This last trip has been one of mighty blessing to many families, God setting his seal on our work in every hamlet that we visited."

The success of Mr. Sawers' work in his Chapel Car Evangel has exceeded all expectations. His report of September work shows: Thirteen towns visited, 761 miles traveled, 41 sermons and addresses, 45 families visited, 2 Sunday-Schools addressed, 64 letters written, 2527 pages of tracts distributed, and 75 professed conversions.

For Headache and Indigestion

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

A prominent physician of Buffalo, N. Y., says of it: "I have severe headaches, and it relieves them. I am fond of the pleasures of the table, and as a consequence of my indulgence [illegible] I have to pay the penalty. It divides penalty with me. Indeed it is an indispensable article to me."

An Asthma Cure at Last

European physicians and medical journals report a positive cure for Asthma, in the Kola plant, found in the Congo River, West Africa. The Kola Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, are sending free sample cases of the Kola Compound by mail to all sufferers from Asthma, who send name and address and 4c. stamps. A trial can't cost nothing.

THE BIBLE IN AUSTRIA.

In the journals of the colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society now engaged in Vienna, there are recorded many interesting and instructive incidents of a Gospel character. On visiting a carpenter's shop one colporteur was met with derision by the workmen. One of the journeymen, however, rebuked his fellows, and told them that a Testament bought many years ago had made him very happy and brought him peace. This testimony was not in vain; several copies were purchased. Several said that they had burnt their Testaments by order of the priest, although some admitted that the books were very good. In a few cases other copies were purchased. In the course of a visit paid to a town not far from the metropolis, another colporteur offered his books at a baker's. The latter replied: "I long for the whole truth; where can I find it?" The colporteur pointed several passages out to him, and the baker ordered a Bible and a New Testament. A few days later he passed the same shop, and the owner called him in: "I am so glad you brought me these books; I found what I sought—the whole truth—I cannot keep it to myself. I must make my friends acquainted with the same. Please bring me nine other copies for this purpose." One day a colporteur offered his books to a woman. The latter opened a cupboard and took a Bible down from the shelf. The look of the book betrayed its frequent use. "Some years ago," the woman remarked, "you sold this Bible to a young man, a lodger. He made good use of it and read it to us. 'It is my greatest treasure,' he used to say; 'I would not part with it for all the riches in the world.' Not long after he died peacefully and happy. This Bible is the only legacy he left us, and I and my children like so much to read in it that we would not give up the book for anything."

THE LESSON OF FOLDED HANDS.

You may have heard the story how, long ago, in quaint old Nurenberg, lived two boys, Albrecht Durer and Franz Knigstein. Both wished to be artists, and both studied and wrought with great earnestness. Albrecht had genius, but Franz had only love for art, without the power to put on canvas the beautiful visions that haunted him. When they compared their work that of Franz was cold and lifeless, while Albrecht's was instinct with beauty and pathos. Then Franz saw it all and knew that he could never be an artist. His heart was almost broken, but he said in a voice choked with tears, yet full of manly courage, "Albrecht, the good Lord gave me no such gift as this of yours; but something, some homely duty. He has waiting somewhere for me to do. Yet now, be you artist of Nuremberg, and I"—"Stay, Franz, be still one moment," cried Albrecht, seizing his pencil. Franz waited patiently in his attitude of surrender, his hands folded together. With swift pencil Albrecht drew a few lines and showed the sketch to his friend. "Why, those are only my hands," said Franz. "Why did you take them?" "I took them," said Albrecht, "as you stood there making the sad surrender of your life so very bravely. I said to myself, 'Those hands that may never paint a picture can now most certainly make one.' I have faith in those folded hands, my brother-friend. They will go to men's hearts."

Durer's famous "Folded Hands" is but a picture of the hands of Franz Knigstein as they were folded that day when he gave up his heart's dearest wish, and yet believed that the Lord had some duty still worth his doing.

The Gospel in the Prisons.

BY CHARLES COOK, EVANGELIST.

IN running through Canada and the West on my recent evangelistic tour, I could not help noticing that the churches were superior in construction, convenience and comfort to any others I had ever seen. I have been laboring amongst Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists, and found a brotherly, loving spirit manifested, less occupied by doctrine than duty. Every opportunity was afforded of addressing the different ministerial associations and colleges. All were busy and occupied in church work and the alleviation of sorrow and distress.

I was surprised to find little or no open-air work and, in some cases, after-meetings were not held. In Canada one minister said, "We need educating on open-air work."

In Chicago, I found Mr. Moody and his workers very busy, many theatres, tents and churches being pressed into service. 75,000 persons were present at the Sunday evening meetings. Among the helpers present whom I knew were Mr. Henry Varley, Rev. John McNeill, Dr. Arthur Pierson, Rev. Geo. Needham, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Bennett and Geo. Inglis. John McNeill's meetings were specially crowded, he preaching four times on Sundays and Mr. Moody likewise.

Ordinary church life and work seemed somewhat upset by the interest caused by the World's Fair. One of the leading ministers said to me, "While my church is crowded on Sunday, it is difficult to get an audience on week nights. Our church work seems somewhat demoralized for the time being." The churches on my route I found occupied with Christian work, and had large attendances wherever I preached. In making a tour of Canadian prisons and penitentiaries, I found much to admire, but there are some things which call for reform. Canada seems especially blessed with good wardens who are doing their utmost to bring about the prison reforms that are needed. They are trying to abolish the association system, and are loud in praise of the American principle of "indeterminate sentences." Many of the cells are the smallest in the world, being 8 feet long and only 28 inches wide. This calls for special comment. They are hoping to do away with this inhumanity and have already begun to build larger cells. Concerning the American prisons which I visited, I found them clean and comfortable. Most of the prisoners were engaged in some kind of work, although, in some instances, men were idle, which is a mistake. The system of convict contracts is hardly fair to outside labor and the work in Joliet Penitentiary, where the system is still in existence, is about to be undertaken on State account.

As an instance of liberality accorded to me when preaching among the prisoners, I may mention that a Roman Catholic priest in one prison brought in his own flock, desirous that I should speak to them also, while addressing the Protestant prisoners. He also elected himself to stay as an auditor.

The gathering together of so many thousands in Chicago, has naturally brought toy gether a vast number of criminals, and crime has during the last six months wonderfully increased. When I visited the Cook County Jail, 600 men were confined there. I found 300 prisoners together smoking, reading and talking, among them many dangerous murderers, and I asked the official who conducted me around, what class of criminals they principally were. He said, "mostly murderers. They are as guilty of robbing each other here as committing robbery outside." One man recently murdered another, and another lost $36 out of his pocket while sleeping in the same cell with a second prisoner.

A pathetic incident happened in a Canadian prison. In a hymn book which I took up, the following lines were found: "Mary Douglas left Scotland, July, 1881, reached Canada, August, 1881, once a father's pet and a mother's joy, but now a poor drunkard, but God will save me yet." Mary has been advertised for, but they have not as yet heard from her.

Of these "outcasts of society," men and women unable to help themselves, there are thousands in many lands who rarely hear the Gospel except through such visits. Giving them New Testaments and holding simple services in the prisons, is a work which should commend itself to thoughtful Christian people. Having government credentials from many of the authorities of different countries, I have been able to enter prisons which would be closed to most men. There are at least one million people in prison in Europe alone, and the majority of them are without the Gospel of Christ. Any help in reaching these neglected ones, or in supplying them with Testaments, can be sent to me at 60 Clinton Place, New York City.

AN ENEMY TO THE GOSPEL.

When the celebrated Justin Perkins was in Persia over fifty years ago, he received a letter from a friend in the United States, inquiring as to the attitude of the people of Persia on temperance. His reply was:

"The intoxicating article mostly used here is the wine of the country, which is plentiful and cheap. Another article considerably used is arrak, brandy distilled from dried grapes, or from the refuse after the wine is extracted. Our missionary brethren who have just arrived were preceded by one week by a caravan bearing among other poisons of the kind, eighteen barrels of New England rum. What an indignity cast upon the poor brutes even, who are made to plod their way over a journey of near seven hundred miles, crossing almost impassable mountains, and groaning beneath their almost intolerable burdens, which tend only to degrade the species that drive them, incomparably below themselves. I see no other American manufacture in the markets here than New England rum. Can the enterprising men of my country send to Mohammedan Persia no better commercial representatives? Well may the American churches multiply their missionaries to this country if it were only to repair the evils that were sown here by New England.

"I was walking out a little distance from the city, and my Armenian servant was with me. As we approached some beautiful gardens he began to weep, I enquired, the cause, and he answered, 'Sir, I have not come this road before for six years, and it always makes me weep to come here. My father once owned those fine gardens, he drank much wine, it made him a fool; he got into a quarrel and killed a Mussulman. He was shut up in prison, came near losing his life, and escaped only by giving the governor all his property. Before, he was rich, he owned a good house and these gardens and kept two servants; now we have all of us, my father, my wife, my child, and myself, nothing to buy clothes with but the five dollars a month which you pay me for living with you.'"

The United States to-day exports vast cargoes of spirits to Africa and other lands in which our missionaries are laboring to extend the Gospel. Only a short time ago, news came from Africa of a steamship arriving on the west coast, with four missionaries and 40,000 gallons of rum. It was not surprising that the missionaries, when they knew of the hideous cargo that had accompanied them, should have experienced the keenest sorrow and shame for their country which, while professing Christianity, sent out to the ignorant heathen the means of moral and physical degradation and destruction.

LUCY STONE'S BUSY LIFE CLOSED.

"I Expect on the Other Side Still to be Busy for Good," She Said when Dying.

IN the death of Mrs. Lucy Stone Blackwell, at her home in Dorchester, Mass., last week, one of the most notable American women of the last half century passed away. Lucy Stone was born on a farm near West Brookfield, Mass., seventy-five years ago. Almost from childhood, she showed extraordinary intellectual capacity and as she grew to young womanhood, surprised her parents with the expression of a desire to go to college. Such a thing as a plain farmer's girl going to college was unheard in those days, but the barefooted girl who worked on the farm had in her small frame an indomitable will and a noble, pure, consecrated purpose, and she resolved to go to college at whatever material cost. She picked berries and chestnuts and sold them to buy books, and as her knowledge grew, she taught school and studied alternately until she was twenty-five when her ambition was gratified and she was able to go to Oberlin College. Here she paid a large part of her expenses by doing housework for others and even did her own cooking. In the four years of her college life she had only one new dress—a cheap print—and she could not bear the expense of a single visit home. As soon as she was graduated, in 1847, Lucy Stone took up the work of her life as a warm and earnest advocate of the higher education and development of woman, spiritually and intellectually, and also of her right to representation in legislation and government. As one of the pioneers of the woman's movement she had to encounter much abuse and many privations, and frequently the meetings at which she spoke were broken up by disorderly crowds. Although she became known as an abolitionist, she never allowed her sympathy for the negro to overshadow the subject nearest to her heart. And, at last, after years of rough experience and abuse, people began to see the real merit in this brave, little, gentle-faced woman, with quiet, unassuming manners and sweet, musical voice, and they crowded to listen wherever she appeared.

In her later life she devoted much of her energies to the work in which she, and William Lloyd Garrison and Julia Ward Howe were associated, and in the editorship of the Woman's Journal. Her husband, Henry B. Blackwell, a merchant of Cincinnati, was in full sympathy with her work. Both were stanch Christians, and only a few hours before passing away, Mrs. Blackwell said to those who stood around her: "I look forward to the other side as the brightest side, and I expect still to be busy for good things."

A Perilous Missionary Tour.

The Story of a Woman's Heroic Attempt to Carry the Gospel into Tibet—Miss Annie R. Taylor's Life Repeatedly Endangered by Poison, Cold, Starvation and Brigands.

BEFORE many more years have passed, Tibet, the mysterious "Roof of the World," as it has been called by reason of its snowy altitudes, will have become evangelized. During long centuries, this strangely secluded country, concerning which the civilized world even yet knows very little, has been kept almost hermetically sealed to all other nations than the Chinese. It lies to the northeast of India and west of China, and has about three times the area of France, with great ranges of mountains and the loftiest table-lands on the globe. Owing to the strict prohibitions, very few white travelers have ever attempted to penetrate to Inner Tibet, and of those who have reached Lhassa, the capital, only two have returned alive to tell their experiences.

It fell to the lot of a Christian woman—Miss Annie R. Taylor, of the China Inland Mission—to be the first to cross the frontier bearing the Gospel message. Miss Taylor, who has now been engaged nine years in missionary work, had been located for a time at Tau-Chau, in China, near the Tibetan frontier, being the first English missionary in that city. In 1887 she visited the Great Lama monastery of Kum-bum, beyond which lay the vast unevangelised land that seemed to beckon her forward. After much consideration, she resolved to make the attempt to penetrate Central Asia, and if possible reach Lhassa, the sacred city of the Lamas and the capital of Tibet. With this view she went to Darjeeling on the Bengal frontier, and at a little Tibetan village nearby she studied the language and customs of the country she was about to enter. She set out in 1888, on her journey, trusting to the Lord for protection from danger. After several adventures, she reached a Tibetan fort near Kambojang, and here the hostility of the natives toward foreigners began to be apparent. They "prayed her dead," according to the native custom but she lived and still pushed on. The wife of a chief attempted to poison her by mixing aconite with her food and the native chiefs commanded her to return to the border, but she succeeded in securing the services of a faithful man-servant named Pontso —a native of Lhassa and her first Tibetan convert—and with his aid she still determined to press onward.

A year was spent on the frontier near Tau-chau before she made her next attempt. In the care of a Chinese Mohammedan named Noga, and his friendly wife, Miss Taylor with four servants and Pontso, set out for the interior. Noga proved to be a mercenary rascal who had planned to rob and murder her. Soon after leaving Tau-chau, the party encountered eight brigands, but the enemy were driven off after a sharp but bloodless fusilade. Soon thereafter, a force of two hundred brigands attacked them. Two of the travelers were killed and eight wounded, while nearly all their property was seized, but Miss Taylor and Pontso succeeded in escaping. Noga's persecution continued, however, for he attempted to stir up the natives to waylay and murder her, and to excite their cupidity, he circulated stories that she carried precious stones concealed in her robes. At this time she felt very strongly the divine protecting hand and had many providential escapes from deadly perils. On one occasion for three days and nights, with her servant, Pontso, she lost her way in the mountains, finding afterwards that this had been God's method of sheltering them from a deliberate attempt at murder planned by Noga. When three days' journey from Lhassa, she was arrested by Tibetan soldiers and brought before an official who advised her to return, adding that if she persisted in going on, he would be executed for allowing her to proceed. The missionary, having exhausted every possible resource, and not wishing to have the responsibility of any man's blood upon her head, was thus compelled to set her face away from the capital city and begin a long and terrible return journey to China.

What she suffered on the outward march was as nothing to the perils and privations that now beset her on every side. Noga had robbed her and the brigands completed the spoliation, so the Tibetan chiefs gave her two horses, an old tent and some food. The supply of provisions soon gave out and the small party was reduced to semi-starvation. At the same time, the intense cold at those great altitudes prostrated them, two men of their escort dying from its effects. Miss Taylor passed twenty consecutive nights in the open air, sleeping on the ground with snow falling all around and no shelter near. The horses were ravenous with hunger and ate even woollen clothing. Rivers were to be forded or crossed on the slippery ice and hazards, such as not one woman in a thousand would have dreamed of facing, were of daily occurrence. Yet amid all, the devoted and courageous missionary, though baffled in her effort to reach Lhassa, sowed Gospel seed by the way at every opportunity, both among her escort and in such towns, villages and hamlets as she passed through.

ANNIE R. TAYLOR, THE BRAVE CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY WHO, WITH HER NATIVE SERVANT, ENTERED TIBET.

A most exciting experience was her meeting with a tribe known as the Golocks, governed by a woman chief, named Wachu Bumo. This is a most ungovernable tribe, amenable neither to Chinese nor to Tibetan authority, and living entirely by plunder. Its members go out in parties of 500 to 2000, and are so certain of victory that the women and children also go out to see the fighting. They are the wealthiest tribe in Tibet. Wachu Bumo fortunately became quite friendly to Miss Taylor, and gave her a royal safeguard through the Golock territory. After many other adventures, the traveler reached Ta Chien Fu in Chinese territory safely nearly four months having been occupied in the return journey.

Many interesting examples of peculiar Tibetan customs and superstitions were observed by the traveler. By the native religion, the life of an insect is held as sacred as that of a man. The people lie unscrupulously in trading but are absolutely truthful in dealing with an enemy. The Golocks never rob within their own territory, and bribery is unknown there. Throughout Tibet, a woman is safe from violence, whether a foreigner or not. The climate is so intensely cold that tea freezes as soon as poured out and cooking is exceedingly difficult.

Miss Taylor's experience, far from deterring, has rather stimulated the zealous desire of other missionaries to continue in Tibet the Gospel work she began. Miss Taylor herself is now agitating for a Tibetan Mission on the lines of the China Inland Mission, and she proposes that twelve missionaries—all men and six of them medical missionaries—be the advance guard. She has no desire that other women should be subjected to perils like those she experienced

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Acts xix: 32: "Some therefore cried one thing, and some another; for the assembly was confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together. And they drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander beckoned with the hand, and would have made his defense unto the people But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

EPHESUS was upside down. It was about the silver question. A manufacturer of silver boxes for holding heathen images had called his laborers together to discuss the behavior of one Paul, who had been in public places assaulting image-worship, and consequently very much damaging that particular business. There was great excitement in the city. People stood in knots along the streets, violently gesticulating, and calling each other hard names. Some of the people favored the policy of the silversmith; other people favored the policy of Paul. There were great moral questions involved; but these did not bother them at all. The only question about which they seemed to be interested was concerning the wages and the salaried positions. The silversmith and his compeers had put up factories at great expense for the making of these silver boxes, and now, if this new policy is to be inaugurated, the business will go down, the laborers will be thrown out of employment, and the whole city will suffer. Well, what is to be done? "Call a convention," says some one; for in all ages a convention has been a panacea for public evils. The convention is called, and, as they want the largest room in the city, they take the theatre. Having there assembled, they all want to get the floor, and they all want to talk at once. You know what excitement that always makes in a convention, where a great many people want to talk at once. Some cried one thing, some cried another. Some wanted to denounce, some wanted to resolve. After a while a prominent man gets the floor, and he begins to speak; but they very soon hiss him down, and then the confusion rises into worse uproar, and they begin to shout, all of them together, and they keep on until they are red in face and hoarse in the throat, for two long hours crying out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians! Great is Diana of the Ephesians!"

The whole scene reminds me of the excitement we have almost every autumn at the elections. While that goddess Diana has lost her worshipers, and her temples have gone into the dust, our American people want to set up a god in place of it, and they want us all to bow down before it; and that god is Political Party. Considering our superior civilization, I have to declare to you that the Ephesian idolatry was less offensive in the sight of God than is this all-absorbing American partisanship.

While there are honest men, true men, Christian men, who stand in both political parties, and who come into the autumnal elections resolving to serve their city or their State or the nation in the best possible way, I have noticed also that with many it is a mere contest between the ins and the outs those who are trying to stay in and keep the outs out, and those who are out trying to get in and thrust the ins out. And one party cries, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" and the other party cries, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" neither of them honest enough to say, "Great is my pocket-book!"

Once or twice a year it is my custom to talk to the people about public affairs from what I call a Christian standpoint, and this morning I have chosen for that duty. I hope to say a practical word. History tells us of a sermon once preached amidst the Highlands of Scotland—a sermon two hours long—on the sin of luxury, where there were not more than three pairs of shoes in the audience; and during our last war a good man went into a hospital distributing tracts, and gave a tract on "The Sin of Dancing" to a man both of whose legs had been amputated! But I hope this morning to present an appropriate and adapted word, as next Tuesday, at the ballot-box, great affairs are to be settled. The Rev. Dr. Emmons, in the early history of our country, in Massachusetts, preached about the election of Thomas Jefferson to the Presidency. The Rev. Dr. Mayhew, of Boston, in the early days of our republic, preached about the repeal of the Stamp Act. There are times when ministers of Christ must look off upon public affairs and discuss them. We need go back to no example. Every man is, before God, responsible for his own duty. If the Norwegian boasts of his home of rocks, and the Siberian is pleased with his land of perpetual snow; if the Roman thought that the muddy Tiber was the favored river in the sight of heaven, and if the Laplander shivers out his eulogy of his native clime, and if the Chinese have pity for anybody born outside of the "flowery kingdom," shall not we, born under these fair skies, and standing day by day amidst these glorious civil and religious liberties, be public-spirited? I propose to tell the people very plainly what I consider to be their Christian duty at the ballot-box?

First, set yourself against all political falsehood. The most monstrous lies ever told in this country are during the elections. I stop at the door of a Democratic meeting and listen, and hear that the Republicans are liars. I stop at the door of a Republican meeting and listen, and hear that the Democrats are scoundrels. Our public men microscopized, and the truth distorted. Who believes a tenth part of what he reads or hears in the autumnal elections? Men who at other seasons of the year are very careful in their speech become peddlers of scandal.

In the far East there is a place where, once a year, they let the people do as they please and say what they please, and the place is full of uproar, misrule and wickedness, and they call it the "Devil's day." The nearest approximation to that in this country has been the first Tuesday in November. The community at such times seems to say, "Go to, now; let us have a good time at lying." Prominent candidates for office are denounced as unprincipled and renegade. A smart lie will start in the corner of a country newspaper, and keep on running until it has captured the printing presses of the whole continent. What garbling of speeches! What misinterpretation of motives! What misrepresentation of individual antecedents. The trouble is that we have in this country two great manufactories—manufactories of lies—the Republican manufactory of lies and the Democratic manufactory of lies—and they are run day and night, and they turn out half a dozen a day all equipped and ready for full sailing. Large lies and small lies. Lies private and lies public and lies prurient. Lies cut bias and lies cut diagonal. Long-limbed lies and lies with double-back action. Lies complimentary and lies defamatory. Lies that some people believe, and lies that all the people believe, and lies that nobody believes. Lies with humps like camels and scales like crocodiles and necks as long as storks, and feet as swift as an antelope's, and stings like adders. Lies raw and scalloped and panned and stewed. Crawling lies and jumping lies and soaring lies. Lies with attachment screws and rufflers and braiders and ready-wound bobbins. Lies by Christian people who never lie except during elections, and lies by people who always lie, but beat themselves in a political campaign.

I confess I am ashamed to have a foreigner visit this country in these times. I should think he would stand dazed, and dare not go out nights! What will the hundreds of thousands of foreigners who come here to live think of us? What a disgust they must have for the land of their adoption! The only good thing about it is that many of them cannot understand the English language. But I suppose the German, and Italian, and Swedish, and French papers translate it all, and peddle out the infernal stuff to their subscribers.

Nothing but Christianity will ever stop such a flood of indecency. The Christian religion will speak after a while. The billingsgate and low scandal through which we wade almost every autumn must be rebuked by that religion which speaks from its two great mountains, from the one mountain intoning the command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," and from the other mount making plea for kindness and love and blessing rather than cursing. O, Christian men! frown upon political falsehood! Remember that a political lie is as black as any other kind of a lie. God has recorded all the falsehoods that have been told at the city, state or national elections since the foundation of this Government; and, though the perpetrators and their victims may have gone into the dust, in the last day judgment will be awarded. The falsehoods that Aaron Burr breathed into the ear of Blennerhasset, the slanders that Lieutenant General Gage proclaimed about George Washington, the misrepresentations in regard to James Monroe, are as fresh on God's book today as the lies that were printed last week about our local candidates. "And all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

Again, I counsel you as Christian men to set yourselves against the misuse of money in political campaigns. Of the thousands of dollars already spent this autumn, how much of the amount do you suppose has been properly used? You have a right to spend money for the publishing of political tracts, for the establishment of organizations for the carrying out of what you consider to be the best; you have a right to appeal to the reason of men by argument and statistics and by facts. Printing and renting of public halls and political meetings cost money, but he who puts a bribe into the hand of a voter, or plies weak men with mercenary and corrupt motives, commits a sin against God and the nation. Bribery is one of the most appalling sins of this country. God says, "Fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery." Have nothing to do with such a sin, O Christian man! Fling it from the ballot box. Hand over to the police the man who attempts to tamper with your vote, and remember that elections that cannot be carried without bribes ought never to be carried at all. Again I ask you as Christian men to set yourselves against the dissipations that hover over the ballot-box. Let me say that no man can afford to go into political life who is not a teetotaler. Hot political discussion somehow creates an unnatural thirst, and hundreds of thousands of men have gone down into drunkenness through political life. After an exciting canvass through the evening you must "take something;" and rising in the morning with less animation than usual, you must "take something;" and going off among your comrades through the forenoon, you meet political friends, and you must "take something;" and in the afternoon you meet other political friends, and you must "take something;" and before night has come something has taken you. There are but few cases where men have been able to stand up against the dissipations of political life. Joseph was a politician, but he maintained his integrity. Daniel was a politician, but he was a teetotaler to the last. Abraham was a politician, but he was always characterized as the father of the faithful. Moses was a politician, the grandest of them; but he honored God more than he did the Pharaohs. And there are hundreds of Christian men now in the political parties, maintaining their integrity, even when they are obliged to stand amidst the blasted, lecherous, and loathsome crew that sometimes surround the ballet-box; these Christian men doing their political duty, and then coming back to the prayer-meetings and Christian circles as pure as when they went out. But that is not the ordinary circumstance; that is the exception. How often you see men coming back from the political conflict, and their eye is glazed, and their cheek has an unnatural flush, and they talk louder than they usually do, and at the least provocation they will bet, and you say they are convivial, or they are exceedingly vivacious, or you apply some other sweet name to them; but God knows they are drunk! Some of you, a month or six weeks ago, had no more religion than you ought to have, and after the elections are over, to calculate how much religion you have left will be a sum in vulgar fractions. Oh, the pressure is tremendous!

How many mighty intellects have gone down under the dissipation of politics! I think of one who came from the West. He was able to stand out against the whole American Senate. God had given him faculties enough to govern a kingdom, or to frame a constitution. His voice was terrible to his country's enemies and a mighty inspiration in the day of national peril. But twenty glasses of strong drink a day were his usual allowance and he went down into the habits of a confirmed inebriate. Alas for him! Though a costly monument has been reared over his resting-place, the young men of this country shall not be denied the awful lesson that the agency by which the world was robbed of one of its mightiest intellects, and our country of one of its ablest constitutional defenders was the dissipation of political life. You want to know who I mean? Young man, ask your father. The adverse tide is fearful, and I warn you against it!

You need not go far off to find the worn-out politician. Here he is, stumbling along the highway, his limbs hardly able to hold him up. Bent over and pale with exhausting sickness. Surly to anybody who accosts him. His last decent article of apparel pawned for strong drink. Glad if, when going by a grocery, some low acquaintance invites him in to take a sip of ale, and then wiping his lip with his greasy sleeve. Kicked off the steps by men who once were proud to be his constituents. Manhood obliterated. Lip blistered with a curse. Scars of brutal assault on cheek and brow. Foul-mouthed. A crouching, staggering, wheezing wretch. No friends. No God. No hope. No heaven. That is your worn-out politician. That is what some of you will become unless by this morning's warning, and the mercy of God, your steps are arrested. Oh, there are no words enough potent, enough portentous, enough consuming, enough damning, to describe the horrible drunkenness that has rolled over this land, and that has bent down the necks of some of the mightiest intellects, until they have been compelled to drink out of the trough of bestiality and abomination! I warn young men against political life, unless they are teetotalers and consecrated, Christian men.

Again, I counsel you that, when you go to the ballot-box at the city or the State or the national elections, you recognize God, and appeal to him for his blessing. There is a power higher than the ballot-box, than the Gubernatorial chair, than the Presidential White House. It is high time that we put less confidence in political platforms and more confidence in God. See what a weak thing is human foresight. How little our wise men seem to know! See how, every autumn, thousands of men who are clambering up for higher positions, are turned under. God upsets them. Every man, every party, every nation, has a mission to perform. Failing to perform it, down he goes.

God said to the House of Bourbon, "Remodel France, and establish equity." House of Bourbon would not do it. Down it went. God said to the House of Stuart, "Make the English people free, God-fearing, and happy." House of Stuart would not do it. Down it went. God says to the political parties in this day, "By the principles of Christianity remodel, govern, educate, save the people." Failing to do that, down they go, burying in their ruins their disciples and advocates. God can spare all the political intriguers of this day, and can raise up another generation who shall do justice and love mercy. If God could spare Luther before the Reformation was done: and if he could spare spare Washington before free government had been fully tested; and if he could spare Howard before more than one out of a thousand dungeons had been alleviated; and if he could spare Robert M'Cheyne just as Scotland was gathering to his burning utterances; and if he could spare Thomas Clarkson while yet millions of his fellow-men had chains rusting to the bone—then he can spare any man, and he can spare any party. That man who, through cowardice or blind idolatry of party, forsakes the cause of righteousness, goes down, and the armed battalions of God march over him.

O Christian men! take out your Bible this afternoon, and in the light of that word make up your mind as to what is your duty as citizens. Remember that the highest kind of a patriot is a Christian patriot. Consecrate yourselves first to God, then you will know how to consecrate yourselves to your country. All these political excitements will be gone. Ballot-boxes and Gubernatorial chairs and continents will smoke in the final conflagration; but those who love God and do their best shall come to lustrous dominion after the stars have ceased their shining, and the ocean has heaved its last billow, and the closing thunder of the judgment-day shall toll at the funeral of a world! Oh, prepare for that day! Next Tuesday questions of the State will be settled; but there comes a day when the questions of eternity will be decided. You may vote right, and get the victory at the ballot-box, and yet suffer eternal defeat. After you have cast your last vote, where will you go to? In this country there are two parties. You belong to the one or the other of them. Likewise in eternity there will be two parties and only two. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." To which party will you belong? God grant that, while you look after the welfare of the land in which God has graciously cast your lot, you may not forget to look after your soul—blood-bought, judgment-bound, immortal! God save the people!

The Temple of Diana at Ephesus.

PROFANITY PUNISHED

Robert Raikes, the founder of Sunday Schools, was a prison philanthropist. He once related an incident of a man named Daniel Munday who had been committed to prison for stealing wood. He was a great swearer. One night, while uttering some blasphemous imprecations, his brother who was also in prison, reproved him. Daniel called on his Maker to strike him dumb if he did not hang himself. Next morning the turnkey found him in bed at a late hour. Munday was found to be dumb. He continued speechless for several days, when, on his deep repentance, the power of speech was mercifully restored.

Martyred in Persia.

Baron Aghajan, a Christian Merchant, Brutally Slain by Moslem Fanatics — Other Christians also Victims.

ISAAC M. YONAN, a young Christian native of Oroomiah, Persia, now a student in Louisville Theological Seminary, sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a copy of a very interesting letter received from his father, Malik Yonan, a Nestorian Christian minister in Persia. The letter, which is dated August 5, furnishes a sorrowful picture of religious persecution in the Shah's dominions. It is as follows:

"My Dear Son—In trembling, fear, sorrow and perplexity of mind, I am writing this letter to you. Mohammedanism seems to be reviving its old enmity against Christianity. Some months ago, Mirza Ibrahim was choked in the prison, and some days ago a Christian was killed in his home, another was tortured to death, and to-day we have a terrible murder.

"The Moolahs (the priests of the Mohammedans), sent a Mohammedan lady to Baron Aghajan, a Christian merchant of Oroomiah, to ask for money. He refused to give it to her. She reported to her friends that Aghajan had insulted her, whereupon a large crowd of roughs that needed only a word from their religious leaders to rush into any crime, gathered around his store with daggers, swords, guns and stones; they dragged him from the store and carried him to the court of their mosque, where they murdered him with fearful torture, putting his head on a rock and with other rocks beating him till his brains came through his mouth. After that his body was pierced with thirty-five daggers; some cut his ears, some cut his nose, and others pelted his body with stones. Then they put a rope around his neck, and together with a dead dog they dragged him all over the streets of the city, and outside the city walls, where they threw his body into a filthy pond. During all this time, not one Christian, not even his wife, could approach him for fear of instant death. His wife was able to get his body only by paying money to the Governor. She had a picture of the body taken and sent to the Shah.

"All denominations of Christians are greatly excited over this terrible matter; even little children understand the danger of the times. The prominent Christians feel that they will have to give all their property to the Shah, in order to save their lives, by getting permission to leave the country. I hope all the Christian Embassies will unite to help the persecuted Christians here.

"On the other hand, the Mohammedans have awaked to a new zeal; they have telegraphed to their high priest, at Carbala, to be permitted to recommence the Holy Wars of the olden times. No body knows what will be the end of this matter, but one thing we know, that God rules. Whenever there are troubles and persecutions, it is only to strengthen the Christians in their faith. I can do nothing for my family and my poor Nestorian nation, except set the matter before the Lord, like Hezekiah (II. Kings 19: 19), 'O Lord, our God, we beseech thee, save thou us out of his hand, that all of the kingdom of the earth may know that thou art the Lord God, even thou only.'

MALEK YONAN."

Writing a few days later, Malek Yonan adds:

"Last week, I wrote to you about the murder of Mirza Aghajan. The picture that was taken of his body has been scattered over all the world, and I send you one. While he was in such extreme suffering, they offered to release him if he would confess Mohammed, but he defied their tortures and died like a martyr. I am thankful to say that all missionaries of different denominations, even Catholics, have acted in unity in this matter. They have written to the Embassies of Russia, England, Germany, and France and are telegraphing every day to the Shah, who has commissioned a Mohammedan Governor to look into the matter.

"Soon after the death of Aghajan, a large mob went to his home to kill his wife, but she escaped to the American Mission. On the same night, a Christian was killed in his home, and all his property destroyed or taken, and another was killed in a village some miles from town. I am sure that these dark clouds must precede the brightest sun.

"Ask all the Christians that are living under the flag of liberty of that blessed country, to be encouraged to fulfil the great commission: 'Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature,' and to send more missionaries to this field of darkness.

MALEK YONAN."

This is the second martyrdom for the cause of the Gospel in Persia within a few months, the first having been that of Mirza Ibrahim, who perished of violence in a Moslem prison in that country. In his letter to this journal, forwarding the information, Mr. Isaac M. Yonan says:

"Dear Sir.—My father has long been a reader of your valuable paper at our home in Persia. Since I have been in this country I have read it every week through the great kindness of my friends.

"I am very grateful to you for the love you bear toward my country. All you publish in behalf of Christianity in Persia I receive as a personal favor. May God bless you for your broad, liberal, missionary spirit and zeal."

IMITATION OF CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 19. Eph. 4:20-32. Golden Text, Eph. 4: 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE apostle, writing from the Romish prison, where his fettered body had no power to drag down the spirit, which recognizing his heavenly citizenship, dwelt with Christ in heavenly places,—unfolded wonderful things to God's children. He writes in the spirit of fullest praise and deepest adoration: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ." He saw that no divine blessing could come to God's people on earthly ground; we must be heavenly that we may receive heavenly blessings. Then follows: "Even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blemish before him in love; having foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto himself. But only through his Beloved "in whom we have redemption through his blood even the forgiveness of sins" can this foreordination find its accomplishment in us. Then he tells us of the mystery of his will, according to the good pleasure which he purposed in him, unto a dispensation of the fulness of the seasons, to sum up all things in Christ, the things which are in the heavens and the things upon the earth—uniting heaven and earth in himself, by uniting the members of his Body to him! "In him, I say in whom we were made a heritage." (Eph. 3: 11, R.V.)

A Heritage of God!

A possession for God to inherit! One staggers at the very thought that such a destiny can be possible for fallen, sinful, redeemed man! Yet again he speaks of "foreordained" to this wondrous destiny in Christ, "in whom, having also believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is an earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of God's own possession (Rom. 8: 23), unto the praise of his glory."

Having thus introduced the vast subject which filled the whole horizon of his thoughts and heart, and made him comparatively unconscious of his imprisonment, Paul prayed that the eyes of the Ephesians might be opened to understand this hope of their calling, and the riches of the glory of God's inheritance in the saints, and he tells them that in order to bring about this unspeakable purpose of God, the same strength of his might which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his right hand in the heavenly places "far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in that which is to come, is the same exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe," in order to bring about this marvellous purpose of our God? How little Nero knew when he shut up Paul in prison that this unusual prisoner should be called into the council chamber of the King of kings!

He shows in chapter two how, by his Cross, Jesus has slain the enmity between Jew and Gentile, "that he might create in himself of twain one new man," (neither Jew nor Gentile, but one body of many members), and he gradually unfolds, in chapter three, which from all ages had been hid in God, who created all things, to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in the heavenly places might be known, by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Then, as though he could say no more to man, the apostle repeats what has been given him in prayer to God, that wondrous prayer: "That ye may be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith . . . that ye may be filled with [or unto] all the fullness of God."

This leads him on to the exhortation: "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called." (Eph. 4: 1.) What vocation? "Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the Firstborn among many brethren." Our vocation is to learn Christ and to be made like Christ who is the image of God, the Firstborn of every creature. But how can the imperfect ever become perfect, how can the creature become like the Creator? The goal is too high. Yes, indeed, if it is to be attained by individual human creatures. But the purpose is God's purpose, not man's; God's calling from afar, not man's device. And in order to accomplish it, God, who is himself a Trinity of Three divine Persons in One, has conceived the making a unity of many in one "of twain, not many new men. He ascended to receive gifts for men which should serve "for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministering unto the building up of the body of Christ, till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect [or full-grown, R.V.] man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Not many perfect or full-grown men but one, made out of many. Our vocation is to understand God's purpose in this and yield to his working.

With this glorious calling, this purpose of God, before him, Paul sees wondrous possibilities for the saints of God knowing that many Christians are little children in the Lord still. He says, after speaking of the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ: "That we be no longer children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive [or after the wiles of error, R.V.] but speaking truth in love may grow up in all things unto him, which is the Head, even Christ; from whom all the body, fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of every part maketh the increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love." Paul sees the glorious possibility of a Bride for the Lamb of God, consisting of members who through the redeeming blood of Christ, and through the work of the Holy Spirit conforming them to the likeness of Christ, shall make them to be one, as he is one with the Father, and make them when united into one, to be his true complement, the fulness of him that filleth all in all. It is with this in view that he appeals to the Ephesians to walk no longer as the Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind . . . alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them. It behoves such as are predestined to be one with God to walk in quite another spirit. Once understanding our vocation and entering into it, the sins of self-life; such as jealousy, envy, pride, etc., become impossible. "Ye did not so learn Christ, if so be that ye heard him, and were taught in him as the truth is in Jesus, that ye put away as concerning your former manner of life the old man—i. e., what we were as unconverted people—which waxeth corrupt after the lusts of deceit; and that ye be renewed in the spirit of your mind." This is at the bottom of all which is truly divine, a thorough break, once for all, a break which is steadfastly maintained, with the old man. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, the self for which he has lived before, and take up his cross which he has complained of, and tried to flee before—and follow me—instead of following his own will and inclinations. We cannot live under our own headship and under the headship of Christ, at the same time, and the high calling wherewith we are called appeals to us to leave utterly and forever behind us what we were—"what things were gain" to us—as well as what things were loss to us, and to know ourselves only in Christ and as members of his body. "And put on the new man which after God hath been created in righteousness and true holiness." To put off the old man and to put on the new is something more than to believe that God for Christ's sake has forgiven our sins. It is to die with Christ to all our former life, and to turn willingly away from all we were and are by nature to his life, to take him as our Pattern and as our Power, expecting no more from ourselves, and therefore never disappointed with the failure of our own efforts; renouncing every thought of any credit that can accrue to us because the new man is not a new development of what we are but a new creation in us of what Christ is, so that the glory of the change in us is not ours but his. Every victory is his, and every grace is his, the very will to serve him proceeds from him. Every prayer is his; nothing is ours.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ANCIENT EPHESUS.

EPHESUS had enjoyed three years of Paul's ministry. What the character of that ministry had been, we learn from the interview with the elders of the church on that memorable night at Miletus (Acts 20: 17-35), when Paul sent for them that he might warn and exhort them once more. Between that interview and the writing of the epistle, a passage from which is the basis of our lesson, four eventful years had passed. Paul had been arrested, arraigned before Felix and Agrippa, imprisoned, shipwrecked and finally again imprisoned in Rome. There his thoughts turn to the beloved church and knowing the dangers by which it would be assailed, he writes this letter to strengthen the people in their faith and to advise them as to their daily life in the home, the church and the world. He makes his letter a general one, suitable for other churches, omitting his usual, personal greetings and he probably would send by Tychicus several copies of it for them, making it a circular letter. It is a singularly beautiful communication, full of tenderness and of exalted spiritual feeling. About half of it is devoted to doctrine, emphasizing the teaching Paul had given to the church during his residence with them. These doctrines, he then proceeds to show, are not to remain in their minds as mere theories, but are to exert a controlling influence over their lives. It is sometimes contended that it does not matter what a man believes if his life is right. But the Apostle argues on the sound principle, which everyone's experience confirms, that right living proceeds from right thinking and the only right life is based on right principles. He mentions a few characteristics of the conduct of people who are really guided by Christ's life and teaching. He then sums up the whole in the central, all-inclusive injunction to put on Christ. That is to so enter into his spirit that they will live as he lived. Their life cannot fail to be right if he is their guide. As a great divine has said, "In sailing over the troubled ocean of life, with its changing winds and unknown currents, we must steer by the stars." That Paul's warnings and admonitions were not unnecessary we see from the message which, seven years after this letter was written, Christ himself sent to the church. (Rev. 2: 1-7).

Taught by him. Jeremy Taylor uses the following illustration to show how the Christian's life is made easy by following Christ: The Bohemians have a story that their great king who was canonized as St. Wenceslaus had a servant named Redivivus who admiring and loving his master, earnestly desired to be like him in all things. One winter night the king set out for a distant church to pray. He desired to keep his body in subjection and humiliate himself, so he went barefoot. Redivivus tried to follow, but fell repeatedly, as the way led over ice and snow. The king saw his servant's failures and turning to him bade him follow in his footprints. The servant followed, carefully placing his feet on the places where the king had trodden and slipped no more. The Christian has received the same command, and he never falls when he follows where Christ has led the way.

Put on the new man. The Christian's highest hope is to be like Christ. The way to achievement is through love. The more anyone loves Christ the more is he likely to become like him, and the more too will he impress the world with the beauty and blessing of his religion and so lead others to become like Christ. A minister tells the following story of Dr. Belfrage. His wife died after less than a year of singular and unbroken happiness. He had no portrait left of her, but resolved that there should be one, and though ignorant of drawing he determined to do it himself. He procured the materials for miniature painting, and then shut himself up for fourteen days. He came out of his room wasted and feeble, with one of the plates on which was a portrait full of subtle likeness, drawn and colored as no one would have dreamed that such an artist could do. We have given ourselves to harder labor, to reproduce the image of Christ in the hearts of men, but if we have exceeding love for him we must be successful.

Putting away lying. Deception and fraud of every kind are a disgrace to any Christian. The influence of Christianity ought to make every man who professes it honest and truthful. Ruskin discovered a very ancient inscription on the Church of St. Giacomo di Rialto, Venice, which reads, "Around this temple let the merchant's law be just, his weights be true and his covenants faithful." A beautiful epitome of the influences which ought to radiate from the sanctuary, to elevate and purify the world around. He says of the discovery, it is "the pride of my life."

Let him that stole steal no more. A wealthy gentleman was addressing a group of convicts one Sunday afternoon in a certain penitentiary. He inveighed severely on the iniquity of stealing. At the conclusion of his address he went among the convicts to impress on them individually the lessons he had been imparting. "Are you an honest man yourself?" said one of the convicts, "really honest in heart?" The gentleman was highly indignant at the question, but declared that he had never stolen anything in his life. "Do not be offended," said the convict, "I am seeking information; I want to know how it is with other men. Have you ever had an opportunity of getting gain by unfair means?" The gentleman considered a moment and said, "Yes, I have." "Then," said the convict, "tell me how you felt. Had you a slight inclination to get it?" There was more hesitation this time and the answer came at last, "Yes, I think I may have had, but controlled it. The convict smiled. "Perhaps you might not have done so if you had been brought up as we have been and if you were starving. There is really very little difference between us." The gentleman looked down humbly. "No," he said, "the difference is not in ourselves, but in our circumstances and the grace of God."

To give to him that needeth. How many people have in their possession money or clothing which their poor brethren need, yet who hoard it instead of giving it away. Martin Luther was once asked to help some cause when he really had no money to give. Still he did not refuse his assistance, but going to a drawer in which he kept a valuable and highly prized medal of Joachim, the elector of Brandenburg, he drew it out, saying, "What art thou doing here, Joachim? Dost thou not see how idle thou art? Come out and make thyself useful."

A poor Irishwoman went to a venerable priest in Boston, and asked him to forward to Ireland her help for the famine sufferers. "How much can you spare?" asked the priest. "I have a hundred dollars saved," she said, "and I can spare that." The priest reasoned with her, saying that her gift was too great for her means, but she was firm in her purpose. It would do her good to know that she had helped; she could rest happier thinking of the poor families she had saved from hunger and death. The priest received her money with moistened eyes. "Now, what is your name?" he asked, "that I may have it published." "My name?" said the brave soul counting out her money, "don't mind that, sir. Just send them the help, and God will know my name."

Forgiving one another even as God . . . hath forgiven you. That is to be the measure of forgiveness, full, free and complete. Louis XII. of France had many enemies before he ascended the throne. When he became king he caused a list to be made of all the chief men of the kingdom and against the name of every one who had done him a wrong he affixed a black cross. When this became known, the enemies of the king fled, feeling sure that the king meant to punish them. But Louis, hearing of their fears, caused them to be recalled, with an assurance of pardon, and said that the reason for his putting a cross against their names was to remind himself of the cross of Christ through which he hoped for the forgiveness which he must extend to others with the same fulness.

Gospel Work in Western Africa.

The Gaboon and Corisco Mission of the Presbyterian Church—Miss Nassau's Successful Effort in Training Native Evangelists.

THE deadly climate of many parts of Africa has cost the Church of Christ many a precious life. The roll of brave men and women who for love of the Master have gone to preach to the people the glad news of salvation, knowing the risks they ran, and have sickened and died there, is a long and sad one. Yet there is no disposition to abandon the effort. When a missionary dies, another promptly volunteers to take up and continue his work. But the cost of life is frightful; and those who die in that awful breach of the enemy, are precisely the men and women whom the church can least afford to lose—noble, consecrated, self-sacrificing souls, capable of doing valuable work for Christ in the world. The question arises, whether the work might not be carried on without this dreadful waste of life. Could not native converts be educated and trained for Gospel work? They are inured to the climate and do not suffer from it as white men do; they have naturally a more complete command of the language than a foreigner can attain and their work is less likely to excite suspicion and prejudice than would be that of the foreign teacher. But are the converts intellectually qualified for missionary work? Could they by education and training be fitted to become preachers and teachers to their people? These questions have been put to a practical test in the Presbyterian mission on the Gaboon and Corisco field, which lies on the West Coast of Africa, near the Equator. The results of the experiment are eminently satisfactory. The missionaries report that the native preachers are doing faithful, earnest work and are planting churches in new districts. Portraits of five of these native Christian preachers appear on this page. Their names are Itongolo, Etiani, N'taka Truman, Frank Myongo and Ibia j'Ikenze.

Itongolo has been doing efficient work at Bongahele station at the southern extremity of the Gaboon and Corisco field, where, for several years, the work was carried on by native preachers unaided by the white missionary. He is now stationed at Ubenje where the people have built a house for him and also a house of worship. Etiani, another of the group, is stationed at Bata, whese he is gathering a thriving church. Ibia J'Ikenge is on the island of Corisco. He conducts a boys' school in addition to his evangelistic labors. Myongo has an excellent record. During the time he was pastor at the station at Bongahele the people erected a place of worship capable of holding five hundred persons, and at each of the Sunday services it was crowded. He is a pupil of Miss Isabella A. Nassau, to whom he owes all his training for his ministerial work.

Miss Nassau, whose portrait is here given, has been for twenty-five years an earnest and most devoted worker in the Gaboon and Corisco mission. She is a sister of Dr. Robert H. Nassau, whose pioneer labors in this field were described in these columns on May 24. From the days of her early childhood she looked with longing eyes to the work of foreign missions as the highest vocation to which she could aspire. She had the cordial sympathy of her father, Dr. Charles H. Nassau, who as pastor, professor and college president at Lafayette, Penn., was eminently qualified to aid her in preparing for efficient service. For several years after she had definitely decided to offer herself for the work she studied hard, and by teaching in the seminary at Lawrenceville, Penn., acquired the art of imparting knowledge and of gaining influence over the minds of others. She went out to Africa in 1868, and was stationed first on the island of Corisco, then erroneously supposed to be more healthy than the mainland. After a time she removed to Bolondó on the Benito River, where her talents as an educator were successfully employed. She had a class of boys and young men whom she trained for the work of the ministry. It was a work for which by nature and education she was peculiarly fitted, and her success in it was recognized by a glowing tribute in the History of the Corisco Presbytery, which also states that her services had been devoted to this arduous sphere longer than had those of any other person. When the Board of Missions decided to plant a station at Kangwe, Miss Nassau went thither and took with her several of the young people she had educated. The work at Kangwe suffered from the harassing opposition of the French government, in whose "sphere of influence" it was situated. The French are enemies of Protestant missions wherever they have power and at Kangwe they made any advance well-nigh impossible. At Talaguga also, where Dr. Nassau had established a station, the same obstacles were encountered and it was finally found necessary to abandon both stations; but some work is still being done there by the French Society of Evangelistic Missions. Miss Nassau remained for some time at Kangwe and then removed to her brother's station at Talaguga, where quietly and unostentatiously she did much valuable work in teaching. It was her habit to journey from village to village, taking with her cards on which she had stencilled some text in the native language. She would stay a short time in a village talking familiarly with the people. She would then depart, leaving a few cards behind her. On her way back after an interval of a few weeks she was often surpised to find how deep an interest had been stirred by the silent teacher supplementing her talk at her former visit. The transfer of the stations to the French society, however, broke up that work, and Miss Nassau came home for a brief rest before entering a new field. In October of last year she was back again in Africa and settled at Batanga where she has now a flourishing girls' school and abundant occupation in teaching and visiting the adjacent villages.

Native Ordained Presbyterian Ministers of Western Africa.

ITONGOLO. ETIANI. MYONGO. N'TAKA. IBIA J' IKENGE.

Batanga lies at the north of the Gaboon and Corisco field. It forms an excellent base of operations for reaching vast numbers on its eastern side. On that side the country is within the German "sphere of influence," and is open to missionary effort. Happily, the Germans show a different spirit from that of the French. They have given a cordial welcome to the American missionaries and have guaranteed them protection from interference. Dr. A. C. Good, who is stationed at Batanga, has recently made an exploring trip into the territory thus opened and has returned to the mission full of enthusiasm at the prospects. It has been decided to open a station sixty miles inland at a place called Nkonemekak and another at a place five days' journey to the north, called Zingi, and the opening of still another station has been planned. The missionaries who will have charge of this pioneer work are the young physician Dr. C. J. Laffin, whose portrait and life have already appeared in this journal; Rev. R. H. Milligan and Mr. M. H. Kerr. With Batanga on the coast as a basis of supplies and a centre for the training native helpers the missionaries are full of hope that a great work will be done. Dr. Good covered a distance of 180 miles. "This," he says, "is, of course, hardly more than a beginning, but this beginning has shown that God has here opened a magnificent field for our church. A fine mountainous country, with a climate remarkably cool and bracing for Africa, and a large population of strong, vigorous savages were discovered. But the journey only touched the densely populated plateau, where we are assured that the people swarm as almost nowhere else in Africa. Here are the Fang, Bule, Bene Yewonda and Yengona; only names to us, but each name standing for from one hundred thousand to half a million souls. All these peoples, aggregating perhaps a million, perhaps several millions, speak practically one language; and to the eastward are other tribes of whom we know only the names, and that they are cannibal savages, still more degraded than those mentioned above. If this field seems too small, we have only to pass over the border of the Yewondo country to the northward, and we are soon in the darkest part of the Soudan, where we find powerful chiefs, populous cities and a barbarous (Mohammedan) civilization, but not one ray of light. These multitudes are as ignorant of the way of salvation as if there were no Saviour. Men they certainly are, with eternal destinies, but sunk in the depths of selfishness and beastly sensuality."

Miss Isabella A. Nassau, Missionary to the Cameroons.

Dr. Good reports that in the regions he visited there were no cities or large aggregations of population among the Bule. Their villages seemed to be strung along the routes of travel at not very great distances apart. He would frequently pass from twenty to fifty villages in a day, but never massed together. They lined the path as if it were a river with villages scattered along on either bank. He found centres where a population of from three to five thousand people were within two hours' walk in either direction, and at one of these centres it is proposed to locate the first station of Nkonemekak. Among the Yewondo and Yengona the population is massed in a different way, as they occupy a great plain, the whole surface of which is available for residence and cultivation. The climate of this interior region is regarded by Dr. Good as salubrious and healthful, and he sees no reason why it should not be perfectly safe as a place of permanent residence for missionaries. The soil is sandy, and an elevation of from 1,500 to 2,000 feet can be easily secured for residence. He regards it as much superior to the climate of the Ogowe Valley. Beside which, there is the additional advantage of being on territory under the control of the Germans who permit teaching in the native language.

"On the trip," Dr. Good continues, "I had opportunity for talking with and questioning the people, but all I can learn only emphasizes what I have already written you as to the vastness of the field here opened to us. I questioned many old people who had come from the far interior, and all agreed in the statement that where I turned back I had not yet reached the dense population. And the country is open to us. I wish you could have seen the enthusiasm with which I was everywhere greeted. All distrust and misconception had melted away as I had not dared to hope; and now very few ask me the question I have been weary of: 'What are you seeking for?' Everywhere the people crowded to hear my poor efforts at preaching the Gospel. Some were disposed to scoff at the high standard of morality set forth by Christ, not because they denied its excellence, but because it seemed hopelessly above them. But on the whole I was pleased by the attention and interest with which my message was everywhere received.

"But if the Gospel were not the power of God unto salvation, I should have been utterly discouraged by some glimpses I had of the unspeakable immorality of these people.

"This is the field. Can there be a question as to whether God calls us to enter it? But to do so, both men and money are needed. Young men, strong, earnest men, must offer themselves to the Lord for this work—not by ones and twos, but by tens and twenties, if this great field is to be evangelized. Shall the response be that the Presbyterian Church, with its thousands of young men and its vast and ever-increasing wealth, is unwilling to take up this new work?"

WHAT I BELIEVE.

AS people all over the country, in the church and out of the church, are now telling what they believe and what they do not believe, so I suppose my turn has come to tell what I believe. I can tell you in five minutes. I believe in God the good, the kind, the loving, the just, the independent, the omnipotent. I believe in Jesus Christ, with a heart large enough to take the whole race in his compassion, and perhaps other worlds, for I do not know but that he has done as much for other spheres as he has done for ours. I believe in the Holy Ghost, a wooing, coaxing, elevating, sublimating, purifying, gracious personage, gentle as the dove that symbolized Him at the baptism, and yet as intense as the fiery tongues which covered the heads of the disciples at Pentecost. I believe in a soul immortal, winged for eternal flight, and having free choice whether that flight shall be upward or downward. I believe in a heaven built on so vast a scale that there is room for all angelhood, all manhood, all womanhood, all childhood, and not a monopoly for a few, but twelve gates for all. I believe in a perdition, the abode of those who are soul suicides, for God pushes no man off the precipice. He jumps off. "Oh Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." You see, it is self-destruction. If a man is in peril and there are twelve gates wide open, to let him out, and he turns his back on the twelve gates and jumps into the crater of a volcano, who is to blame? Certainly not the man who swung open the twelve gates. And if any man misses heaven it will not be God's fault, but the fault of those who perish.

"Ah!" says some one, "how can a merciful God allow any suffering hereafter?" I will answer your question as you will answer mine. Why does a merciful God allow that good woman to marry a man who makes her life a hell on earth? How can a merciful God allow bad people to prosper in health, while men who spend their lives in doing good, die of cancer in the face? You answer my question, and I will answer yours. You tell me why a merciful God allowed sin to come into this world, then I will tell you why God lets suffering go into the nether world. I go on and I say, I believe in baptism, the water beautifully symbolic of a cleansing of the soul, and whether the bright liquid drop from a wooden cup, as when in holy rite the Covenanters of Scotland sprinkled their children among the Highlands, or whether the candidate have whole Jordans roll over him. I believe in the King's banquet, commonly called the Lord's Supper, and welcome to its table all who acknowledge allegiance to him, of whose atonement the red wine of the Sacrament is parabolic. I believe in the Bible from lid to lid inspired, not always as a precept, but sometimes as a history, the sacred writers no more approving of the conduct described in the Bible, than Macaulay approves of all the conduct in England described in his history, but a Bible from lid to lid inspired, not always as a precept, but sometimes as a history, yet the best book ever written by pen or printed by type, the foundation of happy homes and good governments, the book from which most other good books have been beaten out as one little piece of gold may be beaten into foil of almost illimitable extension. I believe in the brotherhood of man; all of one blood, and having the same rights, all made in the image of God, and that he who insults a man, however obscure, strikes in the face of his neighbor. These cardinal truths I have been preaching for thirty-seven years, and I have no prospect of changing. I am all the more indisposed to change, because I have noticed that those who get off the track are like a rail train off the track, tumbling down the embankment; they roll over and over and over from place to place, now one side up, now the other. Now they wonder about this and now they wonder about that, and the most of them end in agnosticism. That is, they do not believe in anything. That is generally the depot at which they fetch up. They call it progress, and it is progress; but it is progress into a bank of mud.

VICTORY!

EVER and anon we see a determination on the part of theologians to square off and fight the religion of their fathers. Some think it argues great pluck for a man to assail the Bible and the Church and get up a new religion. The fact is it requires no courage at all to do so, for he is always sure of the favor and applause of a vast multitude, who hate the Bible and would be glad to see it struck on any side and to have Christianity crippled. The Bible antagonists do not realize that they are attempting to stop an express train by putting their foot on the track or to arrest an Alpine avalanche by bracing themselves against one of the ice cakes. The Bible goes right on, and the Church of God goes right on, and Christianity goes right on, and the chief danger is done to the antagonists. There have never been so many live churches in America as today. More people believe the Gospel than ever before and vaster multitudes are attempting to practice its precepts. The attempt to shatter the Bible for the last three hundred years has not rent asunder or dislodged a single doctrine or sentiment. After its present assailants are all dead, their funeral sermons will be preached from King James' translation, not one verse omitted, from the first page of Genesis to the last page of Revelation. One would think the world would get tired of a bombardment of the Bible castle, when with all their concentrated fire of three hundred years, they have not been able to knock out of its walls a splinter large enough to make the most sensitive eyeball quiver. Oh! I am so glad we are in the army which will finally win the day. Here and there a repulse may come through the perfidy of some officer or the backing out of some traitor in camp; but there are enough of the mounted cavalry of the King to ride down all opposition and to dismount the guns of the enemy.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its publication, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

OUR MAIL-BAG.

ANY reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD having old libraries or other literature suited to Sunday Schools, can send the same to Mrs. W. F. Bidwell, Wetmore, Nemaha Co., Kan., where they will be greatly appreciated.

J. G. Rouzer, Chicago.—"Allow me to express to you my hearty appreciation of your work in the publication of so thorough a Christian paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Although a subscriber for a number of years, my appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD grows annually. Each year it seems to grow better. I have just noticed your generous offer to send our dear Editor's book, 'From Manger to Throne,' with a year's subscription, for $2.00, but no mention is made in said advertisement whether this is only for new subscribers or for old as well. Of course, I well know your old subscribers are never overlooked, but my faith wavers somewhat to think of this handsome offer meaning me. Kindly enlighten me on this point and very much oblige."

The offer applies to both new and old subscribers. Any of our old subscribers sending $2.00, with renewal of subscription, will receive a copy of this splendid volume "From Manger to Throne." We desire this to be distinctly understood, in order that our old subscribers may avail themselves of this opportunity.

P. C. Chaney, New Salem, Ill.—"To Mrs. E. M. Evan's question (of Atlanta, Georgia), I will say that in my humble opinion the 'thorn in the flesh' Paul speaks of in 1 Cor. 12-7 was not a bodily affliction, as many claim, but an evil spirit. 'The messenger of Satan to buffet me.' It is commonly believed by some that Paul was hunch-backed (a deformity) but there is no ground for that belief."

M. A. T., Reidsville, Pa. In what year and at what age did the Apostle Paul suffer martyrdom?

Biblical writers state that Paul's death occurred about the year 66 A. D., when he was about 64 years old.

C Nicholsen, The Dalles, Or. 1. What is the best book that gives the Lives of Christian Martyrs? 2. What is the best volume of sermon illustrations?

1. Fox's "Book of Martyrs." 2. Baxendale's Dictionary of Anecdotes, etc., published by Whittaker, New York.

Agnes McFarlane, Colfax, Ia. 1. When and where was the epistle to the Romans written? 2. Where in the Old Testament do we read of the brazen serpent?

1. At Corinth, during Paul's third missionary journey, and in the winter of 54-55 A.D. 2. See Numb. 21: 9, also John 3: 14.

T. P. H., Bolington, Va. 1. What is the best chapter in the Bible against immorality? 2. Can you give me the rest of the lines belonging to this poem and the name of the writer?

"Hours are golden links—God's token,
Reaching heaven, but one by one;
Take them lest the chain be broken,
Ere the pilgrimage be done."

1. Exodus 20, which contains the Decalogue. 2. Possibly some of our readers can supply the information desired.

M. E. W., Newburgh, N. Y. Is it right to have articles set apart to be won by the greatest number of votes cast at a church fair?

There are many counterfeit methods of giving and they cultivate bogus benevolence. All methods of raising money for the Lord that are contrary to the precepts and examples of his Word are to be condemned. The simple method of free-will offerings alone is approved, (see Ex. 35, 5, 21, 29; II. Cor. chaps. 8 and 9; Luke 6: 35, Matt. 10: 8.) Lottery and grab-bag and similar devices involving the gambling principle are all "works of the flesh," and a distinct desecration of the Lord's house.

P. C. Chaney, New Salem, Ill.—1. How do you explain the apparent discrepancy between the twenty-second and thirty-first verses of Acts 27? 2. Why was the centurion willing to save Paul as stated in Acts 27: 43?

1. The assurance given in the former verse was fulfilled, but the means had to be used. The Apostle wished to stir up the soldiers to defeat the cowardly purpose of the sailors. That the purpose would be so defeated was undoubtedly foreseen when the assurance was given, but men must not be fatalists. 2. We are not told; but probably he had been favorably impressed by his observation of his prisoner's conduct and was reluctant to see his life needlessly sacrificed.

Azalia Sharp, Frost, W. Va.—Please explain 1 Cor. 14: 34.

The injunction was necessary in that time and church. Society at Corinth was in a condition at the time the Apostle wrote this letter in which it would have occasioned great scandal for women to have spoken at the meetings of the church. There had already been trouble there, as we see by the word Paul uses, and this injunction was given to prevent a repetition of it. Biblical scholars are not agreed as to whether it was intended to be permanent, but the majority believe that it was not. It certainly does not preclude woman from singing or praying, or speaking at Christian Endeavor meetings.

H. S Roberts, Reidsville. 1. What was the origin of the Campbellite Church? 2. What is its proper name? 3. Where is its publication house?

1. Thomas Campbell and Alexander, his son, ministers of the seceding branch of the Presbyterian Church, came to this country from Scotland in 1807. They were Irish by birth but were descended from a Scotch family and had been educated in Scotland. They settled in Pennsylvania. In 1809 they issued an invitation to the Christian people around them to join them in a church which should recognize and profess no creed but the Bible. Many joined them and the numbers have steadily grown since, until now the church has in the United States about 900,000 adherents. In church government and practice it is much the same as the Baptists, but without "close communion." 2. The Church of Christ or Disciples of Christ. 3. No. 1416 East Ninth street, Cincinnati, O.

Annie H. Mullis, Luton, Ia. 1. Why did Elisha refuse the gold and silver of Naaman? A friend remarked the other day, "there are few Elishas now, but many Gehazis." 2. Is it God's will that man should demand so many mites of the poor for speaking to them of the "Love of Jesus?" It has made my heart ache for some who believe that they are bound to contribute of their scantiness. Jesus gave unto such, instead of taking from them?

1. Elisha doubtless regarded the great principle involved, and rightly refused to accept a gift in return for any benefit rendered to Naaman, as such a thing was the Lord's doing and not of man. He would not be bribed for doing the will of his Master. 2. Nothing is further from the divine will than the oppression of the poor by extortioners, whether in the name of religion or otherwise; yet it is a pleasure, in which even the very poor may share, to give of our substance for the Lord's cause. The widow, who casts her mite into the treasury, is a type of the humble self-sacrificing Christian, who gives heartily and lovingly, knowing that such giving will never impoverish.

Subscriber, Chicago. I united with the church when quite a small child. My life ran on in the same channel, and I did many things I should not have done. For the last two or three years, I have felt deeply convicted of my sins: I have never spoken to any one of my trouble, but prayed to God to convert me. Last May, I lost a dear little boy. Since then, the world and everything seems changed. My nature has changed to some extent. I am most sorrowful for past sins and I strive to be only good. Do you think God has answered my prayer? I am by nature very quiet but I thought conversion meant a change throughout. Things I once enjoyed have no charm now. Yet I expected, when the answer came, to be thrilled through and through and I would know that God had forgiven my sins. Can you tell me where my trouble lies?

Your bereavement, while it has naturally depressed you, has been a blessing, in that it has brought you nearer to God and revealed to you the condition of your own heart. Your prayer, if offered in all penitence and sincerity, has been answered in the change that is now taking place in your life. Spiritual experience varies in different natures, and probably no two are precisely alike. Ask and strive for larger spiritual growth, and that you may be made useful in helping others. The greatest aid to faith is Christian activity, and the two, combined, bring true happiness.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE MATABELE KING.

INDICATIONS are apparent of an intention on the part of the English government to take charge of the campaign against Lobengula and the Matabele. The motive is a humane one. Intelligence has reached London that the South African Company, which is conducting the campaign, has dealt harshly and unjustly with the Matabele potentate, arresting his envoys and shooting down his troops when they were peaceably departing out of Mashonaland. The reports have been contradicted by the Company's officers, but the British government has ordered Sir Henry Loch, who is commander-in-chief in South Africa, to assume the supreme command in Mashonaland and conduct the negotiations with Lobengula. Conflicting statements as to the king's character are published by travellers who have come in contact with him. Mr. Rider Haggard describes him as cruel and treacherous. He says that a few years ago two travellers who called at his kraal during a hunting excursion were hospitably entertained by the king, but were treacherously murdered by his orders before they had gone a day's journey into the country. Other travellers report more favorably of him, but represent him as capricious and easily influenced for good or evil by his wives and young warriors. All agree that he is extraordinarily superstitious, and spends hours daily with his medicine men, endeavoring to read omens or auguries in the entrails of newly slain cattle. It is certain that the Matabele were cruel oppressors of the Mashonas, prior to the British occupying the land, but whether they have been aggressors recently is disputed. There is to be a Parliamentary inquiry as to the South African Company's treatment of the king, and there is an evident determination on the part of prominent members of Parliament that no wrong shall be done him. The appointment of Sir Henry Loch has been made to prevent the Company compromising the honor of the British government by unwarrantably taking possession of Matabeleland. Our own relations with the Indians suggest what is likely to take place when a barbarous race has possession of a territory fertile and rich in minerals, and the adjoining land is held by a civilized people. It may be hoped that the true facts will be ascertained and justice be done; for "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." (Prov. 14: 34.)

Held by His Foot.

A switchman on the Reading Railroad met death in a terrible form a few days ago at West Falls, Pa. He was on night duty and he ran ahead of a train to open a switch. That duty performed, he signalled the engineer to bring on the train. His signal was obeyed, but as the train came toward him, the switchman found that his foot was caught firmly in a frog. He shouted for help, and made frantic efforts to release himself, but in vain. The noise of the puffing engine drowned his cries, and when the engineer saw the struggling man in the full glare of the headlight it was too late to save his life. Swiftly the great engine bore down on the frantic prisoner and though the lever was reversed and the brake put down hard, the locomotive struck the man and he was literally cut in two. Death was instantaneous, but the expression on the dead face showed plainly the terrible agony the man had endured for a few seconds. There is reason to fear that still more terrible tragedies often occur from a like entanglement. Nothing is more common in Christian work than to see a man almost persuaded to forsake the world and fly to Christ for salvation, held back by some evil habit, some secret sin, or some worldly connection which he has not the moral strength to shake off. (Matt. 5: 30.)

To Photograph the Heavens.

The new photographic telescope which Miss C. W. Bruce of New York, is giving to Harvard University is nearly finished and in a few weeks will be set up at Cambridge. It will be thoroughly tested there and will then be sent to Peru where it is to be permanently fixed on a hill near Arequipa for the use of the South American branch of Harvard University. No instrument of equal power is in existence. The plates will give a result not attainable by the Lick telescope as the arrangement of the lenses will give a power equal to a forty-five inch aperture while the Lick lens is only thirty-six. The new instrument also takes in an area six times the size of that telescope, and with sixteen hundred plates, can give an entire map of the heavens. It is expected that the photographs to be taken by this instrument will reveal the existence of stars which have never yet been seen by human eyes. Men will have no doubt that there are such stars if the sensitive photographic plate shows them, even though the eye fails to detect them. Yet they scoff at Christians to whom the evidence of faith is surer than that of sight. (1. Peter 1: 8.)

A Sister's Devotion.

A painful operation performed in the City Hospital of Rochester, N. Y., is described in the Democrat of that city. It states that about two weeks ago a boy of five years of age was badly burned. He fell into a fire which he and a few other boys had made in the open air, with dead leaves. His clothing caught fire and before it was put out his chest and arms were severely burned. He was taken to the hospital and treated, but did not recover. No new skin would form and he lay in a precarious condition. A messenger was sent to his parents to inform them that nothing more could be done to save his life except skin-grafting. If some person would submit to have strips of skin taken from his body, they might be put on the injured places and the child's life might be saved. The parents hoped that some person might be prevailed upon, for a liberal reward, to undergo the operation. No such person, however, could be found. Finally the seventeen year old sister of the child offered herself for the purpose. She was asked if she knew how painful the operation would be and replied that she was ready to undergo it if it would give her brother a chance of life. She went bravely to the hospital where the surgeons removed from her person enough skin to cover the burned places on the child. Her limbs were then swathed in bandages and she was sent home in an ambulance. The skin thus obtained was applied to the boy's wounds and it is believed that he will get well. There can be no question as to this girl's love for her brother, for she suffered that he might live. If he recovers and grows to manhood we should expect that he will be peculiarly tender and affectionate to his sister; but it is by no means certain, for many men who know that Christ died that they might have eternal life, despise his claims upon them and do nothing for his sake. (II. Cor. 5: 15.)

THE QUEEN OF MATABELELAND.

LOBENGULA, KING OF MATABELELAND.

A Lion Uncaged in New York.

Considerable excitement was produced in New York on October 26 by the news that a ferocious lion was loose in a stable in East Eighteenth Street. The lion had recently been brought over from England for exhibition in this country. He had been in the noted Wombwell's menagerie and had the record there of having killed two keepers, one of them as recently as last July. On his arrival in New York he was taken in his cage to the Eighteenth Street stable, where three other lions, a wolf and some kangaroos were temporarily lodged, ready for transportation to a travelling menagerie. It had been decided to remove the lion to safer quarters, but in transferring him to a wheeled cage, he broke loose. The keeper fled from the stable and the lion bounded on the back of a valuable horse which was in a loose box, and killed it instantly. He made a huge feast on the carcass of the horse. For more than twenty-four hours the lion had undisputed possession of the stable, all efforts to coax him away from the dead horse into his cage proving unavailing. It would have been easy to shoot him from the stable-loft, but as his owner had paid five thousand dollars for him, he had a natural reluctance to kill him. The general alarm of the people in the neighborhood, however, especially mothers of families, made itself heard and the police interfered. The owner of the lion was notified that the ferocious beast must be securely caged within a few hours, or the police would shoot it. The notice had its effect. The assistance of several keepers from the Central Park Menagerie and from Barnum's circus was secured and the lion was driven into his cage and safely fastened in. Happily, no harm was done, save to the horse, but the lion might have had a human victim if the natural and reasonable alarm of the parents of children in the neighborhood had not forced decisive action. It is much to be wished that there was a similar concern for the protection of the children from the danger more imminent and more dreadful of falling a prey to the enemy, who, as the apostle said, "as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour." (1 Peter 5: 8.)

A Fatal Swindle.

Three persons in Williamsburg, N. Y., lost all of their savings and one of them lost her life through a swindling transaction. A widow and her son and son-in-law had accumulated by industry and frugality the sum of $13,000 of which one half belonged to the widow. They were seeking a profitable investment for the money when a peddler with whom they were acquainted told them of an offer by which he said they could make a large profit. Two men who were school-fellows of his in Russia had just arrived, bringing with them a quantity of gold dust obtained dishonestly from Russian mines. It might be had cheap, as the present possessors could not, for obvious reasons, dispose of it themselves through the regular channels. The widow and the two young men were taken by the peddler to Newark, N. J., where the gold was submitted to an examination. They agreed to purchase for their thirteen thousand dollars, three bags of the metal, the weight of which, if genuine, showed it to be worth $30,000. Samples of it were taken by the intending purchasers and submitted to an expert for a test. It was declared by him to be pure gold. The purchase was then completed and the price agreed upon was paid. The purchasers went to Newark and brought home the bags. When they were opened the appearance of the metal aroused their suspicion and it was again sent to the expert. He at once pronounced the metal brass filings, and not worth five dollars. The bags evidently had been changed at the last moment. When the widow realized that they had been cheated she had a fit of apoplexy in which she died. Many a man has lost his soul as she lost her life. The promises of peace and happiness that Satan and the world hold out to their votaries are never fulfilled, but turn out to be dust and ashes, and when the victim discovers that he has been cheated and that all he has gained by the sacrifice of his best interests is vanity and vexation of spirit, he has seldom the disposition to seek the Lord. (Job 21: 13-16.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The last words of Mrs. Lucy Stone Blackwell, whispered to her daughter, were the injunction, "Make the world better."

The Jews of Jerusalem, who have hitherto worshipped in three separate congregations, Spanish, German and Russian, are now to be united in one, as they all speak Hebrew.

It is computed that the number of missionaries throughout the world is 5,094; of unmarried female missionaries, 2,445; of native ministers, 3,730, and of native helpers, 40,438.

Dr. Charles H. Daniells of New York was elected Corresponding Secretary of the American Board, to fill the place of Dr. E. K. Alden, who has resigned the office.

Churches are warned against a colored man who is pretending to be a converted Zulu, and is appealing for funds. A few years ago the same man personated a native Kaffir chief and was arrested for imposition.

Messrs. Crossley and Hunter, both of Canada, and evangelists of recognized ability and standing, began special services on Nov. 5, at the Janes Methodist Episcopal church, Brooklyn. They will remain in Brooklyn five weeks.

No less than one hundred and fifteen missionaries sailed from England during the last week of October under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society. Their respective destinations were India, Ceylon, Palestine, China, Japan and East Africa.

The results of the American Board's wise decision in the Noyes case and the change in the offices and Prudential Committee are already becoming tangible. On Oct. 22 one church in New York alone took up a collection of $2,600 for the Treasury of the Board.

The successor of the late Bishop Crowther the colored bishop in connection with the Church Missionary Society has been appointed. He is a native of the Yoruba country and a son of Christian parents. It is reported that two other natives of that country are soon to be consecrated bishops.

Mr. Charles Cook the Prison Evangelist preached for Dr. MacArthur last Sunday evening. To-morrow (Thursday) he will lecture in St. George's Church, New York, on the prisons of the world. On the following evening (Nov. 10) he will lecture on the same subject in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Sunday School Superintendents are asked by the Women's Executive of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions to take up a collection on the Sunday preceding Thanksgiving Day in behalf of the educational work of the Board. The money received from that source this year will be devoted to the erection of a school building for the Omaha Indians.

Mr. Nobuta Kishimoto, speaking at the Parliament of Religions on The Future Religion of Japan, said: "We do not want Catholic Christianity, nor do we want Protestant Christianity." "We Japanese want the Christianity of Christ. We want the truth of Christianity—nay, we want the pure truth." "We hope for the union of all Christians."

Rev. A. C. Dixon, pastor of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, is arranging for an evangelistic campaign to cover the whole city beginning the tenth of this month and continuing through the winter. Mr. Dixon hopes to have the help of several evangelists who have been assisting Mr. Moody in Chicago. Among them Mr. R. E. Pearson, Mr. McNeill Robertson, and Mr. Henry Varley. Services are being held in the Hanson Place Church every night.

Evangelist W. L. Bowell of the Church of the Disciples, delivered an interesting address to the Sunday school of the Brooklyn Tabernacle Oct. 22. His remarkable power of arresting and holding an audience was strikingly manifested. Mr. Bowell has been conducting some very successful services during the past few weeks at Providence, R. I., and Boston, Mass. He has now returned to his home at Canfield, O., for a brief rest before commencing an evangelistic tour in the West.

At the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union Congress recently held in Chicago representatives from twenty-eight countries were in attendance. Among those present were Lady Henry Somerset, Archbishop Ireland, Mrs. Sakurai, of Japan, Susan B. Anthony, Anthony Comstock, Miss Kate Bushnell, and other well-known personages. After the close of the Congress the National W. C. T. U. held its twentieth annual convention extending through four days. Miss Willard, who is in Europe in delicate health, was re-elected president.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

LOOKING AWAY UNTO JESUS.

Preached last Sunday morning, Nov. 5, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Text Heb. 12: 2: "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

THIS text stands in very close relations to the verse which precedes, the verse which was the text last Sunday morning. The encouragements which the writer gives in that verse find their climax in the exhortation, "Looking away unto Jesus." The second verse is really a part of the one exhortation begun in the first verse. This climax gives the strongest inducement to run the Christian race with patience. It calls our attention to Christ's holy life, his patient endurance of trial, and his final, glorious victory. His example encourages us to run this race as the example of the glorified witnesses who encompass us could not. We are told that on the Grecian race courses were erected pillars on which was placed such mottoes as, "excel," "hasten," "finish the course." These mottoes would often, doubtless stimulate the flagging zeal of the racer as he neared the goal. So on the page of Scripture such mottoes as this verse and the previous one stimulate us in our Christian course. It is very beautiful to discover the true meaning of the word translated "looking." The word by its composition shows that our attention is drawn off everything else and fixed exclusively upon Jesus. We are to look away from our own weakness and strength, away from all rites and ceremonies, away from every other means of grace, and to look first, last and always to Jesus, the author and finisher of the faith. It is most important, therefore, that we should understand just now in what characteristics we are to see Jesus as set forth in this text.

The Exemplar of Faith.

First, we are to look upon him as the great Exemplar of faith. There is a common misconception regarding the writer's meaning in this exhortation. The word "our" is not in the original; and its presence in our version tends to mislead our thought. We are not here exhorted to look upon Christ as he who begins and completes our faith. It may, or may not, be true, that so far as this passage is concerned, that Christ produces faith in us, that he begins and completes our faith unto salvation; but that thought is not at all in the mind of this writer in this connection. The meaning is simply that Christ was the beginner and finisher of the long list of illustrious examples of faith in God. In this respect he occupied a pre-eminent position; he is in his own aim and life the most perfect model of unquestioning faith which can possibly be placed before us. He was not enumerated in the long list of heroes of faith given in the preceding chapter, for the apostle wished to present him alone, as his example was so much more illustrious than that of all others. He stands at the head of the line of noble examples of unquestioning, unfailing, and unwavering faith. We are to look at him as did the racers in the Grecian games when a former competitor and victor might stand before the runner to cheer him in his course. As an example of faith Christ was he was the beginning and the ending of faith; he was the first and the last. We are not, then, to think of him as either beginning or finishing our faith; but rather as the most perfect example of faith in its largest sense. At him as such a model we as racers may now look with hope, with assurance, and with enthusiasm. Christ is [illegible] most eminent illustration of the faith which we ought to cherish and manifest. It is important that this explanation be given. It is quite certain that most readers of this passage, and often many preachers who select it as a text, are misled by the presence of the word "our," and by the teaching of other Scripture regarding Christ's relation to the beginning and the ending of our Christian experience and victory. The true Christian is to keep his eye on Christ at every step as the pattern of devotion in doing and suffering the will of God, and as drawing from him power for patient endurance in the Christian race. Thus looking to Christ it will be easy to throw aside every weight; it will be joyous to guard every besetting sin; it will be blessed to bear the heaviest cross, and to run in the roughest path while receiving his inspiration and enjoying his approval. Indeed, except we so look to him it will be impossible to lay aside our weights and sins. When his love fills the soul sin is necessarily driven out. His love gives the soul of divine affections. In my yard was a tree on which during the most biting frosts and the fiercest winds of winter the dried-up leaves and buds of the former year still clung. It seemed as if no external force could separate them from the stem; but with returning spring came the flowing sap, pulsing life, and shooting bud of the new vegetation. Soon the old leaves naturally dropped off. They were pushed off by the silent but irresistible power of the new life in the heart of the tree. The new buds of spring were mightier than the fiercest storms of winter. So the new love of Christ in the life of the soul will cause old habits, heavy weights and besetting sins to slough off, however firm they may have been to mere natural resolution or external solicitation. When the heart is given up to Jesus Christ, a beautiful, blessed, mighty life will fill the soul.

We are also, in the second place, to look away unto Jesus as the atoning and joyful sufferer on the cross, "who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame." Our thoughts are now carried back to Christ upon the cross. At one time we see him on the throne crowned with glory, and at another on the cross crowned with thorns. The cross and the crown are ever near each other. Christ sways to-day the sceptre of universal empire because once he hung upon the cross as the world's Redeemer. The cross was the symbol of the most painful, death. It is very touching to see the cross set before us in the midst of allusions to Christ as the victorious example of faith. We know that crucifixion was a Roman rather than a Jewish mode of execution; and that it was intended to be inflicted only on the lowest slaves and the vilest criminals. Cicero said, "It is an outrage to bind a Roman; to scourge him is an atrocious crime; to put him to death is almost parricide; but to crucify him, what shall I call it?" To the proud Roman and to the cultured Greek the cross was the symbol of infamy; crucifixion was to them an unspeakable humiliation and an indescribable horror. It is interesting to observe that our word "excruciating" is derived from this form of punishment. This word is intended to represent a pain like that which was felt on the cross. We have no word in our language more descriptive of violent agony than this. We know that from the very nature of the punishment the pain attending it must have been unspeakably exquisite; for death came only after days of torturing pain. Pilate marveled that Christ was dead when he had hung for only six hours on the cross. To us the cross is the symbol of so much that is beautiful and glorious that it is almost impossible for us to associate with it ideas of ignominy which it once suggested. The views of the world, because of the relation of the cross to Christ, have associated with it honor and glory. We appreciate the disgrace which attaches to the block, to the guillotine and to the gallows; but in the early day the ignominy of the cross was vastly greater. Now, however, the word is associated with all that is noblest in sacrifice, grandest in poetry, sublimest in architecture, most artistic in painting and sculpture, and most æsthetic in ornamentation. Then the word excited the contempt of the Jews, the detestation of the people of Athens, of Corinth, of Rome, and indeed of the civilized world; but ever since Constantine made it a part of the imperial standard in war, it has been honored among the great nations of the earth. Around the cross to-day there is a halo of heavenly glory. Far different was it when Christ hung thereon, and when the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews wrote our text. Then, as we have seen, it was the symbol of every degree of infamy. When the Apostle Paul in writing the epistle to the Philippians, would describe our Lord's deepest humiliation, he carries us down step by step from the sublime height of equality with God to obedience unto death, and then, as the last downward plunge, he adds, "even the death of the cross." Lower than that he could not go. But even in this terrible suffering there was, as we see in the text,

Shameful and Ignominous

Joy Set Before Jesus

Marvelously beautiful is it too see how sorrow and joy, honor and shame unite in close relations and in striking contrasts around the cross. These contrasts are worthy of our careful examination. Our Lord had joy in his sense of obedience to the will of God. To do this will he came from heaven to earth; and to do his Father's business was his dominating purpose when a boy of twelve. There was joy also in the glorious recompense of reward attaching to his sacrificial love. He looked now thence forward to the hour of his complete triumph. All earth and heaven were to testify to his innocence, his purity, and his divinity. The day would come when he should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; the day when the world should know that he suffered the just for the unjust; the day when all the world would shout, "Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift." There was joy also in the knowledge that by his sufferings innumerable souls would be saved from the bondage of sin and Satan and would finally enjoy the triumph and peace of heaven. He saw our ruined and miserable race in its sin and wretchedness; his heart was touched with pity, and he flew to our relief. He knew that by his sufferings millions would be delivered; that by his poverty they would be made rich; that by his stripes they would be healed; and that by his death they should have eternal life.

His Soul Glowed

with joy as he looked forward to that day when the "ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." He looked forward to that day when a great multitude, which no man could number, should be presented faultless before the presence of his Father with exceeding joy. There was joy also to such a heart as Christ's in healing the sick, comforting the sorrowing, feeding the hungry, and raising the dead. One almost envies him the reflex joy which came from the joy which he imparted to weary hearts, sinking souls, and broken lives, all about him in his earthly course.

Christ also despised the shame. This is very striking language. How shall we understand it? Does it mean that he despised the joys of this life. So some have thought; but this seems to be a very inadequate explanation. Surely the sense is that as compared with the joy set before him the sufferings of the cross were insignificant. The word translated "despising," suggest that he lightly esteemed the pain by comparison with the joy, that he disregarded the ignominy, that he looked down with a certain sort of holy contempt on the shame and pain of the cross. Most instructive is this comparison. It shows us his love for man and his trust in God.

It Rebukes Us

for our murmuring at the crosses we bear, the shame we endure, and the efforts we make for the salvation of men, and for the glory of God. In the presence of Christ's sacred contempt for the pain of crucifixion, let us never more murmur at our lot in life. O, gaze upon him, looking away from everything earthly, from earth's charms, defeats and victories, until the heart glows with unspeakable joy and is filled with ineffable bliss.

We are, in the last place, while running the Christian race to look away unto Jesus as the victorious occupant of the divine throne, "and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Our eyes turn now from the cross of shame to the throne of glory. Beautiful again is the sudden contrast here suggested. Because of his elevation on the cross, we now have Christ exalted to the throne. Evermore the cross must precede the crown, the shame, the glory, the death, the life. Evermore Calvary meets us before Olivet; bearing our crosses we are prepared to wear our crown; going to Calvary we are really on the way to glory. The reference here to the right hand of God teaches us that Christ was promoted to the highest possible place of dignity and honor in God's broad universe. We see, too, that he is represented as sitting down at the right hand of God. His work of his atoning work is complete; his work of intercession now begins. When Stephen saw him he was represented as standing on the right hand of God. The right hand is the place of honor, of power and of glory. He is on a throne both of power and of grace. We ought to thank God that grace and glory and majesty, blend in all the descriptions of that heavenly throne. He is able now to succor those that are tempted, because once he himself suffered being tempted. As our great high priest he has passed into the heavens, and now he ever liveth to make intercession for us. Though tempted in all points like we are, he was yet without sin; he is, therefore, a high priest, who is most tenderly touched with the feelings of all our infirmities. Let us then look with longing, trustful, and joyous eyes to-day upon our enthroned King; and let us go with holy boldness, with confidential frankness, unto the throne of grace. That throne is open day and night; it is accessible from year to year, and from generation to generation. It can be approached by men of every condition, in every land and of every language. Glorious throne, triumphant King, sympathetic Priest, to thee we look to-day as by faith we run the appointed race! Amidst all our trials, however numerous and severe, our eyes shall rest both upon our Lord's cross and crown, and from his heroic example we shall learn lessons of patience and perseverance as we press forward toward the mark of the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

No Laggards.

There must be no lagging in this race. Success is due to our looking away unto Jesus, and yet also to our striving as if it all depended upon our own efforts. There is an inseparable union between divine power and human effort. Christ does the entire work, and yet we have to run the race. Divine sovereignty and human responsibility must ever be side by side in the entire experience of every Christian. If the racer in the old games took his eyes off the goal to look upon other objects of interest he lagged in the race, and ran the risk of failing to win the prize. If the world attracts our attention so that we fail lovingly to gaze upon Jesus Christ we shall lose our inspiring motive and fail of our victorious reward. Nothing but looking unto Jesus enabled the great Dr. Judson to endure amid all the disappointments of his years of weary waiting before converts to his Lord were made. These are his words, "If any ask what prospect there is of ultimate success, tell them as much as that there is an Almighty and faithful God. If a ship were lying in the river, ready to convey me to any part of the world I should choose, and that with the entire approbation of all my Christian friends, I would prefer dying to embarking." Some years later he wrote, "I know not that I shall ever live to see a single convert; but I feel that I would not leave my present situation to be made a king." This is the perseverance which gives victory; this is the holy enthusiasm which secures the approval of God, and fills the believer's soul with Divine Peace.

Professional enthusiasm fired the heart of Audubon with similar perseverance. Looking unto scientific triumphs he labored for years to complete a set of drawings of birds made in their native haunts. The years of toil are over, the drawings are made and entrusted to a friend for safe keeping. The time arrives when they are to be prepared for the public. Audubon calls for his drawings, and then to his dismay discovers that they have been destroyed by vermin. Brave man, he plunges into the forest, and by three years of incessant labor repairs the loss, honors science and reaps enduring fame! O, how many start in the Christian race, run well for a season, and then drop out by the way! Such cases there were in Apostolic days, and such failures called forth Apostolic exhortation, and gave sorrow to the heart of the Apostles as to the heart of Jesus himself. Such cases well-nigh break the hearts of pastors to-day. How many there are like Atalanta of mythical fame. Being the swiftest of mortals, she offered to become the wife of him who should outrun her in the race, the penalty of defeat being death. Meilanion, as a gift from Venus, secured three golden apples, which he successively dropped in the race. Atalanta was charmed by their beauty; she could not refrain from gathering them; she lost the race, lost her honors and was obliged to yield her heart to her deceiver. O, how the world drops its apples of gold, of beauty, of pleasure, in the Christian race! Stopping to pick these apples, the eye is taken from Christ, the feet lag and the race is lost. O, men and women, look away from everything earthly, fix the eye alone upon Christ, and let the motto in life, in death, and forever in heaven be, "Looking away unto Jesus."

AN UNFILIAL TRIBE

The Katchins, a tribe of cattle-raiding mountaineers on the Chinese frontier of Upper Burmah, have many peculiar and savage customs, some of which are interestingly described by Col. H. G. Colville, in the November number of Scribner's Magazine. "Once," he writes, "we came to a clearing on a narrow saddle where a lup, or conical thatched tomb of a Sawbwa stood out black against the sky, surmounted by a fantastic cross, looking in the gloom like the writhing body of some crucified malefactor. Near it was a scaffold, built of four tall bamboos, towering above the forest trees, but the details of its top lost in the darkness.

"I could easily see, however, that it was approached by a rough bamboo ladder, and its whole appearance was somewhat similar to that of early models of the guillotine. I learnt afterward that it was an altar to Yan, the spirit of the sun, and is used by some Katchin tribes for gently reminding their aged relatives of the impropriety of clinging too long to their fleshy tenements. Having been politely and tenderly conducted to the top of the ladder, the old people are prodded with long bamboos, from below, until, overstepping the limits of their narrow resting-place, as they had previously done those of life, their souls and bodies take different routes."

HINDOO CASTE SUPERSTITIONS.

Rev. Elbert Chute, a Baptist missionary at Palmur, India, writing of field work in that district, and of the obstacles encountered in the propagation of the Gospel among the natives, gives two notable instances of caste superstition: "When we had about seventy coolies employed in building the mission bungalow," he writes, "a fire broke out among the thatched houses in the town. The dry thatch of straw and leaves burned like tinder. The occupants were attending a festival some miles distant. One third of the town would soon have been swept away, but on seeing the flames, I sent my overseer with the coolies to put out the fire. When they came near the burning houses they saw more than two hundred people gathered there, not one of whom was making an effort to stop the progress of the fire, but all were laughing and enjoying it as our people would enjoy a bonfire at home. My overseer ordered the coolies to take water from a large irrigation well near by and quench the fire.

"A number of men who stood near by forbid them touching the water, saying that it would defile the well, many of the coolies being outcaste men. Though a Christian, this was too much for the patience of my overseer; in anger he struck some of those who stood near, and they were all afraid and ran away. The coolies then dipped up the water, and the fire was soon subdued. The poor people on returning from the festival blessed us for saving their homes.

"While camping at a village, a boy, while taking water from a well, fell in, and was liable to drown, while his sister stood near by beating her breast and could render him no assistance. An out-caste boy, seeing the occurrence, jumped into the well and brought out the drowning boy. The chief man of the village, in anger, abused and threated the boy severely, saying that he should have let the boy drown rather than defile the well."

Such are some of the difficulties encountered by missionaries in India.

WATCHING AND WAITING.

MY feet are nearing the river's brink,
And I wait for the dip of the oar,
That shall row me safe to the other side,
To eternity's evergreen shore.
I am waiting and watching the shadows that go:
I am sometimes faint with the strife.
But eternity's dawn will reveal, I know,
The portals of endless life.

Oh! wonderful river, the river of death!—
Oh! wonderful bliss of the skies!
Oh! wonderful grace, that came to earth!
Oh! wonderful sacrifice!
For the precious blood of the Son of God,
Was shed as a ransom for me,
And I know that I shall be satisfied,
When the King in His beauty I see.

I am weary grieving o'er vows unfulfilled
I grieve o'er my weakness and sin,
Do I hold up my light so that others may see
And not stumble by walking therein?
Oh! God of my childhood, vouchsafe unto me,
The grace that maketh me strong,
That eternity's dawn may reveal unto me,
Some sheaves in that heavenly throng.

TO THEE WE SING

TO thee, O gracious Lord, we sing,
To thee in faith we pray,
And all our sins to thee we bring,
Lord, wash them all away.
We glory in thy boundless love,
We triumph by thy grace.
When shall we come to heaven above,
To see thee face to face.
This barren wilderness is long,
O, be thou with us, Lord,
And by thy Spirit make us strong,
And guide us by thy Word.
Thy holy love, O spread abroad
In these soil'd hearts of ours,
That we may consecrate to God
Our bodies and our powers.
When comes the time to fall asleep,
Thou, Morning Star, we pray,
Conduct us safe across the deep
In thy own blessed way.

THE PLAN OF THE VISION.

The Structure of the Book of the Revelation and the Arrangement of Times.

BY THE LATE SIR S. A. BLACKWOOD.*

"THE orderly arrangement of the Book of Revelation is," as Canon Garrett says, "too striking to escape notice, and the interpretation of the symbols must be greatly affected by ascertaining correctly the true outlines;" and again, "Everything in the clear understanding of the prophecy depends upon getting the skeleton outlines of the Apocalypse firmly fixed in the mind." This is indeed of paramount importance. As perhaps nothing is more helpful to the reader of ordinary literature than a methodical table of contents, and appropriate division into chapters, so is it of the greatest assistance to the student of the prophetic word to apprehend at the outset the plan upon which the particular book is framed. For some portion of it we have Divine explanation; for others we are left to the resources of prayerful examination and conjecture.

About the first grand division of the Apocalypse there can neither be doubt nor difference of opinion. All are agreed that the Giver of the Revelation has himself declared its character. His command to the seer ran thus:—

"Write—
"The things which thou hast seen,"
"The things which are,"
"The things which shall be hereafter."

This was to be the threefold division of the contents of the book that he was to write.

"The things which thou hast seen" were clearly the vision described in the first chapter. "The things which are" were those which related to the Seven Churches in Asia. Whilst, however, they had primarily to do with the then actually existing Churches situated in the places named, the symbolical number indicated that those Churches were regarded as representative of the whole Church, and the character and contents of the seven letters with the accompanying promises to the individual "overcomer," and the urgent call for attention by the Spirit, leave no room for doubt that "the things which are" were meant to exhibit the spiritual phases and features of the professing people of God during the whole of the dispensation. The applicability of the admonitions, commendations, warnings, and encouragements to the various conditions of spiritual life which have all along obtained, has been recognised by all.

Whether the Seven Churches are to be regarded as prefiguring or illustrating successive chronological conditions of the Church, from the time when the Revelation was given until the end of the dispensation, is another question, and one into which I do not now enter. In its first and simpler meaning "the things which are" must, it is submitted, be understood in the sense in which the Apostle would have understood it, as applying to the whole Church then "militant here on earth," and represented by the seven selected examples.

"The things which shall be hereafter"—"the things which must shortly come to pass" (ch. 1:1)—"the things which must shortly be done" (22:6) would consequently commence when the description of "the things which are" had been concluded. And this is exactly what we find; for no sooner is the seventh epistle ended than an altogether fresh vision is presented to the seer, and the trumpet-toned voice of the Divine Revealer is heard, saying: "I will show thee things which must be hereafter"—or literally "after these things." The prophetic history of the future then commences—that is to say, after a preliminary manifestation of certain glorious scenes in that heaven into which the seer had been spiritually rapt. The prophecy thenceforward deals with that which should immediately begin to take place, and continues to unfold the things which were to come to pass; it ends only when "the mystery of God" is finished, "as he hath declared to his servants the prophets," and the new heaven and the new earth, with all the glories of the New Jerusalem, and the blessedness of the redeemed, have been brought before the entranced gaze of the beloved disciple.

Such are the main divisions of the book. But subordinate to these, and not less important, is the arrangement of that part which is contained in the last of three sections. This arrangement is a twofold one: that is to say, the things which were to come to pass were exhibited to the seer in two series of visions, each of them covering the same chronological period, and consisting of a double sevenfold succession of prophetic figurations.

GENTLENESS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 19. Eph 4: 30, 32; Col. 3: 12-15.

CHRIST'S law of forgiveness, which the Apostle emphasizes, occasioned more surprise among his followers and was recognized as one more difficult to obey than any other part of his legislation. Again and again he was questioned on the subject and, to the last, they did not comprehend it. Yet it was an essential and logical result of the principle of love, which was to be the basis of all Christian life. With the heart full of love for God, with the conscience continually reminding the child of God how much God had forgiven him, how could he refuse to forgive? Yet the law of resentment was so deep-seated in human nature that this limitless gentleness and magnanimity was repugnant to it. Christ said a wrongdoer was to be forgiven though he offended seven times. Peter eagerly apprehended a limit and asked explicitly whether seven offences exhausted an offender's right. But Christ promptly swept it away. Not seven times, nor seventy times seven, he said, would be a limit. Nor was the forgiveness to be passive. Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you. Truly human nature was never required to do a more difficult thing. It can only be done when the spirit of love is animating and directing the whole being. Then it becomes easy and natural. It is not difficult for the husband to forgive the wife, nor the parent the child. The wise and loving father is chiefly concerned lest he forgive too readily for the child's good. And it is in this consideration that the true limit of Christ's law is found. While he commanded the follower who was struck by a persecutor, to turn the other cheek, he commanded him, if his brother trespassed against him, to rebuke him, and if that did not suffice, to carry his complaint to the church. The Christian was not to be the boneless, emasculated creature that the disciples inferred from the other command. Righteous indignation was not prohibited. Christ himself even felt it and showed it when he was dealing with the Scribes and Pharisees and with the high priest at his trial. If that was prohibited, wrong might go unreproved and the Christian might be regarded as condoning, if not conniving at, the iniquity he abhors. The child must be punished for the wrong he has done, or he may think that his father does not disapprove of his conduct. But the punishment is not to be vindictive. It must not be in the nature of revenge. It has accomplished all its purpose when the wrongdoer has become repentant. So with the brethren. An abject apology is not necessary, but sincere contrition is required. The personal element is excluded. The sufferer is not to brood over his wrongs, not to be resentful on his own account. It is the general good that is his concern. Toward the heathen man who wrongs him, he is to be passive, but the brother who wrongs him is to be rebuked; eventually, if he continue impenitent, is to be treated as no longer a brother. In his case the brotherhood is implicated. He ought to know better. Even Christ in the supreme moment of his death agony thus distinguished [illegible] the Scribes or the Pharisees, but for the soldiers [illegible] ward all there is to be forbearance, humility, a [illegible] and actions and a readiness to forgive when forgiveness can do no harm to the culprit or [illegible]

THREE C. E. LEADERS.

Young people's societies of every name like to know the faces of eminent men who are interesting themselves in the young people's movement. Three such men, who are prominent in Christian Endeavor work are pictorially represented on this page. One of them belongs to the Society of Friends, a second to the Protestant Episcopal Church and the third is a Methodist. All honor to any movement or any society which brings together in united effort and paternal spirit representatives of three so widely separated communions. Rev. M. M. Binford is the President of the Friends' International Christian Endeavor Union. He is well known as an earnest successful evangelist. About twenty years ago he did two years arduous missionary work in Mexico and about ten years ago, at the request of the American Bible Society he made an extensive tour through New Mexico. Mr. Binford is a native of Indiana, about forty-two years of age and a most earnest and energetic worker. Canon J. B. Richardson is one of the new members of the Board of Trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. He is a Canadian by birth and about fifty years old. For the past fifteen years he has been rector of the Memorial Protestant Episcopal Church of London, Ont., and during greater part of the time has been clerical secretary of the diocese. Mr. Richardson is noted as one or the best organizers in the diocese, having the faculty of inspiring men and women to work, and the still rarer quality of finding for each one the kind of work for which he or she is best adapted. No less than six young people's societies are in active operation in connection with his church. One of them is a Christian Endeavor Society and in point of numbers and efficiency is the banner society of the church in Canada. Rev. Gilby C. Kelly, D.D., is another trustee of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. He is at present pastor of the First Methodist Church of Owensboro, Kentucky, and has ministered to some of the largest churches of that State. He comes of a honored ministerial family. His father had three brothers and two sisters; the four young men all became useful Methodist ministers and the two young ladies married methodist ministers. Dr. Kelly is one of the leading advocates of the affiliation of the Epworth League with the Christian Endeavor Society and has contributed an article on the subject to Bishop Fitzgerald's Epworth Book. His attitude on this question is not popular in his denomination, but his geniality and uniform courtesy disarm all personal opposition.

THE B. Y. P. U. CONVENTIONS.

Reports of the activity of the Baptist Young People's Unions come from all quarters. At the Convention recently held at Denver, Colo., there was a large and enthusiastic assemblage. The officers elected for the year were: President, Rev. S. C. Davis; Secretary, Miss Agnes Kirkbride; Treasurer, James Morger. A description of the programme of the Christian Culture Courses by Mr. E. L. Harrington, elicited warm commendation from the ministers and delegates, and there was an evident disposition to adopt them generally. The Pennsylvania Convention, which met in the Tenth Street Church, Philadelphia, passed the following among other resolutions: "That no energy be spent by any one in seeking to change the name or constitution of any Young People's Societies now existing in the churches, or in seeking to terminate their present affiliations." Such a resolution must make Dr. Wilkins doubt whether life is worth living, especially as the Convention ordered this and other resolutions of a like fraternal spirit to be printed and sent to every Young People's Society in the State. The Convention elected as President, Mr. C. A. Edsall of Pittsburg. An enthusiastic Convention of the Minnesota Unions was held at Rochester lately. Twenty-three Unions were represented. All reported an increased interest in the work and an encouraging growth in membership. The President for the year is Prof. W. A. Shedd of Owatonna; the Secretary, Rev. George E. Rowe of Waterville, and Treasurer, Rev. George W. Hallowell of St. Paul.

A HEARTSEASE CIRCLE.

Among the stories we receive from the various societies of Christian young people who are endeavoring to live as Christ lived, going about doing good, is one which comes from Miss Annie D. Laird, President of the Heartease Circle of King's Daughters in Philadelphia. After acknowledging the help derived by the Circle from THE CHRISTIAN HERRALD, she says: "We used the 'penny-a-day' system to increase our treasury, that is, each one of the Circle saves one cent a day, and at every meeting we turn it in with our dues, which makes sometimes thirty-three and sometimes forty cents a month individually; from that system our receipts for the year amount to $39.86; $5.95 of which was donated to us; our expenses amounted to $30.44, leaving balance in treasury of $9.42. Our custom each week is to send flowers to the sick; we have sent clothing to one of the rescue missions and different institutions; also sent a barrel of clothing, etc. to South Carolina; for Christmas we also sent donations toward the support of a Bible reader in China, and the erection of a Woman's Hospital in N. India; the Children's Country Week Association, and to our pastor, to pay for lodging for those who have no homes."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is glad to have helped these young ladies in their excellent work and hopes that they will continue it, and realize in blessing others that they are themselves being blessed.

THE EPWORTH GUARDS.

The constitution of this new auxiliary to the Epworth League has been issued and copies may be obtained from the Board of Control. Its object is defined as "The development of Christian manliness in the young men and boys who are members and adherents of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The organization is to be under the supervision of the General Cabinet. Every chapter may organize a company, which is to consist of not less than fifteen nor more than fifty members. A regiment must have not less than six nor more than twelve companies. The companies in a presiding elder's district are to be organized into regiments or battalions, and the regiments within the boundaries of an annual conference will constitute a division. Every member of the Epworth Guards is required to pledge himself to abstain from intoxicating liquors and tobacco and not to use profane or obscene language. There is to be a regular uniform, wherever it can be secured, but the only one that is indispensable is a regulation cap and cane. Each company is to have corporals, sergeants, a first and second lieutenant and a captain. The captain is to be nominated by the pastor and confirmed by the local cabinet. The captain nominates the lieutenants who need confirmation by the cabinet. The other officers are appointed by the captain. Full details as to the duties of the various officers and the discipline of the force are given in the Constitution. There can be no question as to the popularity of this new contingent. That is assured, and as each member must pledge himself to total abstinence, the organization will be a distinct gain to the party of temperance.

In Ireland's Capital.

Some of its Picturesque Environs—Knockmaroon and the "Strawberry Beds."

NO one who has visited the Irish Capital will fail to recall its beautiful suburban drives, which possess a charm of simple, rustic picturesqueness to be found in few European cities. Usually the road selected leads along the lovely valley of the river Liffey, or through many-statued Phœnix Park, with its distant panorama of the blue mountains of Wicklow. One of the most delightful of those surburban drives leads in the direction of the village of Lucan. Seated in a "two wheeler," or "Irish jaunting car," the exhilarating spin through the Park and in and out among leafy groves and green meadows, is keenly enjoyed by the visitor, who presently finds himself at Knockmaroon Hill and the famous "Strawberry Beds," a resort dear to the hearts of the people of Dublin. On the hill-side—which slopes down to the valley of the Liffey—are laid out with dainty exactness, great beds of strawberry plants and cherry bushes, and from these the place takes its name. The hillside is dotted with cottages that would delight the eye of an artist, so rural and prettily picturesque are they, with the neatest of thatched roofs, the whitest of walls, casemated windows, half hidden by flowering vines, and invitingly open doorways. These cabins are tenanted mostly by strawberry growers who, in the fruit season, make a golden harvest from the summer visitors, who come in hundreds to enjoy a dish of great luscious strawberries and cream, or a cluster of cherries. The hospitable cottagers usually add a slice of hot griddle-cake and a mug of new milk to the banquet, and it is not an infrequent sight to witness members of noble families enjoying this democratic repast off a table covered with snowy, homespun linen, while, at the adjoining table, some workman's family out from the city for a rare holiday, are making the hillside re-echo with innocent merriment and frolic. The photograph on this page shows one of the "Strawberry Bed" cabins on Knockmaroon Hill. Many of these stanchly-built, white cabins are very old—some of them having withstood the wear and tear of a century

Although there are many fashionable resorts in the environs of Dublin (including the Lucan Spa nearby, where invalids go to drink the sulphur waters), none is so universally patronized as the "Strawberry Beds" on the hillside, where the humble dwellers in the little thatched cabins have played the host to rich and poor alike, almost from time immemorial.

An Arctic Housewife.

Mrs. Peary, the wife of the explorer, who is now in the Arctic, will this winter keep house in a dwelling such as no white woman ever before occupied, probably since the world began. It is only thirty-three feet long by seventeen feet wide, but it is built of the very best material. The uprights are two-inch planks, outside of which is placed tar paper, two-ply, then a sheathing of matched boards, on top of which is another layer of three-ply tar paper. The entire house is painted with tar. Inside comes another layer of paper. Then more sheathing which is put on at an angle of forty-five degrees, and runs opposite on the opposite sides of the house, in order to more securely brace it. Inside of all this is thick red flannel to keep the occupants warm. On the roof is a glass dome, shaped like a hot-house, and made of hothouse sashes, with very thick glass. Under this dome and even with its ceiling, is another glass layer, making it perfectly wind-proof and comfortable, however cold it may be outside. On the whole, although she can't be outdoors very much, Mrs. Peary will be snug and comfortable in her Arctic dwelling till the long, Greenland winter is past.

Chinese Musical Pigeons.

Many young people are fond of keeping tame pigeons, and those who do so, as well as others, will be interested in the following: When a traveler visits Pekin for the first time, he is struck by a strange music that seems to be upon the air. It approaches, retreats, and then dies away. After some moments, it will be repeated. Looking upward at the instant when the ariel orchestra is at its loudest, there appears a very light cloud whose tint shows against the blue of the sky. The cloud approaches and is seen to be a flock of pigeons which wheel and circle, and finally settle upon the eaves of the house to which they belong. The music ceases, and the traveler is convinced that the birds are the musicians, but he is puzzled as to their instruments. The instrument is called a Chao-tse; the word Chao meaning whistling, and the tse signifying mechanical. A Chao-tse is a mechanical whistle. The form of the little machine varies according to the material from which it is composed. Some are made of reeds placed together in the form of pipes, such as Pan played, and others are made of small gourds. At the extremity of each reed, or on the face of the gourd, is placed a whistle. The whole instrument must be light enough for the bird to experience no difficulty in flying. It is fastened to him by means of a thin strip of wood which goes between the two central tail feathers. A small ring is attached to this, and a light stick is thrust through it. This holds the machine firmly. The whistling is varied by the way in which the air penetrates, and the force is proportioned to the rapidity of flight. The notes vary according to the dimensions of the reeds or gourd. A pigeon concert in mid-air is very beautiful and fascinating.

Study Politeness.

Speaking to young girls, Mrs. Jenness Miller says:—"I would try and be polite everywhere. True courtesy is more winsome than a pretty face or fine dress. Loud talk or loud dress does not betoken the lady. Be appreciative and sympathetic, and you have two keys which will unlock almost all hearts. I would learn self-control. To know when to speak, and when to be silent; to have hateful things said about you, and be able to answer pleasantly; to have people confide in you, and be wise enough to keep it locked in your heart; to be in poverty, and not be soured by it; to meet temptation, and be strong before it; to be strong enough to perform any labor or duty which needs to be done—all this shows a noble mastery over self."

The Young Household.

If there be anything to which a young married couple are fully and unequivocally entitled it is their perfect autonomy, says a writer in The Interior. It may be hard for the mother, who has tucked her boy in his crib every night and personally looked after his buttons and his shoe-strings, to believe that he has arrived at an age when he can be trusted to take his umbrella or put on his overshoes, but just because it is so hard he had better, when he is married, move into his "own hired house." It is still harder, a thousand times, for the mother who has bought all her daughter's dresses, selected her gloves and governed all her up-risings and down-sittings, to believe that this young fellow with a downy moustache and limited income can know anything about her needs, or will be able to look after her necessities without superintendence. Fatherly authority and motherly anxiety are very precious in the development of the son and daughter into man and woman. Over the unfledged chick the eagle broods, but under the full-grown bird the wise mother bird stirs up the nest and tumbles the eaglet out. It is the Bible teaching that two adult generations shall never live under the same roof as one family, but, however intimate the relationship, as equally responsible and equally free. The remembrance of this, and remembrance of it as part of the divine economy, embraced in the revelation of the will of God through words of Jesus, is one of the first requirements in the constituting of a happy home. It may be dangerous to trust young people with the freedom which God bestows upon them in his Word, but it is a great deal more dangerous to deprive them of it.

THE "STRAWBERRY BEDS" AT KNOCKMAROON HILL, NEAR DUBLIN.

THE CHILDREN'S ROOM.

HOW peaceful at night
The sleeping children lie.
Each gentle breath so light
Escaping like a sigh!
How tranquil seems the room, how fair
To one who softly enters there!

Whose are the yearning eyes,
And whose the trembling tear?
Whose heart is this that cries,
Beseeching God to hear?
Whose but the mother's, in whose face
Love shows its sweetest dwelling-place?

Her hopes in beauty bloom,
And heaven sends down its light,
Which lingers in the room
Where mother says, "Good night."
Soft treading by the sleepers there,
Her very presence seems a prayer!

BROTHERLY EXAMPLE.

GOODNESS must be seen to be imitated by the young. "I have met many a score of selfish boys," writes Rev. E. H. Lyttlelton, "but I doubt if one of them would not have been permanently better if vivid objects in usefulness could have been brought plainly before his eyes. It seems that the training in altruism should begin through brothers and sisters. If there are none, strangers or cousins should be imported to supply their place. A great deal ought to be made of the very strong social instincts of children.

"The fostering of this quality is a task of the utmost importance, and is therefore difficult. Incessant vigilance is necessary. When the mother sees the children at play together, and observes one—probably a boy—accustoming himself to secure the attention of others, and always thinking of himself first, her business is to wake up within him an instinct which ought to be active, but is dormant.

"Suppose that that boy, at the age of two, had no wish to learn how to walk, it is certain that the mother would have spared no pains to rouse up the desire in him. She would have consulted the doctor and worried all her nearest of kin. But when he grows and grows, and the years pass, and he betrays no beginning of a feeling for the wants of others, no gladness in their joys, or wish to share their sorrows, nobody cares. It seems to be thought that as he is naturally defective, so nature may be blamed for it, and nothing need be done.

"We have much yet to learn. If we are in earnest, anxiety and love will find out the way. Stories will be told to the child emphasizing the joy of renunciation. No opportunity will be lost for giving special praise at the faintest indication of unselfishness. As soon as the boy is old enough, take him into consultation over cases of distress, though his suggestions will be poor and useless. At prayer-time in the evening take care to review the events of the day, and see if some incipient self-denial has found a place. A day without it will be felt to be incomplete.

"In the same way, cruelty to animals will be prevented by simply teaching of fact. A diminutive infant will maul the housefly from a wish to possess and investigate, and from a failure to understand that the insect is alive. Children sin from ignorance. Enlighten them, therefore, as to the animal's sensitiveness by a sharp infliction (if possible) of similar pain to that which they have been giving. Inflict it without a trace of anger, merely as a means of instruction. And encourage meantime the keeping of pets, after the manner of Kingsley's children, and the voluntary tending of something like a lame dog or a chicken with a broken wing.

"Let the small renunciations that are made take visible effect. The giving up of money should be thus rewarded. Delicacies should be spared, or a comfortable chair relinquished, not for the benfit of a remote hospital or of a mission in the other hemisphere, but for use in a convalescent home close by, or for the enjoyment of some indigent cottager whom the young almsgiver can personally visit, so that he may be certain that his diminutive self-denial is doing something."

CHAPTER XV.

A MIDNIGHT INTERVIEW

THE statement that Guy made that perhaps he could say or do something that would help in his aunt's recovery astonished the young physician and his sister. They looked at him inquiringly. Guy pledged them both to secrecy and then told his story. He said: "I have often wished to speak to somebody about it—in case anything should happen—one never can foresee exactly how things may turn: and I have wanted to more than ever lately, when people have said such things of me,only you never believed them,so there was no need, and I could not trust anybody else. I wonder if I could make my aunt happy again. For I am almost sure I know what is troubling her so. She has not spoken to Monk about it,has she?"

"No,indeed," Geoffrey answered. "She has not see him since she was taken ill. She will have nobody near her but Yolante: and Yolante seems all at once to have awakened to a wish to be useful. She is with her mother night and day,and does her best to keep everybody else out."

Guy did not understand why that was, but he was thinking deeply. "I think it was my old nurse who was there and she told my aunt what she once told me—only I asked her to keep the secret—that I am a month older than Monk,not younger as everybody thinks, and as I thought myself till she told me."

For a moment there was silence, whilst the Northesks realized all that this meant, and were the less surprised at the effect the news had upon Mrs. Dangerfield, and then Geoffrey said slowly,

"In that case Dangerfield Park and property belongs to you."

"Yes, legally it does, but I have never felt any real claim upon it. Monk ought to have it, and I mean him to. He must never know, and I must find my aunt and ask her to keep the secret as a favor to me. It would be most unjust to Monk to turn him out now—I will never do it: and if he knows there might be some trouble. Do you think this would account for what has happened?"

But Geoffrey left the question unaswered: he was thinking of something different. "Then all this while you have known yourself the heir, and have been content to take a secondary position, whilst Monk reigned over your possessions? Why was that, Guy?"

"But I did not know it very long,and when I did it would have come so hard on Monk. He was just beginning to—to—well, I mean, to think about Joyce, and I always thought he ought to have it, for his father's sake,and I have as much as I want. I decided then to say nothing—you know I owe everything to my aunt and cousins, and it seemed such a mean return for all their kindness. I settled it all then and there—and now you must see for yourselves that it would be out of the question to speak. It would be doing a cruel wrong. You know you promised to keep my secret before I ever said a word about it."

Geoffrey and Cicely both smiled at the imploring look he bent on them as if he were afraid for the safety of his treasured secret. It was safe enough with them, but they could not help feeling some doubt as to whether it could ever be preserved inviolate, and whether it ought to be so kept, for was Guy right in thus despoiling himself even for one so dear to h[illegible]

Cicely exclaimed: "And you have let people say that you wished him out of the way, when you were all the time keeping this to yourself? O, Guy, you are a strange mixture. I should have thought that you must have cleared yourself of that imputation at all costs."

"You have acted very generously, Guy," Geoffrey said, "and if you felt that, you did quite right: but there is always the question [illegible] you, and mean you all the time? You know there were several rumors afloat at one time to the effect that the heir would prove other than Monk,and the very wording of the will seems to imply that he knew of the existence of more than one Guy Monkswold. If that should prove to be so—"

"It will make no difference—it shall make no difference," answered Guy quickly. "I will never be the means of ousting Guy. Come what may, he shall be master here."

"If you can keep him in his place."

"I will keep him there."

Geoffrey smiled. "It will be Greek meeting Greek one of these days if Monk ever finds out the truth. Luckily for you, he is not of a suspicious nature."

Guy made no answer. He was thinking deeply. "Do you think I could do my aunt any good by seeing her?" he asked,and Geoffrey mused a little, and then said,

"I think perhaps you might. We will try if you will."

So it was settled and the next day Fulk going home after a ride, was astounded to see Guy sitting quietly in his room. It was weeks since his cousin had crossed the threshold of the house, and he was so astonished at seeing him there, that he made no effort to welcome him, and it was Guy who spoke first.

"Ah, Fulk, old fellow—I have hidden myself up here, where I thought I should be least likely to be discovered. Geoffrey brought me here just now. He wants me to wait till he has prepared my aunt. He thinks I can do her some good by seeing her if she will permit it."

Fulk gave a keen glance,but Guy's face betrayed nothing. "Geoffrey is here, then?"

"Yes; he is with your mother now."

"And will you not come and see Monk? He will be savage if he hears that you have been here, and have not been to him."

"I think I would rather see your mother first," answered Guy quietly.

Fulk stood looking down into the fire. He was very much surprised and more than a little suspicious that more was meant than met the ear; but he was not one to ask questions where confidence was not spontaneously given, and Guy did not seem inclined to speak more plainly. So for the present they sat and talked over the fire. Guy told of his new life and the pleasure he took in it, and Fulk told him all about Monk, and what satisfactory progress he was making.

Presently Geoffrey came into the room, and closed the door behind him, sitting down by the fire with an air of abstraction. Guy looked at him, but did not speak, and meeting the glance, Geoffrey said,

"If we do it at all it must be without preparation. As it is, the sound of your name alone, throws her into one of those paroxysms of nervous agitation, which are doing her so much harm. She might bear the sight of you better."

"What does it all mean?" asked Fulk with a keen glance from one to the other.

"It is Guy's affair," answered Geoffrey quietly, "Your mother has got hold of some notion which is preying on her mind. Probably Guy can set the matter straight with her if we can get her to listen to him; but there seems little hope of her consenting to do so if we consult her beforehand."

"Then let us wait till night," said Fulk. "It is my turn to watch her. Yolante has consented to go to bed and leave me to the charge of the patient. I will let Guy in then, and he can have a private interview. I will take care he is not interrupted."

"You will leave us to ourselves?" said Guy smiling, "I want as few people as possible to be in the secret. It is nothing very mysterious—really—but the sort of thing that is best kept quiet. You do not mind, Fulk? You know it is not because you are not trusted."

"I don't profess not to have a certain amount of curiosity in my composition: but it shall be exactly as you wish. I never desire to intrude where I am not wanted."

"Guy is quite right," answered Geoffrey. "It is better to keep the thing quite private. But Mrs. Dangerfield must be relieved of the load which is pressing upon her, and that can only be done, so far as I see, by an interview with Guy."

Guy's presence in the house was not generally known, but Fulk managed to feed him, and when the time came for the household to retire, he brought his cousin into the dressing room which was adjacent to the sick room,and bid him wait there for the summons.

Midnight had just struck before it came,and then Fulk stepped softly to the half-open door and beckoned him. "She is awake now, and will know you. Go to her, and I will stay here with the door closed. If you want anything, call. I shall be close at hand."

"Fulk, what are you whispering about?—Whom have you got there? Not that woman again—O, not that woman."

It was Mrs. Dangerfield's voice, but how changed from the cold haughty tones that Guy had last heard. A great wave of pity swept over him at the sound, and motioning Fulk back, he stepped quietly to the bedside.

Mrs. Dangerfield was lying back upon her pillows, her eyes bright, her face shrunken, her whole face and attitude betokening a tension of nerve, and a feverish irritability painful to witness in one ordinarily so calmly self-restrained. When she saw Guy, she recoiled as if a blow had been levelled at her, and shrank away at his approach with a look of such terror that he could hardly bear to see it. He knew not whether it was detestation at what she had believed he had done, or fear at what he might have come to say: but which ever it might be, his one wish was to set her mind at rest, and as her speech seemed fairly paralysed by agitation and dread, he found himself able to approach and even to take her hand without a rebuff.

"Aunt Clare," he said very gently, "please do not look at me like that. I have come to try and do you good. Do you think that I would ever lift a finger to injure Monk?—to take from him what is truly his, and what he ought to have? I think I know what it is that has made you ill, and I want to tell you that you have nothing to fear from me. I have known it for a long time now, but I never intended anybody else to know. It ought to be Monk's, and I will never take it from him."

The burning eyes were fixed upon his face: the sick woman struggled hard to speak, and at length succeeded.

"What do you know?"

"I know that I am older than Monk—that if I chose to take advantage of a technical quibble I could be the master here. Martha, my old nurse, told me so, and I bid her keep the secret. She promised she would, not knowing all it might mean. Will you believe me now, Aunt Clare, when I say that I never hurt Monk?—you must see how much more easily I could have won my way if I had chosen?"

Guy spoke more as if begging a favor than bestowing one, his eyes met those of his aunt in an almost imploring glance. He had felt it such a terrible thing to be suspected and distrusted. If he could only win back her good opinion, how happy it would make him.

Mrs. Dangerfield made a great effort to rally her faculties, for she felt by instinct that a crisis of her life was at hand. The next few moments might make all the difference in her own future and that of her son's. She looked steadily at Guy, and said,

"Will you tell me a little more clearly what it is you know, and why you have come here at this hour to speak to me of it. I am ill—my mind is not very clear. I have been much disturbed of late. I want the case put very plainly before me."

Guy was so relieved at hearing her speak so calmly and quietly to him that he felt no suspicion and no misgiving. He sat down in Fulk's vacant chair and laid his hand upon that of his aunt.

"It is quite easy to understand, for it is only just this—I know I am older than Monk, and so might have a sort of legal, though not a moral, claim on this property. I found it out quite accidentally, a year and more ago from Martha: but she did not know that it would make any difference to my position, and so I begged her to keep it a secret as I professed I might get into trouble or look foolish if it were found out that I was passing myself off as younger than my age. I knew my grandfather had not even heard of my existence when he made his will—or at least had resolved to have nothing to do with me, so that it would have been the greatest shame in the world to have taken advantage of it—and in any case I would rather that Monk had it—he is far better fitted than I to be master here."

Guy felt his hand pressed as if in gratitude, and with a smile of affection he continued in his gentle way,

"When I heard that Martha had paid you one of her mysterious visits (into which I must inquire) and that you had been ill and agitated ever since, I felt certain that she had somehow betrayed the secret to you, and that it was this which had upset you. Of course I knew it was the first suspicion you could have had of such a thing, and that it would be most painful and difficult for you to know how to act to do right by us both. So I begged that I might come and see you, to tell you that I knew, and intended to go on just the same. It would be a wretched return for all the kindness I owe to you and yours to try and steal my brother's inheritance—for Monk will always be a brother to me—and I have come to beg that you will not think again of the matter, but let everything go on as before. For nothing will induce me to rob Monk, and it is imperative that he shall never know."

"You did not hear the charges the woman brought against me then? How she accused me of destroying papers, and I know not what. You did not set her on? You do not know what she can mean?"

Guy smiled, and held his aunt's hand in a warmer clasp. "Do I know what she meant by such words? Well, I do not know? but I think I can guess. Those people all labor under a delusion that my grandfather made a will in my favor—a pure hallucination of their disorded imaginations—and as it has never turned up, no doubt they try and persuade themselves that it has been destroyed. I can think of no other ground for such an accusation, and it would quite explain it to my thinking."

Guy looked up into his aunt's face with the clear truthful glance that had been one of his most winning attributes from childhood, and was surprised to see the spasm of pain and anguish that for a moment contracted that countenance. For a moment Mrs. Dangerfield struggled as if to speak—struggled almost as if some physical weight were lying upon her heart—after a long pause she said, "There is one thing that would make me happier for the future, if you would consent to do it."

"What is that? I will do anything in my power to set your mind at ease."

"It is this—to make a formal renunciation of your claims in favor of Monk—such a renunciation as would be binding on you and your heirs alike. It is not that I fear your changing, Guy—I know your faithful loyalty to Monk, which has stood already such a test—but we have to think of those who come after, and guard the property from the chance of being absorbed in a tedious law suit, which might embroil a whole family, and ruin the place. Do you understand me? And would you be willing?"

"Quite willing if it could be done quietly, so that Monk need never know."

"I would arrange that. We would go to London together and get it done privately. God bless you, Guy, my dear boy. You have made a happy woman of me at last."

Guy saw that she was wearied out and took this as a dismissal, walking quietly away with a strangely lightened heart.

Guy's first business the next day was to visit the Stapleton family. His face was very stern—more stern than some of those who knew him best would have believed that it could be, as he stood facing the dark-browed man who had been his father's servant with an unflinching look of determination stamped upon his face.

"Listen to me once and for all," he said with rapid decision and emphasis. "I wish you fully to understand that whoever is an enemy of the Squire's is an enemy of mine. Ralph Stapleton, I believe that were I to institute an inquiry into that night's work I could elicit evidence that might be very ugly for you, and might land you in a place where you would be safer, perhaps, than you are at large, but where for the sake of the affection you bore to my father I should regret to be the means of bringing you. As it is I have suffered much for what I fully believe is your deed, and were it not that my cousin agrees with me in thinking that after the lapse of so many weeks it will be better not to reopen the question, I should hesitate now as to the course I take. But, remember, my forbearance depends mainly upon your keeping the peace. If I find you at any of your old tricks, or if I have any good reason to think that you meditate the repetition of your own cowardly deed, I shall have no mercy. I am not sure now that I am doing right in not pushing inquiry to its furthest limits."

And with one more scathing glance under which Ralph seemed momentarily to cower, Guy turned on his heel and walked off.

The Face of Jesus Christ.†

IT is a remarkable thing in the history of Christ that nowhere have we any clue to his physical identity. The world owns no material portraiture of his physical person. All the pictures of Christ by the great artists are mere fictions. They look no more like Christ than they look like Simon Peter or Nebuchadnezzar. More than this, not only has the world no material portraiture of the physical Christ, it has no authentic description of his material person by which he could be distinguished from Zaccheus the little man, or Bartholomew, who has nothing more than a name upon the sacred page. Coins and statues, in our New York Metropolitan Museum, reveal the features of the Roman contemporaries of Jesus; history gives a more or less accurate pen-picture of the physical face and form of the great men of Greece, Socrates and Demosthenes and Pericles; but of him, the one historic personage of whose form and face the whole world most desires some knowledge, there is not a trace in the Bible. You cannot tell whether he was of moderate height or tall; whether his eyes were hazel or piercing black. You cannot tell one personal peculiarity of his which gave him his individual look. The conventional heads of Christ are the manufacture of the merest fancy. The would-be descriptive letter of Publius Lentulus is a fabrication of the fourth century, and the story that the face of Christ imprinted itself upon the handkerchief of the holy Veronica is a pure myth of papal Rome.

Why this absence of Christ in marble, or Christ on the canvas, or Christ on the face of ancient coins? Why this paralysis of pen, this silence of inspired biographers? I believe it is from God. God sets Christ forth as a man, and not as any particular man, that he may not be localized, or nationalized, but that he may be what he is, the Son of Man, the son of the race, and that he may belong to the wide world. As his face is pictured on the Bible page, a man of any nation can come to him and feel kinship. If he was particularized and localized—if, for example, he were made a man with a pale face, then the man of the ebony face would feel that there was a greater distance between Christ and his white brother. As it is, there is neither white nor black in Jesus. He is a man. That is all. And wherever you find a man, black or white, Christ is his brother. This is what the Caucasian feels when he looks at the face of Christ in the Bible album; this is what the Mongolian feels; this is what the African feels. In the church to which I minister, Caucasian and Mongolian and African sit together at the Lord's table, and we all think alike of Jesus, and we all feel that he is alike our brother.

We are satisfied with this way of presenting the face of Jesus Christ. While we do not have his features as we have the features of Cæsar or Napoleon or Washington, we have his mind, his purposes, his moral qualities, his spiritual nature. Enough is told us of his face to bring these out, and these fully satisfy us. After all, is it not the aim of true art in painting the human face to set forth these qualities? Are not these called the essence of the man? A true artist is not satisfied with painting the surface correctly, with merely giving features in their most exact proportions; he is not satisfied with putting mere physical beauty upon the canvas. A face beautiful merely as to the physical, a face with lips modeled from Cupid's bow, with chin of Grecian type, with ears like pearly shells, with cheeks white and ruddy, with hair black and glossy, and rippling in waves, and with eyes large and dark—a face such as this will not satisfy a true artist. To him it is like a false gem. It is worthless. Nay, more, it is more than worthless, because it mocks him with its flashing, and its false resemblances. To him it is like a musical rhyme without sense or meaning. Such a face lacks the main essentials; it lacks spiritual life; it lacks the characteristics of an indwelling mind. While the true artist puts the features upon the canvas in exact proportions, he considers his work a failure unless from the face the character and the life and the soul of the man look out. He wants the face to be the window of the soul. He wants it to represent the man, so that when we become thoroughly acquainted with him and know his inner and secret history we could not imagine it possible for him to have a different face. The face of Jesus Christ, as it looks up at us from the holy page, realizes the highest aim of true art. It introduces us to a living man. It makes his great attributes burn and thrill. It chronicles his tragic history. It opens a wide window into his nature.

HOW TO PRAY.‡

A Christian who does not pray is a dead Christian. He is not—he cannot be—a true Christian at all. For he violates the most imperious instinct, and flings away the chiefest blessings of the Christian life. He becomes like a man who is blind and lame, and who yet, though his path lies amid stumbling-blocks and precipices, flings away his crutch and drives away his guide. I fear that many, after their childish years, abandon the habit of praying altogether, to the fatal injury of all peace with God. And that is the reason why we see so many evil, so many disordered, so many absolutely depraved lives; that is the reason why the world is so full of misery and wickedness, and the Church so full of pettiness and malice.

Do not retire to rest this night till you have knelt before the God of your life and asked him, for his dear Son's sake, to forgive all your neglect, all your backsliding, all your wickedness. It may be the very saving of your soul. You will find an infinite blessedness in doing so. If you come to your Saviour, he will receive you graciously, he will love you freely.

Christ does not contemplate the possibility of a Christian who has ceased to pray; such a Christian is in God's sight no Christian; but he warns us of the other danger, that Satan, if he cannot divert our prayers, will do his utmost to pervert them. And on this head he gave two warnings: one against idle verbiage; the other against hypocritic formality. "In praying," he said, "use no vain repetitions, as the heathen do." The Hindoo fakir will spend all day in repeating over and over again the name of his deity. The Buddhist bonze thinks that there is salvation in the endless repetition of his magic formula. The Mussulman will interlard his commonest, and even his wickedest speech with endless parentheses of "God is great," "God is compassionate." The ignorant Romanist repeats his Aves and his Paters, dropping a bead with every Paternoster. God bears compassionately with our fooleries, but in itself this is mere stuttering, and the tumbling out of empty words. And at last prayer becomes degraded into a fetishistic mechanism, and the Tartar thinks that he offers so many thousand prayers with every clatter of his prayer-mill.

Few, very few—none but God's truest saints—can make long prayers; and when our Lord gave his model prayer, saying, "Thus pray ye," knowing our nature, knowing our sole capabilities, his model was brevity itself. Prayer is no bare huddle of ceremonies, or heaping up of formal words in empty churches. Be they hurriedly babbled, or be they unctuously droned, or be they pompously rolled forth, they may be no more than the idle speaking against which Christ warns us. Far better that our prayers should only occupy five minutes and be sincere, rising like incense through the golden censer of our one and only Priest, Christ Jesus, than that they should be a spiritless mummery, or that they should resemble the idle vaunt of the Pharisee,—a prayer with the strange fire of pride.

God will hear no wicked prayer. Men have been known to ask God for what they would not dare to ask men. The Hindoo Thug prays to his goddess that his murders may be accomplished. The Italian bandit thanks the Virgin for the success of his raid. In the heathen satirist, the hypocrite prays to Laverna that he may deceive successfully, and that man may think him holy and just. Against such prayers I need hardly warn you. They are as if a man offered swine's flesh upon the altar.

But we all need much more an earnest warning against selfish and earthly prayers. Of all the seven petitions of the Lord's Prayer, one only is for the simplest of earthly needs, and even in that the heavenly is mingled with the earthly. We may mention to God our earthly desires, but never without the two humble provisos: Only if it be good for me; only if it be Thy will.

"I have had excellent results from this Water in these affections, both in my own person and in the treatment of patients for whom I have prescribed it, Of course the remedial agent is its contained Alkalies and their solvent properties.

"Hence it is a prophylactic as well as a remedy in Nephritic Colic and forming Calculi, when due to a redundancy of Lithic Acid."

Professor of Anatomy and Dr. Wm. B. Towles, Materia Medica in the Medical Department of the University of Virginia, former Resident Physician, Hot Springs, Va., says:

"I feel no hesitancy whatever in saying that in Gout, Rheumatic Gout, Rheumatism, Stone in the Bladder, and in all Diseases of Uric Acid Diathesis. I know of no Remedy at all comparable to BUFFALO LIFHIA WATER.

"Its effects are marked in causing a disappearance of Albumen from the urine. In a single case of Bright's Disease of the Kidneys I witnessed decided beneficial results from its use, and from its action in this case I should have great confidence in it as a remedy in certain stages of this disease."

Resident Physician, Hot Springs, Ark., Surgeon (retired) U. S Navy, says:— The late Dr. Wm. F. Young Christian Soldiers.

Growth of the Boys' Brigade during the past year, reviewed by Secretary Girwin—Saving the Boys of America.

FEW movements in recent times have taken such a hold upon the affections of the young as the Boys' Brigade, whose wonderful history and development were recently described in an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Secretary Ernest A. Girwin, at the recent annual meeting of the Boys' Brigade Council, gave a very interesting review of the progress of the organization during the past year. He said:

"The Church of Christ, composed as she is of two elements, the human and divine, is adapting herself to existing conditions, and utilizing her boys and girls, her young men and young women, as she never dreamed of doing in the past. Hence we see the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, the Salvation Army, which is almost entirely youthful in its membership, and last but not least, the Boys' Brigade. The Church needs the boys as never before in her eventful history, and the boys in this time of transition, turmoil and temptation, must go down into the seething vortex of sin, without the help of the Church of the living God. And never before have the boys of godly parents been drifting away from all that is good and holy in as large numbers as now. The Sunday School loses its hold on the boy before he is out of his knickerbockers, and the devil had a thousand agencies with which to entrap him and by which to employ his restless energies in the destruction of himself and others.

"Just in this time of danger, the Boys' Brigade is raised up by the Almighty to save the boys, and our wonderful organization is demonstrating its ability under God so to do. Wherever it has had a fair chance, it has been a gratifying success. It furnishes legitimate and helpful avenues for all the overflowing energies of boyhood, and by its agency, churches in San Francisco, where a boy of twelve was a curiosity three or four years ago, are now the places where scores and hundreds of young men between fifteen and twenty spend a large portion of their leisure time, where they study the Bible, and listen to the preaching of the Gospel of Christ.

"Many difficulties have arisen during the past year to impede the progress of the organization, but it has triumphed over them all, and demonstrated its vitality by a marvelous growth. A year ago last July, the month in which the present statistical year began, there were only seventy-five enrolled companies in the United States, fifty-two of which were in California, four in Oregon and Washington, and nineteen in the Eastern States. Last July there were 217 companies enrolled, of which ninety-four were on the Pacific Coast and 123 companies in the East. There are now eighty-five companies in California alone, or ten more than there were in the entire country a year ago. Since July many additional companies have been enrolled, and the total number is 253, of which ninety-seven are on this coast and 156 in the Eastern States. It is probable that besides the companies enrolled, 100 others are in various stages of formation, and will soon connect themselves with the Boys' Brigade in the United States. An organization among the Baptists using our methods, and calling itself the Boys' Brigade, now numbers 100 companies. It began its existence less than a year ago. It is proper to state that this organization does not represent the Baptist Church in any exclusive sense, but that some of our most active and earnest workers are members of that denomination, among whom I may specially mention Dr. Charles B. Morrell, the Eastern Secretary, and Mr. Louis A. Holman, the Secretary of the First Massachusetts Battalion. A year ago there were only two battalions in our organization. To-day there are twelve or thirteen. The four leading denominations are represented in the Brigade numerically as follows: Presbyterians, 30 per cent., Congregationalists, 25, Methodists, 17, and Baptists, 16. From July, 1892, to July, 1893, we increased from 75 to 122 companies, or almost 300 per cent. If this ratio of growth is maintained, and I have no reason to doubt that it will be, we will have 450 companies by January, 1894, and nearly 700 by July of the same year. Assuming that 450 companies will be enrolled at the beginning of next year, we would then have a total membership of 14,400, and by October, 1894, the date of our next annual meeting, the same rate of increase would give a membership of [illegible]

"I am confident that with the advantages resulting from our reorganization, our growth in membership and value as an evangelizing agency among the boys will be much greater proportionately in the years to come than it has been in the past twelve months, and that if we are true to our sacred trust, the next century will dawn upon millions of American boys marching in the ranks of the Brigade, and acknowledging Christ as the great Captain of their salvation."

"YOU ARE JESUS PEOPLE."

Mrs. M. B. Ingalls, a Baptist missionary worker at Thongze, Burmah, relates the following incident: "It was the hot season in Burma when I went forth with a party of workers to the Leppadan district. There was no railroad then, and the distance of twelve miles was a rough cart trip, lasting from the hour of four P. M. to the next day at eight A. M." We were all bruised and tired. After our buffaloes were put out to feed, and the girls and boys were busy over the rice and curry pots, the preachers and Biblewomen gathered under and about my cart for prayer. Then we piled up our books and clothes for pillows, and closed our eyes for a little rest. The sound of voices fell upon my ears. I pulled my handkerchief over my face, and, looking out, saw a group of Burman men and a yellow-robed priest who stood wondering about the travellers. The girls told them who we were and the men replied: "'Oh! you are Jesus' people, the heretics,' and one of them, to show contempt spat upon the ground; but the priest shook his head at him, and I heard him say, 'I have read some of their books, and it is a good story if true.'

"A few months after that we went again, and then seventeen men and women were baptised in a little stream over which the Buddhist priests had made their vows to Gaudama. The friendly priest was there in a lay dress, but he was too proud to join that number in this rite, though he stood under my umbrella and looked into my hymn book and when we prayed he covered his face with his hands.

"'I'll wait a little,' he said, as we left the village; but the day came when he waited for us, and then it was a humble call, 'Let me pay my vows in the presence of these people.'"

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

THROUGH storm and sun, the age draws on
When heaven and earth shall meet,
For the Lord has said that glorious
He will make the place of his feet.
And the grass may die on the summer hills,
The flower fade by the river,
But our God is the same thro' end'ess years,
And his word shall stand forever.

"What of the night, O watchman Set to mark the dawn of day?"
"The wind blows fair from the morning star
And the shadows flee away.
Dark are the vales, but the mountains glow
As the light its splendor flings,
And the Sun of Righteousness comes up
With healing in his wings."

Shine on, shine on, O blessed Sun,
Through all the round of heaven,
Till the darkest vale and the farthest isle
Full to thy light are given;
Till the desert and the wilderness
As Sharon's plain shall be,
And the love of the Lord shall fill the earth
As the waters till the sea.

Jordan Water.

Owing to the approaching close of the World's Fair I offer for sale my stock of water from the sacred Jordan stream, rather than carry it back to Palestine.

Having had the pleasure some years ago of meeting both Dr. Talmage and Dr. Louis Klopsch at my bazaar in Jerusalem, the genuineness of the Jordan water is, in a measure at least, vouched for. Besides this, Consular certificates, fully bear out my claims in this respect. A nice glass-bottle bearing the sign of the Jerusalem Cross, and the words, "Jordan Water," blown into the glass, full of genuine Jordan Water, neatly and securely packed in a box, sent, all express charges prepaid by me, on receipt of fifty cents. I will send back your money if my stock is exhausted.

ELI BROWN.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

A Japanese Christian Worker.

Matsuna Okuno, a Noble Convert and his Labors for Christ among his Countrymen.

SOLDIER, Buddhist, scholar, and scion of a noble house, with every possible honor and distinction open to him in his native land, Matsuna Okuno, (whose portrait we publish on this page), has cast all ties, traditions and ambitions aside to become a follower of Jesus. His story is one of the most interesting and instructive that has ever come from the Gospel field in far Japan.

Matsuna was born in Yeddo in 1822, where his father was a military retainer of the Shogun.

MATSUNA OKUNO.

At an early age he was placed in a Buddhist temple to be educated, and he also studied Chinese classics to such good purpose that he won a special reward for scholarship. In 1867 he did valiant military service in the field against the Shogun's enemies, but the Shogun's cause was ultimately defeated. While Matsuna was meditating how he might restore his beloved master to power, he was advised by the Buddhist priests to fast, to bathe in ice-cold water, to sit naked on coarse straw mats, eat no rice, &c., besides which they sent him on a pilgrimage to a thousand temples and he employed others to visit fifteen thousand more on his behalf. Angry and disgusted at being constantly deceived he trampled on the sacred image of Buddha and, after reproaching the priest, began a career of dissipation that promised soon to end his life.

In the spring of 1871, he was introduced to Dr. Hepburn, who was seeking for just such an educated man as a helper in the preparation of his dictionary. Thus he was brought under Christian influences. By the instruction received from Dr. Hepburn, and the earnest preaching of Rev. Mr. Ballagh, he was at length led to feel that he was a sinner, and in need of the cleansing blood of Christ. Then, at the risk of his life, he made public profession of his faith, and was baptized in July, 1872. In September of the same year he began to assist Dr. Hepburn in the translation of the New Testament. As a superior penman, in preparing the first editions to be printed on blocks, and as a thorough and critical scholar, his services were invaluable. It was for some time impossible to find any one who would undertake the printing of the "Book of Jesus," as it was then contrary to the law to publish any work of that kind. But Mr. Okuno at length persuaded some one to cut the blocks and print them in secret, and if detected he was ready for either prison or death.

"During the absence of Dr. Hepburn in the United States,' writes Rev. H. Loomis in The Christian, "he became my teacher, and well do I remember saying to him one day, 'Are you not afraid of being arrested and punished for being a Christian and doing Christian work?' Drawing his finger across his neck in a significant way, he replied, 'They may cut off my head, but they cannot destroy my soul.' One day he brought with him a long roll of paper and held it up, saying, 'I have here the meaning of that hymn that we have been singing so long, and which we all liked so much, but which I have never before understood.' It was a literal translation of 'Jesus loves me,' which had become a general favorite on account of the tune. I think it was several days before we got it into suitable rhyme and metre; and as far as I know this was the beginning of Japanese hymnology. Encouraged by this effort, we went on and made translations of about fifteen more of the most familiar hymns, and they were published with the title, Oshe ho Uta, or religious hymns. This Mr. Okuno assisted to prepare. Several of the pieces were his own. About three years ago, a very complete and excellent hymn book was published, and is now used by the larger part of the Christians in Japan. Much of the work was done by Mr. Okuno.

When the committee for translating the New Testament into Japanese was appointed, Mr. Okuna was chosen as one of the assistants. He labored with diligence and success. At the close of the work, he moved to Tokyo and became pastor of one of the principal churches in that city. He has since filled various pastorates in Yokosuka, Mishima, and Osaka, with faithfulness and zeal. Now he is in charge of a new and important mission in Yokohama. Although more than seventy years old, he is full of energy and vigor, and rejoices in every opportunity to speak for his Lord and Master.

A SOURCE OF COMFORT AT DEATH

Robert Macdonald, D.D., an English preacher, used to tell the following incident: "An excellent man was asked to visit a poor dying sufferer. The messenger could give no account of the state of her mind, except that she was a very good woman, and was now at the end of a well-spent life, and therefore sure of going to heaven. He went, and, after a few kindly enquiries about her bodily condition, said, 'I have been told that you are in a very peaceful state of mind, depending upon a well-spent life.' The dying woman looked hard at him, and said, 'Yes, you are right. I am in the enjoyment of peace, sweet peace, and that from a well-spent life; but it is the well-spent life of Jesus—not my doings, but his; not my merits, but his blood.'" Thus believing, she passed away.

THE DRUSES OF PALESTINE.

Picturesque Peasants who Dwell in Villages Near Nazareth—Their Singular Dress and Peculiar Customs.

QUAINT as are the dress and customs of the people of Palestine to European or American eyes, there are in several parts of the Holy Land, little colonies dwelling apart, and whose daily lives and surroundings serve to perpetuate, in an even more remarkable degree, the ancient traditions and customs of their forefathers. To this peculiar class belong the Druses of Carmel and Lebanon, and also those who live in some of the villages or hamlets in the neighborhood of Nazareth. The two former have already been described in previous issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and today we present below an illustration showing a group of young Druse girls, photographed near Nazareth, during the recent journey of the editor and proprietor of this journal to Palestine. These young women differ in many respects from their Druse kinsfired who inhabit Mount Lebanon, and more particularly the southern part of it, the anti-Lebanon (Hermon) and the Hauran (Aurantis.) They do not veil their faces and they wear a peculiar white muslin head-dress, tied with narrow, black ribbon, while the maids and matrons of Lebanon never expose the features and use quite different head-gear. Indeed, so careful are the women of Lebanon in this respect, that whether sitting or walking or working, they are watchful of the coming of strangers and if a man appears, they instantly conceal their features, leaving only a single eye exposed.

A GROUP OF DRUSE WOMEN, NEAR NAZARETH

Very simple and inexpensive is the Druse woman's toilet, a single dress or robe serving its owner for two years. Usually, however, she has a dress for special occasions, such as festivals and the like, and this garment not infrequently lasts her a lifetime. The ordinary attire consists of a long white garment, over which is a graceful, loose flowing robe, gathered by a bright, varicolored sash of silk or Persian cashmere. Above the sash, at the waist, are rows of coins either of silver or gold, according to the social rank of the wearer. Shoes are rarely worn by the Druse peasant women, who think nothing of walking many miles barefoot. The body is unconfined by any of the devices known to civilization and the result is a symmetrical development and strong gracefully-proportioned frames such as are seen in the crowded cities of the western world. It frequently happens, however, that the Druse women of Syria of the better class, wear jewelry and other ornaments, which, though rudely made, are worth a considerable sum in the aggregate, but the peasants are satisfied with a simple ring of silver and earrings of the same material. A Druse lady of rank, the wife of an Emir (Prince) or a Bey or Sheikh, has the privilege of commanding any six women of the poorer class in her tribe to labor for her without pay, for a limited time; but such service rarely goes unrewarded, for, though money be scarce, the lady generally pays them liberally in cloth, grain or provisions.

Of late years, the Druse power and influence have greatly declined. They still cherish the old-time hatred against the Christians and their ancient pride and spirit of domination frequently break out in acts of oppression, wherever they are sufficiently numerous and influential to attempt such a course. Their religion is a mingling of Mohammedanism and Christianity, nature worship and sheer idolatry. They believe in soul-transmigration. Although they have no priests and make no prayers in public, they have buildings dedicated to the purpose of religious meditation. Some of the rites and mystic practices which they still observe are inheritances of ancient heathenism. Large numbers of the Druses are engaged in agriculture and cattle-raising, their tastes are warlike, and they do not hesitate at deeds of violence, although the dread of an authority that is sufficiently powerful to punish restrains them. History holds no darker page than the Druse plot for the utter extermination of every Christian in Hasbeiya, when nearly a thousand helpless and inoffensive victims were slaughtered. The persistent and sanguinary persecution of the Christians has been the means of subjecting the Druses to an enforced exile and ever since the massacre of 1860—after which the European powers intervened to protect the Christians—they have been alienated from their fellow-men and scattered over Syria, in punishment for their sins, being compelled to seek safety and seclusion in high plateaus and amid the mountain fastnesses.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

OBLIVION AND ITS DEFEATS.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Job. 24: 20: "He shall be no more remembered;" and Psalms 112: 6: "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance."

OBLIVION, and its Defeats, is my subject to-day. There is an old monster that swallows down everything. It crunches individuals, families, communities, states, nations, continents, hemispheres, worlds. Its diet is made up of years, of centuries, of ages, of cycles, of millenniums, of æons. That monster is called by Noah Webster and all the other dictionarians, Oblivion. It is a steep down which everything rolls. It is a conflagration in which everything is consumed. It is a dirge in which all orchestras play, and a period at which everything stops. It is the cemetery of the human race. It is the domain of forgetfulness. Oblivion! At times it throws a shadow over all of us, and I would not pronounce it to-day, if I did not come armed in the strength of the Eternal God on your behalf to attack it, to rout it, to demolish it.

Why, just look at the way the families of the earth disappear. For a while they are together, inseparable, and, to each other indispensable, and then they part. Some by marriage going to establish other homes, and some leave this life, and a century is long enough to plant a family, develop it, prosper it, and obliterate it. So the generations vanish. Walk up Broadway, New York, State Street, Boston, Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, The Strand, London, Princess Street, Edinburgh, Champs Elysees, Paris, Unter den Linden, Berlin, and you will meet in this year eighteen hundred and ninety-three not one person who walked there in the year seventeen hundred and ninety-three. What engulfment! All the ordinary efforts at perpetuation are dead failures. Walter Scott's "Old Mortality" may go round with his chisel to recut the faded epitaphs on tombstones, but Old Oblivion has a quicker chisel with which he can cut out a thousand epitaphs while "Old Mortality" is cutting in one epitaph. Whole libraries of biographies devoured of book-worms, or unread of the rising generations. All the signs of the stores and warehouses of great firms have changed, unless the grandsons think that it is an advantage to keep the old sign up, because the name of the ancestor was more commendatory than the name of the descendant. The city of Rome, Italy, stands to-day, but dig down deep enough, and you come to another Rome, buried, and go down still further, and you will find a third Rome. Jerusalem stands to-day, but dig down deep enough, and you will find a Jerusalem underneath, and go on and deeper down, a third Jerusalem. Alexandria, Egypt, on the top of an Alexandria, and the second on the top of the third. Many of the ancient cities are buried thirty feet deep, or fifty feet deep, or one hundred feet deep. What was the matter? Any special calamity? No. The winds and waves and sands and flying dust are all undertakers and grave-diggers, and if the world [illegible] lyn and New York and London, will have on top of them other Brooklyns and New Yorks and Londons, and only after digging and boring and blasting will the archæologist of far distant centuries come down as far as the highest spires and domes and turrets of our present American and European cities. Call the roll of the armies of Baldwin the First, or of Charles Martel, or of Marlborough, or of Mithridates, or of Prince Frederick, or of Cortez, and not one answer will you hear. Stand them in line and call the roll of the one million men in the army of Thebes. Not one answer. Stand them in line, the one million, seven hundred thousand infantry and the two hundred thousand cavalry of the Assyrian army under Ninus, and call the roll. Not one answer. Stand in line the one million men of Sesostris, the one million two hundred thousand men of Artaxerxes at Cunaxa, the two million, six hundred and forty-one thousand men under Xerxes at Thermopylæ, and call the long roll. Not one answer. At the opening of our Civil War, the men of the Northern and Southern armies were told that if they fell in battle, their names would never be forgotten by their country. Out of the million men who fell in battle or died in military hospitals, you cannot call the names of a thousand, nor the names of five hundred, nor the names of one hundred, nor the names of fifty. Oblivion! Are the feet of the dancers who at the ball of the Duchess of Richmond at Brussels the night before Waterloo all still? All still. Are all the ears that heard the guns of Bunker Hill all deaf? All deaf. Are the eyes that saw the coronation of George the Third all closed? All closed. Oblivion! A hundred years from now, there will not be a being on this earth that knew we ever lived

In some old family record a descendant studying up the ancestral line may spell out our name, and from the nearly faded ink, with great effort, find that some person by our name was born somewhere between 1810 and 1890, but they will know no more about us than we know about the color of a child's eyes born last night in a village in Patagonia. Tell me something about your great-grandfather. What were his features? What did he do? What year was he born? What year did he die? And your great-grandmother? Will you describe the style of the hat that she wore, and how did she and your great-grandfather get on in each other's companionship? Was it March weather or June? Oblivion! That mountain surge rolls over everything. Even the pyramids are dying. Not a day passes but there is chiseled off a chip of that granite. The sea is triumphing over the land, and what is going on at Coney Island is going on all around the world, and the continents are crumbling into the waves. And while this is transpiring on the outside of the world, the hot chisel of the internal fire is digging under the foundation of the earth and cutting its way out toward the surface. It surprises me to hear people say they do not think the world will finally be burned up, when all scientists will tell you that it has for ages been on fire. Why, there is only a crust between us and the furnaces inside raging to get out. Oblivion! The world itself will roll into it as easily as a schoolboy's india-rubber ball rolls down a hill, and when our world goes, it is so interlocked by the law of gravitation with other worlds that they will go too, and so far from having our memory perpetuated by a monument of Aberdeen granite in this world, there is no world in sight of our strongest telescope that will be a sure pediment for any slab of commemoration of the fact that we ever lived or died at all. Our earth is struck with death. The axle-tree of the constellations will break and let down the populations of other worlds. Stellar, lunar, solar mortality. Oblivion! It can swallow and will swallow whole galaxies of worlds as easily as a crocodile takes down a frog.

Yet oblivion does not remove or swallow anything that had better not be removed or swallowed. The old monster is welcome to his meal. This world would long ago have been overcrowded if not for the merciful removal of nations and generations. What if all the books had lived that were ever written and printed and published. The libraries would by their immensity have obstructed intelligence and made all research impossible. The fatal epidemic of books was a merciful epidemic. Many of the State and National libraries to-day are only morgues, in which dead books are waiting for someone to come and recognize them. What if all the people that had been born were still alive? We would have been elbowed by our ancestors of ten centuries ago, and people who ought to have said their last word three thousand years ago, would snarl at us, saying: "What are you doing here?" There would have been no room to turn around. Some of the past generations of mankind were not worth remembering. The first useful thing that many people did was to die; their cradle a misfortune and their grave a boon. This world was hardly a comfortable place to live in before the middle of the last century. So many things have come into the world that were not fit to stay in, we ought to be glad they were put out. The waters of Lethe the fountain of forgetfulness are a healthful draught. The history we have of the world in ages past is always one-sided and cannot be depended on. History is fiction illustrated by a few straggling facts. In all the Pantheon the weakest goddess is Clio, the goddess of History, and instead of being represented by sculptors as holding a scroll, might better be represented as limping on crutches. Faithful history is the saving of a few things out of more things lost. The immortality that comes from pomp of obsequies, or granite shaft, or building named after its founder, or page of recognition in some encyclopædia is an immortality unworthy of one's ambition, for it will cease, and is no immortality at all. Oblivion! A hundred years. But while I recognize this universal submergence of things earthly, who wants to be forgotten? Not one of us. Absent for a few weeks or months from home, it cheers us to know that we are remembered there. It is a phrase we have all pronounced: "I hope you missed me." Meeting some friends from whom we have been parted many years, we enquire: "Did you ever see me before?" and they say, "Yes," and call us by name, and we feel a delightful sensation thrilling through their hand into our hand, and running up from elbow to shoulder, and then parting, the one current of delight ascending to the brow and the other descending to the foot, moving round and round in concentric circles until every nerve and muscle and capacity of body and mind and soul is permeated with delight. A few days ago, visiting the place of my boyhood, I met one whom I had not seen since we played together at ten years of age, and I had peculiar pleasure in puzzling him a little as to who I was, and I can hardly describe the sensation, as, after awhile, he stumbled out: "Let me see. Yes, you are DeWitt." We all like to be remembered

Now, I have to tell you that this oblivion of which I have spoken has its defeats, and that there is no more reason why we should not be distinctly and vividly and gloriously remembered five hundred million billion trillion quadrillion quintillion years from now, than that we should be remembered six weeks. I am going to tell you how the thing can be done and will be done.

We may build this "everlasting remembrance," as my text styles it, into the supernal existence of those to whom we do kindnesses in this world. You must remember that this infirm and treacherous faculty which we now call memory is in the future state to be complete and perfect. "Everlasting remembrance!" Nothing will slip the stout grip of that celestial faculty. Did you help a widow pay her rent? Did you find for that man released from prison a place to get honest work? Did you pick up a child fallen on the curbstone, and, by a stick of candy put in his hand, stop the hurt on his scratched knee? Did you assure a business man, swamped by the stringency of the money market, that times would after awhile be better? Did you lead a Magdalen of the street into a midnight mission, where the Lord said to her: "Neither do I condemn thee. Go and sin no more?" Did you tell a man clear discouraged in his waywardness and hopeless and plotting suicide, that for him was nearby a laver, in which he might wash, and a coronet of eternal blessedness he might wear? What are epitaphs in graveyards, what are eulogiums in presence of those whose breath is in their nostrils, what are unread biographies in the alcoves of a city library compared with the imperishable records you have made in the illumined memories of those to whom you did such kindnesses? Forget them? They cannot forget them. Notwithstanding all their might and splendor, there are some things the glorified of heaven cannot do and this is one of them. They cannot forget an earthly kindness done. They have no cutlass to part that cable. They have no strength to hurl into oblivion that benefaction. Has Paul forgotten the inhabitants of Malta, who extended the island hospitality when he and others with him had felt, added to a shipwreck, the drenching rain and the sharp cold? Has the victim of the highwayman on the road to Jericho forgotten the Good Samaritan with a medicament of oil and wine and a free ride to the hostelry? Have the English soldiers who went up to God from the Crimean battlefields forgotten Florence Nightingale? Through all eternity, will the Northern and Southern soldiers forget the Northern and Southern women who administered to the dying boys in blue and gray after the awful fights in Tennessee and Pennsylvania and Virginia and Georgia, which turned every house and barn and shed into an hospital and incarnadined the Susquehanna and the James and the Chattahoochee and the Savannah with brave blood? The kindnesses you do to others will stand as long in the appreciation of others as the Gates of Heaven will stand, as the "House of Many Mansions" will stand, as long as the Throne of God will stand.

Another defeat of Oblivion will be found in the character of those whom we rescue, uplift or save. Character is eternal. Suppose by a right influence we aid in transforming a bad man into a good man, a dolorous man into a happy man, a disheartened man into a courageous man, every stroke of that work done will be immortalized. There may never be so much as one line in a newspaper regarding it, or no mortal tongue may ever whisper it into human ear, but wherever that soul shall go, your work upon it shall go, wherever that soul rises, your work on it will rise, and so long as that soul will last, your work on it will last. Do you suppose there will ever come such an idiotic lapse in the history of that soul in heaven that it shall forget that you invited him to Christ, that you, by prayer or Gospel word, turned him round from the wrong way to the right way? No such insanity will ever smite a heavenly citizen. It is not half as well on earth known that Christopher Wren planned and built St. Paul's, as it will be known in all heaven that you were the instrumentality of building a temple for the sky. We teach a Sabbath class, or put a Christian tract in the hand of a passerby, or testify for Christ in a prayer-meeting, or preach a sermon, and go home discouraged, as though nothing had been accomplished, when we had been character-building with a material that no frost or earthquake or rolling of the centuries can damage or bring down. There is no sublimer art on earth than architecture. With pencil and rule and compass, the architect sits down alone and in silence, and evolves from his own brain a cathedral or a national capitol or a massive home before he leaves that table, and then he goes out and unrolls his plans, and calls carpenters and masons and artisans of all sorts to execute his design, and when it is finished he walks around the vast structure, and sees the completion of the work with high satisfaction, and on a stone at some corner of the building the architect's name may be chiseled. But the storms do their work, and Time, that takes down everything will yet take down that structure, until there shall not be one stone left upon another. But there is a soul in heaven. Through your instrumentality it was put there. Under God's grace you are the architect of its eternal happiness. Your name is written, not on one corner of its nature, but inwrought into its every fibre and energy. Will the storms of winter wash out the story of what you have wrought upon that spiritual structure? No. There are no storms in that land and there is no winter. Will time wear out the inscription which shows your fidelity? No. Time is past and it is an Everlasting Now. Built into the foundation of that imperishable structure, built into its pillars, built into its capstone, is your name, either the name you have on earth or the name by which celestials shall call you. I know the Bible says in one place that God is a jealous God, but that refers to the work of those who worship some other god. A true father is not jealous of his child. With what glee you show the picture your child penciled, or a toy ship your child hewed out, or recite the noble deed your child accomplished, and God never was jealous of a Joshua, never was jealous of a Paul, never was jealous of a Frances Havergal, never was jealous of a man or woman who tried to heal wounds and wipe away tears and lift burdens and save souls, and while all is of grace, and your self-abnegating utterance will be, "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name, Oh, Lord, give glory!" you shall always feel a heavenly satisfaction in every good thing you did on earth, and if iconoclasm, borne from beneath, should break through the Gates of Heaven and efface one record of your earthly fidelity, methinks Christ would take one of the nails of his own Cross and write somewhere on the crystal or the amethyst or the jacinth or the chrysoprasus your name, and just under it the inscription of my text: "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance." Oh, this character building! You and I are every moment busy in that tremendous occupation. You are making me better or worse, and I am making you better or worse, and we shall, through all eternity, bear the mark of this benediction or blasting. Let others have the thrones of heaven, those who have more mightily wrought for God and the truth, but it will be heaven enough for you and me if ever and anon we meet some radiant soul on the boulevards of the Great City who shall say: "You helped me once. You encouraged me when I was in earthly struggle. I do not know that I would have reached this shining place had it not been for you," and we will laugh with heavenly glee, and say, "Ha! ha! Do you really remember that talk? Do you remember that warning? Do you remember that Christian invitation? What a memory you have! Why, that must have been down there in Brooklyn or New Orleans at least ten thousand million years ago." And the answer will be, "Yes, it was as long as that, but I remember it as well as though it were yesterday." Oh, this character building! The structure lasting independent of passing centuries, independent of crumbling mausoleums, independent of the whole planetary system. Aye, if the material universe, which seems all bound together like one piece of machinery, should some day meet with an accident that should send worlds crashing into each other like telescoped railway trains, and all the wheels of constellations and galaxies should stop, and down into one chasm of immensity all the suns and moons and stars should tumble like the midnight express at Ashtabula, that would not touch us, and would not hurt God, for God is a spirit, and character and memory are immortal, and over that grave of a wrecked material universe might truthfully be written: "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance." Oh, Time, we defy thee! Oh, Death, we stamp thee in the dust of thine own sepulchres! Oh, Eternity, roll on till the last star has stopped rotating and the last sun is extinguished on the sapphire pathway, and the last moon has illumined the last night, and as many years have passed as all the scribes that ever took pen could describe by as many figures as they could write in all the centuries of all time, but thou shalt have no power to efface from any soul in glory the memory of anything we have done to bring it to God and heaven.

There is another, and a more complete defeat for Oblivion, and that is, in the heart of God Himself. You have seen a sailor roll up his sleeve and show you his arm tattooed with the figure of a favorite ship, perhaps the first one in which he ever sailed. You have seen a soldier roll up his sleeve and show you his arm tattooed with the figure of a fortress where he was garrisoned or the face of a great General under whom he fought. You have seen many a hand tattooed with the face of a loved one before or after marriage. This tattooing is almost as old as the world. It is some colored liquid punctured into the flesh so indelibly that nothing can wash it out. It may have been there fifty years, but when the man goes into his coffin, that picture will go with him on hand or arm. Now, God says that He has tattooed us upon His hands. There can be no other meaning in the Forty-ninth chapter of Isaiah, where God says: "Behold, I have graven thee on the palms of My hands." It was as much as to say, "I cannot open My hand to help, but I think of you. I cannot spread abroad My hands to bless, but I think of you. Wherever I go up and down the heavens I take these two pictures of you with Me. They are so inwrought into My being that I cannot lose them. As long as My hands last, the memory of you will last. Not on the back of My hands, as though to announce you to others, but on the palms of My hands for Myself to look at and study and love. Though I hold the winds in My fist, no cyclone shall uproot the inscription of your name and your face, and though I hold the ocean in the hollow of My hand, its billowing shall not wash out the record of My remembrance. 'Behold I have graven thee on the palms of My hands.'" What joy, what honor can there be comparable to that of being remembered by the mightiest and most affectionate being in the universe. Think of it, to hold an everlasting place in the heart of God. The heart of God! The most beautiful palace in the universe. Let the archangel build some palace as grand as that if he can. Let him crumble up all the stars of yesternight and to-morrow night, and put them together as mosaics for such a palace floor. Let him take all the sunrises and sunsets of all the days, and the auroras of all the nights, and hang them as upholstery at its windows. Let him take all the rivers and all the lakes and all the oceans, and toss them into the fountains of this palace court. Let him take all the gold of all the hills and hang it in its chandeliers, and all the pearls of all the seas and all the diamonds of all the fields, and with them arch the doorways of that palace: and then invite into it all the glories that Esther ever saw at a Persian banquet, or Daniel ever walked amongst in Babylonian castles, or Joseph ever witnessed in Pharaoh's throne-room, and then yourself enter this castle of archangelic construction, and see how poor a palace it is compared with the greater palace that some of you have already found in the heart of a loving and pardoning God and into which all the music and all the prayers and all the sermonic considerations of this day are trying to introduce you through the blood of the Slain Lamb.

They Ministered to the Blue and the Gray.

Oh, where is Oblivion now? From the dark and overshadowing word that it seemed when I began, it has become something which no man or woman or child who loves the Lord need ever fear. Oblivion defeated. Oblivion dead. Oblivion sepulchred. But I must not be so hard on that devouring monster, for into its grave go all our sins when the Lord for Christ's sake has forgiven them. Just blow a resurrection trumpet over them when once Oblivion has snapped them down. Not one of them rises. Blow again. Not a stir amid all the pardoned iniquities of a life-time. Blow again! Not one of them moves in the deep grave trenches. But to this powerless resurrection trumpet a voice responds half human, half divine, and it must be part man and part God, saying: "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Thank God for this blessed Oblivion! So you see I did not invite you down into a cellar, but up on a throne, not into the graveyard to which all materialism is destined, but into a garden all a-bloom with everlasting remembrance. The frown of my first text has become the kiss of the second text. Annihilation has become coronation. The wringing hands of a great agony have become the clapping hands of a great joy. The Requiem with which we began has become the Grand March with which we close. The tear of sadness that rolled down our cheek has struck the lip on which sits the laughter of eternal triumph.

THE CHRISTIAN HOME.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 26. Col. 3: 12-25. Golden Text, Ps. 101: 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A MAN'S home generally reveals what kind of man he is. There are houses where everything in the house says: God is here. You see he is the Alpha and Omega, the real Owner and Master of the house. You see that all things are arranged and ordered for his name and for his glory. He is consulted in the hours which are kept, his worship and the remembrance of him takes precedence of all else: the morning hour with the Lord of each dweller in the house must never be interfered with, family worship must always have its place, God is consulted in every perplexity, he consoles in every grief, the remembrance of him sanctifies every coming together of the members of the family for meal times, for conversation, for work; the books, the furniture, the pictures, and above all, the habits of those who dwell there, say: God is here. Such is a true Christian home. Such a house David declared his should be when he said: "I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way . . . I will with a perfect heart." There are homes where everything speaks of man. The furniture tells how rich he is, the pictures tell what a taste he has for art, the formality tells of his self-importance; nothing says to a visitor: "You are welcome;" everything says: "Take notice of me and mine. Such a home is without comfort, for it is without God. All Satan's rage is concentrated against a truly godly home; he knows the power of its witness for the Lord. Any one who knows the Lord can be pious and devout, and filled with a heavenly experience in meetings, when the atmosphere is heavenly, but he may be simply carried along with the real experience of others till he imagines he is even as they. It is in the house, the home life, that our knowledge of God is put to a real test: it is there that we are seen as we really are, there where all our weak points are known, there where every room has associations of past failures, and every person knows our worst side, there is the place where the true life of Jesus in us has opportunity for exercise, and where God can gain his highest victories. No wonder David's Psalms come with such divine power to us even after three thousand years: it had been his aim to walk within his house with a perfect heart, and where the fire was hottest the Lord's gold came forth.

It is in contact with others that the self-life or the Christ-life comes out. At home, where we are constantly in contact with the same persons, and those most intimately connected with us, our real inner life is manifest. And yet to how many it seems just in the home life so impossible to serve God. It seems as though just there one were not understood, just there all one's spiritual life were crushed, just there everything combines to make our service of God and our witness for Christ impossible. Why? Can it be that all those things so apparently adverse, "work together for good to them that love God, to them [illegible]" Yes, it is just this apparent impossibility which calls for the exercise of faith, and which is the [illegible] for our education; he has measured and [illegible] hindrance, and provides grace for all.

The apostle Paul has just been saying to those who were raised together with Christ "by faith in the operation of God who raised [illegible] Ye [illegible] life is hid with Christ in God. Ye have put off the old man with his deeds . . . and ye [illegible] forbearing one another and forgiving each another, if any man have a complaint against any; even as the Lord forgave you, so also do ye." (R.V.) This is a rule for the Church of Christ, but therefore, very specially the rule for every Christian household. Yet how impossible, except we have in very deed put on the new man! No home can be a truly Christian home except Christ dwell in the members of that home, and his presence is known by

A Heart of Compassion."

Job's three friends were "miserable comforters," "physicians of no value," because as soon as their own self life was touched, they were eager to prove Job in the wrong. But when Elihu came it was in another spirit with "a heart of compassion." "My terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee;" "If thou hast anything to say, answer, speak, for I desire to justify thee." Elihu's object was not to prove that he himself was in the right; he only wanted to serve Job, to help him out of his trouble. But a "heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, long suffering," are not fruits which grow in fallen human nature; they cannot take root until we have "put off the old man," i. e., parted definitely and for ever with all we are, and with all we hope for from ourselves. Such fruits are fruits of the Spirit born in a heart and life which is given up to the blessed Spirit's discipline; and where he can produce such fruits in home life there is an undeniable witness for the Master worth years of preaching.

And let the peace of Christ rule (or arbitrate) in your hearts, to which also ye were called in one body. Every home life is or may be a picture in miniature of the Church and Body of Christ. We are called to give up all weapons in words, deeds, even looks and tones, and accept arbitration from him who has slain enmity by the blood of his cross. But only as "one body," only in our relations to our fellow members can the peace of Christ be more to us than a name. Thus, in a home life, we only have the privilege as members one of another to and decide every question which arises between man and wife, brother and sister, parent and child, mistress and servant. Where all are subject to Christ and all yield to him in yielding to one another, what a blessed consciousness of the presence of God is in that home! The peace of God arbitrates as we become subject to the Word of God. "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom." If it only finds a place in the thoughts and intellect, that is no dwelling richly in all wisdom; it is when it is translated into our very life, and we become samples of all we understand, that the Word has found a dwelling-place in us; and then, when we come together, instead of foolish, light, meaningless or unkind conversation, the fount within us finds egress, we teach and admonish one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in our heart to the Lord. Every Scripture which takes hold of, and conquers us, becomes a new song in the heart for it makes God real to us in a new light. And whatsoever ye do in word or deed do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks unto God and the Father by him. It is a true fruit of putting off the old man and putting on the new when the name of Christ really takes the place of our own name in our lives. O, the suffering which many pass through on account of their exceeding sensitiveness to their own name, and to all which touches them; O, how often they imagine that others are alluding to them in conversation, are meaning them in their prayers, are disparaging them in some remark which they make, and all the time they have never so much as crossed the mind of the persons they believe to be so occupied with them! Family life is often troubled by the presence of Self Occupied Spirits.

[illegible] all [illegible] morbid thoughts and feelings is to do all in the name of the Lord Jesus. If once we learn from his cross the deep shame which we have brought upon him, we shall be deeply grateful if we may but hide away our own name and our own self life altogether under the shadow and shelter of his holy name. All sensitiveness to our own selves and that which touches us arises from pride and self-importance, it is a root of bitterness which can only spread evil in family or in church life. Whenever we learn to do all in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, we learn at the same time to give thanks to God and the Father through him, thanks that we are permitted to do all in his name, that we have his sanction and his authority in all we do.

How have we put off the old man if we do as we should, have done before our conversion? Yield to God, and wonderful victories will be the result.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A SCENE IN COLOSSÆ.

THE circumstances of the church at Colossæ had much to do with the character of the letter Paul wrote to it. The city was one of three, standing near together on the banks of the River Lycus in Asia Minor. The other two were Hierapolis and Laodicea. Paul had never visited Colossæ during his missionary journeys, although it was but a short distance from Ephesus, where he stayed three years. Doubtless, he was indirectly its founder, as it must have been organized by men who had been won by his preaching. While the apostle was a prisoner in Rome, he was visited by Epaphras, who came from that church and was perhaps its pastor. From him Paul learned that affairs at Colossæ were not in a healthy condition. Some teacher was there whom Paul refers to, but does not mention by name, who was beguiling, deluding, or spoiling the members of the church. We get an idea, from Paul's remarks, of the character of this man's teaching. It was a curious compound of mysticism and asceticism, very much like some of the teaching popular in our day. A humorous divine likens it to a lady whose head is in the clouds and her feet in the mud. Speculation as to the existence of angels and as to abstruse doctrines occupied the mind and close observance of forms and ceremonies and a dependence on them for salvation, animated the conduct. The natural result of these doctrines, if not checked, would be an unpractical, lifeless religion. And so it proved. The message of Christ (Rev. 3: 24-22) to the sister church at Laodicea shows this result there and probably her neighbor, Colossæ, was in similar evil case. Paul writes this letter to counteract this false teaching. He begins by showing in a very adroit way, how the disposition to discover hidden, heavenly mysteries was satisfied by Christianity. Instead of forbidding them to indulge the disposition, he turns it into a new channel. The mystery of Christ's previous existence was a better subject for their thoughts, and he treats it as it is more fully revealed in the Gospel according to John. Then he deals in detail with the errors which, as Epaphras has told him, were being preached at Colossæ. Finally he brushes contemptuously aside all this talk about the importance of meats and drinks and holy days and shows them that religion consists in none of these things, but in a pure, humble and beneficent life. In every relation and in every sphere, no matter how lowly, the Christ life may be lived; not by the observance of days, of diet, or of rites or ceremonies, but by becoming more gentle, more tender and more dutiful. Every generation needs to be reminded of this fact, for there is a perpetual tendency to substitute creed and outward worship for duty and right conduct. It is from this section of the epistle that the subject of the lesson is taken.

Forbearing one another. A workingman and his wife who had often quarrelled determined to make an effort to live peaceably. They noticed that the quarrels occurred when one of them was in a ruffled state of mind and could not bear words which at another time would give no offence. But how was either of them to know that the other was in an irritated state? They agreed that when the man was in that condition he should wear his cap aside when he entered his home and that his wife, when in a like state should pin up the corner of her apron. One day the husband came home with the danger signal set. He looked surly and ill-tempered. He looked around and said nothing. Presently his wife entered the room and noticed his cap awry. His eye also caught sight of the appointed signal on her apron. He saw at once that this was a bad day to be out of humor. It would not do for both to be in a bad state at the same time. He turned round and put his cap straight. The same thought had crossed his wife's mind and when he looked at her again the corner of her apron had been unpinned. Both laughed and on that day there was no need for unusual forbearance on either side.

Forgiving one another. Very often a quarrel comes from one person quickly resenting some hasty utterance of another, which if no notice were taken of it at the time would be repented of. We do not know, when some person speaks angrily, how much he may be suffering from some physical or mental irritant. We do not resent the speeches of an insane person, or a drunken man because we are aware he does not know what he is saying, and a similar allowance would often be made for another man if we knew his circumstances. In a recent number of the Century magazine the experience of a pearl-diver is related. He says that under water the temper is strangely affected. A man at the bottom of the sea becomes irritable and flies into a passion at the most trifling annoyance. On several occasions the life-line being too light or too slack or some imaginary wrong-doing on the part of the men in the vessel above him has so excited him, that he has given the signal to pull-up, fully intending to visit the offender with severe punishment. When he has risen to the surface, the anger has totally disappeared and he has forgotten what he came up for. He thinks the irritation under water is due to the pressure of air inside the diving-dress affecting the lungs and through them the brain. Allowance has to be made for the man under water and it should be made for others who are affected by other circumstances.

Charity, which is the bond of perfectness. He is a disagreeable person who is fond of detecting and pointing out the faults of others. We ought to think the best and put the most charitable construction on the words and conduct of every one. A painter was engaged upon a likeness of Alexander the Great. In the course of his battles, Alexander had received an ugly scar on the side of his face. The artist was desirous of giving a correct likeness of the monarch, at the same time desirous of hiding the scar. It was a difficult task to accomplish. At length he hit upon a happy expedient. He painted him in a reflective attitude, his hand placed against his head, whilst his finger covered the scar. Let us put the finger of charity upon the scar of the Christian as we look at him, whatever it may be—the finger of a tender and forbearing charity, and see in spite of it and under it the image of Christ notwithstanding.

Ye are called in one body. The most insignificant Christian does well and has Christ's approval if he does his duty faithfully, however inconspicuous it may be. He is part of the one body which would be perfect if each member did its proper work. A young bugler in the French army lay on his narrow bed in the camp hospital, mortally wounded. The commander, passing from bed to bed, to speak a kind word to each occupant, paused by the little bugler, and laid a cool hand on his fevered brow. "Oh, General," said the little fellow, "if only I were a man, I might have helped to win the battle yesterday." "Win the battle!" he replied, "why, without your aid we should never have won the day: though your duty seemed so simple and insignificant, I could not have done without you."

Ye serve the Lord Christ. This fact dignifies all labor. If we remember that in doing our duty faithfully we are serving and honoring him, we shall never be ashamed of a lowly occupation. In one of Murillo's pictures in the Louvre, he shows us the interior of a convent kitchen; but those who are doing the work are not mortals in old dresses, but beautiful angels. One is putting the kettle on the fire to boil, and one is lifting up a pail of water, and one is at the kitchen-dresser lifting up for plates. The painter depicts every one as so busy, and working with such a will, that you forget pans are pans and pots are pots, and think only of the angels and of the work they are ennobling in the doing of it.

On The Blue Atlantic.

A Restful Voyage—Choppy Seas and Mal de-Mer—Pleasant Acquaintanceships.

FROM mid-ocean—seemingly in the very centre of the solemn round of the great, shining sea—I send back greetings to the readers with whom I hope to hold regular intercourse during the coming winter.

As far as the eye can reach nothing is to be seen from the steamer-deck but this same ocean, dark blue, except where the sun lays a broad roadway for himself, as he mounts the heavens, and the pale sky that stoops to the water-line of the horizon.

Nothing in life is, to my imagination, so like dying as an ocean voyage. The friends left on shore, straining their eyes for a last glimpse of faces beloved, the slow, silent outmooring of the vessel into the trackless main, the all-aloneness of the voyager, cut off utterly for days from communication with the world in which he has lived and loved and toiled and suffered, are suggestive images of the flight of the soul from the body and the sphere in which the body has borne it company.

I turn the thought over, dreamily and not unhappily, in my mind, lying here in my steamer-chair, folded in soft wraps from the morning freshness of the sea-wind, the sunlight warm upon my feet, and the strange consciousness upon me that there is absolutely nothing to do, all day long, but to look and dream, and rest.

"It is like the time for which the New England farmer's wife prayed, in dying," I say to Alcides, whose length of young limbs is stretched out in an adjoining chair, "'I don't feel to have strength enough to hold a harp, much less to play on it, even if I knew how,' she said to her minister. 'I've done my own wash for nigh upon forty years, and I'd take it as a great mercy if the dear Lord would let me lie still in my grave for a couple of hundred years, or so, and get real rested out.' I know how the poor, nerve-wearied, over-taxed creature felt. I wish she could be here now."

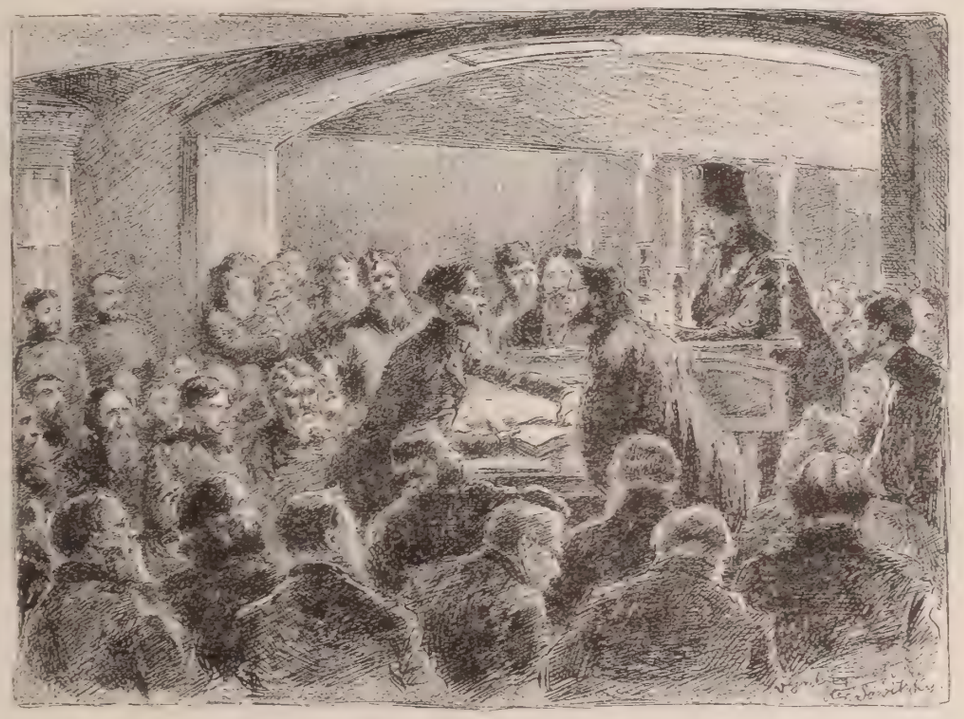
Alcides lifts his lazy eyelids. He has been asleep for the past hour.

"Nothing like it!" he responds drowsily.

Nobody cares to converse during the early half of the voyage when the voyagers are Americans. Whether we know it or not, the high pressure of our daily living keeps up the system, mental and physical, to its utmost powers of endurance. I doubt if one of the hundreds of native-born passengers, lounging within my sight, has ever known on shore, since his or her childhood, such entireness of healing inaction as we must, perforce, enjoy until we sight the other shore. I was reading the other day a treatise upon "The Technique of Rest." It can be practiced nowhere else, in such perfection, as on shipboard.

For two days we had a chopping sea, and the inevitable accompaniment of sea-sickness for those who can be sea-sick. (Some happy mortals cannot.) The philosophical voyager is not what old-fashioned folk call "heart-sick," even under this infliction. The suffering is temporary and seldom, if ever, attended with danger. A little patience, a good deal of resolution in the determination to get into the air and hold the dumb mania at arms' length until the oxygen, strengthened by a thousand mile rush across the salt waves, can take hold of the frightened diaphragm—and the victory is won. It gives me sincere gratification to say that if sea-sickness is tolerable anywhere, and in any circumstances, it must be on this good steamship New York of the American line. From the moment in which the smitten creature retreats, in more or less confusion, to her (I use the feminine pronoun advisedly) state-room, to the happier moment when she is assisted, faint, but approaching convalescence, into her deck-chair to have the cure completed by the sea-air—benevolent ingenuity is racked to render her condition tolerable. The state rooms ventilated by electric fans, have nothing of the dead, emphatic odor that in former years, was an added terror of sea-sickness. The little Scotch widow who is nominally stewardess, virtually, the good genius of the prostrate sufferer, slips in and out of the sick room, gentle of voice and touch, comely to the eye, and tactful in ministration. "I'm thinking madam," I heard her say, the other night to a pale shape, laid with folded hands and weary eyes within her berth, "that if you would allow me to bring you, instead of gruel, a bit of cold chicken minced up fine by myself, that you wouldn't have to cut at all, and a morsel of cool celery with a pinch of salt—you'll find it more heartening-like than so many slops."

An hour later, a stronger voice than had yet proceeded from the berth greeted the stewardess's next visit.



A Night Debate Between Russo-Greek Priests and Stundists.
After a Drawing from life by the Russian Artist, Savitsky.

"I am better already. I really think that I can get on deck if you will help me rise."

As a practical woman, I made a mental note of the prescription and the result. As a candid woman, I marvelled that it had not sooner occurred to me, as to the other victim of the chopping sea, that food which must be masticated, by exciting the salivary glands to action, tends to stimulate the digestive organs. I pass on the incident for the benefit of women who suffer from sea sickness, and the scarcely less grevious malady of "car-sickness." Force yourself to eat something that must be chewed.

"I lie still from the beginning to the end of the voyage, only lifting my head to have a gruel poured between my lips," said a woman who had "crossed" six times. In the light of my discovery, I comprehend now why she lay still so long.

Once on deck, every kindly human agency supplements the glorious air of heaven—"a whole skyful of it," as I heard a four-year-old describe it—in hastening on the work of renovation. Everybody is glad to see the convalescent "up again."

The clever young artist who is bound for Algeria and Arabia, strolling by arm-in-arm with a college athlete, lifts his cap to hope smilingly that "the air"—always spoken of as if there was no other—"will soon bring her up again;" the prettiest girl on board brings a rose, not fairer than her blooming face, and says, "We are all so glad to see you among us once more;" the red-faced, white-whiskered Englishman returning from "the Fair—don't ye know?"—assures the woman from "the States," whose name he does not and never will know, that "you are not looking so badly knocked up as might be expected, don't you know, now?" The distinguished American Divine, now a London pastor, whose brown travelling suit, yachting cap and red necktie scandalize the comically inclined, proffers a cluster of just six big purple grapes—one more would have discouraged appetite—and affirms, with authority, "They will taste good!" And the purser, who is acting host of the big vessel, kind-eyed, frank of face, with a ring in his pleasant voice that is a cordial only second in efficacy to "the Air,"—actually shakes hands with the pale passenger in the genuineness of his satisfaction.

"You have moral courage, you see," he goes on to say. "That's nine-tenths of the battle. Resist seasickness and it will flee from you."

At 11 A. M. the deck stewards run swiftly to and fro with trays. One notices, as she has leisure to note and be amused at trifles here, that both are red-haired. Both are alike, alert, quiet and attentive. Beef-tea, smoking hot, with sandwiches, thin slices of brown-bread-and-butter, are passed. I recall, gratefully, as I take my cup, how on the first day of my re-appearance upon deck after my brief turn of sea-unworthiness, I had gone to the windward side of the boat, upon Alcides' arm to see a far-off steamship, and an Englishwoman, who had seemed precise and formal from a distance, came through the upper cabins, all the way across to us to say—"I beg your pardon, but I have taken the liberty of crossing to tell you that they are serving beef-tea on the other side, and I though that you might feel the need of it."

Decidedly, the sea-voyage promotes the growth of all sweet and pleasant graces. Another reason why a busy people should make it a frequent indulgence.

Still dreamily, and still happily, I think of the many old friends, and the many more new to whom these "Familiar Talks" of mine will convey "Kodak" glimpses of the scenes through which, if God will, I shall pass before my feet again press the dearest and best land upon this dear and good earth of ours.

I am blessed in being so well-informed as to the readers of what I mean to make as easy and chatty, as graphic and as sympathetic as pen-and-ink communications can be. I know into what manner of homes they will go. May I ask in each of the thousands of these Christian homes a corner in the heart, as well as a place in the head, and above all, that now and then, my name may be breathed in the prayer that goes up for those who travel by sea and by land?

Religious Debates in Russia.

The Public Discussions of Religious Doctrine in Russia between Priests and Stundists.

RECENT reports from Russia have referred to public discussions between the priests of the Russo-Greek Church and the leaders of the Stundists. People familiar with the religious situation in Russia have been sceptical as to these discussions, knowing well how carefully the Stundists avoid publicity, especially such as will attract the attention of the church. It appears, however, that the discussions do take place and are arousing much interest. In Moscow they are held in the Kasitsin House which is situated in the quarter of the city where Stundists are numerous. The scene at these meetings is a strange one. On this page is a picture from the original, drawn from life, by the celebrated Russian painter, Savitzky, of one of these meetings. The room in which they are held is low and long. Near the centre is an arched projection, on one side of which is a rostrum for the president and his colleagues. Father Tikhon a leading divine of Moscow usually presides, and he is accompanied by some younger men, who are scholars and experienced debaters. Massive candlesticks stand on the rostrum, from which the light of candles is shed on the table, where theological works are piled for use in the debate. It is an unequal combat, as a rule, for the Stundists are poor and unlearned, while the priests have been well-taught. In Biblical knowledge, however, the priests are no match for the Stundists who are emphatically men of the one book. In the picture, a Stundist is insisting on a passage from the Bible being the final authority on the point in dispute.

The Stundists now number about 200,000 in all Russia, including those who have been sent to Siberia and the Caucasus to serve out their sentences for heresy. There are many who have thus suffered, though they are generally accused of some other offence at their trial, so as to bring them under the civil law. It is not difficult to do this because it is a statutable offence under Russian law for the members of any church besides the national church to make converts. The Russian Government boasts that there is religious liberty for all sects in Russia, and it is so; but every convert from the Greek Church to the Stundist faith is a source of peril to the congregation he joins. A recent letter from a Russian Stundist explains how these unusual debates have occurred. It is, he says, a common practice for the priests to enter any house in which a Stundist meeting is being held and controvert the teaching of the preacher. They usually come in late in the evening and the debates are continued to a late hour. Out of these informal discussions have developed the larger assemblages in the Kasitsin House and other places.

The audiences generally include merchants, peasants and office-holders of all classes, many of them belonging to the national Church, as well as a fair proportion of Stundists. The debate is free to all and ranges over the whole field of Christian doctrine. It is followed with keen interest by the audience; and the police officers, who are always in attendance, watch the signs of sympathy in the various faces, with a few to future legal proceedings. The impression cannot be eradicated from the official mind that disloyalty to the church must be associated with disloyalty to the Czar. As a matter of fact, however, the Czar has no subjects more loyal, or more law-abiding than he has in the Stundists.

PUBLISHER'S ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD PREMIUMS.

TO old and new subscribers for the coming year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes the following valuable Premium offers:

Premium Offer Number One, for $2.

To any person sending two dollars we will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and a beautiful cloth and gilt copy of Dr. Talmage's latest work:

"FROM MANGER TO THRONE,"

a book which has never been offered at less than $3.75. This remarkable book, which is pre-eminently the book of the century, contains 544 large pages, is bound in rich cloth and gold, with over 200 superfine illustrations, and measures, when open, from tip to tip, 9 x 15 inches. It is a most extraordinary book, and from cover to cover a veritable picture gallery, full of delightful surprises. It is printed from large type on toned paper and handsomely bound in cloth and gilt and has heretofore never been offered at less than $3.75. Besides being a new life of the Saviour, it contains Dr. Talmage's characteristic account of his journey "To, through, and from the Holy Land," in which he practically brings Palestine to the very doors of the multitudes who may never see the Christ-land in any other way. Many of the illustrations are from photographs taken by Dr. Talmage's party. One of these represents Dr. Talmage baptizing a candidate in the Jordan, another shows him tasting the waters of the Dead Sea, and in still another, we see him on the back of a huge camel traveling in Egypt. This offer was made possible only by Dr. Talmage's generous action in waiving all rights to royalty on such copies of "From Manger to Throne" as are sent to subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; and undoubtedly tens of thousands will avail themselves of this exceptional opportunity to secure a beautiful copy, either to enrich their own libraries, or to present to some friend.

If you select this Premium, be sure to mention Premium Offer Number One. We prepay all express charges.

Concerning "From Manger to Throne," Dr. Talmage, explaining under what circumstances it was written, says:

"In my American home, on the Atlantic, on the Mediterranean, on camel-back, on muleback, on horseback, under chandelier, by dim candle in tent, on Lake Galilee, in convent, at Bethel where Jacob's pillow was stuffed with dreams and the angels of the ladder landed; at the brook Elah, from which little David picked up the ammunition of five smooth stones, four more than were needed for crushing like an egg-shell the skull of Goliath; in the valley of Ajalon, over which, at Joshua's command, astronomy halted; and with my hand mittened from the storm, or wet from the Jordan, or bared to the sun, or gliding over smooth table, this book has been written."

Premium Offer Number Two, for $2.

This year we are offering, to old and new subscribers alike, the handsomest Teacher's Bible, in ruby type ever placed on the market. For $2 we will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and a beautiful with all the helps, illustrated, and bound in soft, flexible leather, with overlapping edges, and book-mark. The red-under-gold edges give this handsome Bible a remarkably rich and elegant appearance. This Bible contains, in addition to the Word of God, references, a subject-index, a concordance, a dictionary, calendars, money tables, the parables and miracles, Harmony of the Gospels, the Bible and ancient monuments, Chronology of the Bible, Ethnology of the Bible, Texts for Christian workers, how Sunday School teachers should use the Bible, Scriptural daily bread, Biblical gazetteer, and thirteen accurate and beautifully colored maps, prepared especially for this work by Major Conder, whose explorations in Palestine have attracted the attention of the entire Christian world; in all, 1582 pages. A beautiful Bible always makes an appropriate holiday present.

RED-UNDER-GOLD EDGE INTERNATIONAL TEACHER'S BIBLE,

We send this Bible with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year at $2.00. This Bible, because of its compact shape and vast mine of information, was selected by Marion Harland as her guide and companion on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD journey to and through Palestine.

Should you select this Premium, please mention Premium offer Number Two.

Premium Offer Number Three, for $3.

A large Emerald Type (equal to minion) Edition of the International Red-Under-Gold Teachers' Bible, in soft, flexible leather binding, with leather lining, usually sold at $5, will be sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year on receipt of $3. If you are not pleased with this Bible in every respect, we will refund your money on return of Bible. This is the most remarkable Premium Offer ever made, and we expect to make hosts of friends all over the country with this particular Bible. It contains all the Helps mentioned in Premium Offer No. 2, and differs from that Bible in that it is large type, silk sewed and leather lined.

Should you select this Premium, please mention Premium Offer Number Three.

Premium Offer Number Four, for $2.

On receipt of only two dollars, we will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one whole year, a Genuine Oxford Teachers' Bible and a beautiful section of genuine Olive Wood.

Remember, we are here offering you two Handsome Presents and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a whole year for $2. The Oxford Teachers' Bible we here offer is identical with those which we have offered during the past two years, and of which we have sent out over 161,000 copies. We have a number of Oxford Teachers' Bible left, and as a special inducement, we give as above stated with every Oxford Bible a section of highly polished genuine Olive Wood from the Mount of Olives. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers know the Oxford Bible well, and know that no better Bible is in the market. It includes all the Helps with Concordance, with 40,000 References, Maps, Dictionary, the Harmony of the Gospels, etc. It is gilt edged, leather bound, with overlapping edges, and just the same as those hitherto sent out, but it has not Red Under-Gold Edges, nor is the type quite as large as that in Premium Offer Number Two. But for all practical purposes, and especially for young eyes, it is just splendid. After November 1st, in every instance where the Oxford Bible is ordered, we send a section of Olive Wood.

If you select this Premium, be sure to mention Premium Offer Number Four.

Combination Offer Number Five, All for $3.00.

One copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, one copy of "From Manger to Throne," cloth and gilt, one copy of Red Under Gold Ruby Bible. Two premiums for $3.00.

If you select this Premium, be sure to mention Premium Offer Number Five.

Combination Offer Number Six, All for $3.00.

One copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, one copy of "From Manger to Throne," cloth and gilt, one genuine Oxford Teachers' Bible, with a beautiful section of Olive Wood. Three premiums for $3.00.

If you select this Premium, be sure to mention Premium Offer Number Six.

Combination Offer Number Seven, All for $3.00.

One copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, one copy of the International Red Under Gold Ruby Bible, one copy of the Oxford Teachers' Bible, with a beautiful section of Olive Wood. Three premiums for $3.00.

If you select this Premium, be sure to mention Premium Offer Number Seven.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

We desire, as far as lies within our power, to avoid imposing Sunday work upon the Express Companies, who are usually crowded with business as the holiday season approaches. We therefore invite our readers and all intending subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to co-operate with us in this object, by forwarding their subscriptions at the earliest possible date.

Subscriber, N. Y. 1. What authority have we for believing that Christ worked at the carpenter's trade? 2. Why was it "in due season" that Christ came?

1. Justin Martyr, Theodorus and other early writers mention the fact. 2. It means that God, in his divine wisdom and foreknowledge, saw that the time had arrived when the Old Dispensation, having served its purpose, should be replaced by the New.

J. R. Hatch, Kingsville, O. Please explain John 19: 11. "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above." If he (Christ) referred to the power of the Father, how do you consider the last clause of the verse "Therefore, he that delivered me to thee hath the greater sin?"

In the first, he doubtless referred to the fact that the Lord had placed the Jewish nation under the Roman authority. In the last quoted clause, it is evident that he referred to the high priest; for if that functionary had not handed him over to Pilate, the latter would have had no opportunity to exercise any power in the case.

Subscriber, Chemung Co., N. Y. Is it wrong for a young man who expects to enter the ministry to use a hired carriage Sunday evenings to drive a young lady—a professing Christian of the same denomination as himself—to church, and escort her home again, after he has preached as supply?

If it be absolutely necessary on account of distance and other conditions, that a carriage should be hired, it would be justifiable; but under no other circumstances would there be justification for doing what would involve Sunday labor on the part of another, any more than there would be in pleasure-riding on that day. The matter of escorting a lady to church certainly cannot be wrong, under the circumstances we have indicated.

G. E. Dunkeson, St. Joseph's, Mo. 1. When was Jerusalem destroyed the last time and by whom? 2. What is the meaning of Mathew 24th ch. and 19 verse. 3. Was the language that we now use in use or known at all when Christ was here?

1. In the year 614 A.D., Chosroes II. of Persia, surnamed "the Conqueror," captured Jerusalem, destroyed its churches and temples and the Holy Sepulchre. The most complete destruction was done by the Romans in A.D. 70. 2. This relates to the predicted siege and destruction of Jerusalem which took place about 37 years afterward. 3. No. The language of that part of Palestine and probably that which the Saviour and his disciples used, was Aramaic.

C. C. Caldwell, Glidden, Iowa. Why is not the Bible printed in conformity with grammatical rules? Why is the word "which" so often used in place of the word "who" and why is the practice continued in the Revised Version?

If you will refer to the list of suggestions made by the American Revisers which is published at the end of the Revised New Testament, you will see that they suggested the changes you mention. It is number seven on the list. The English Revisers, considering the terms on which they were appointed, did not feel justified in making the change, as they were instructed to follow the style of language in the authorized version and not to make any changes, except such as might be necessary to render the text clearer and more accurate in translation. The old English form of expression was therefore retained in deference to the conservative feeling of the public.

D. F. S., Ill. Send them to Chaplain Nave, Fort Niobrara, Neb.—Mary Williams, Marion, Ala. We are overcrowded with similar applications.—Trouble, Maplehurst. We know of none that we can safely recommend.—Mrs. Adams, Glindon, Mass. President Clara Barton of the Red Cross Society, can be addressed at Beaufort, S. C.—"Aunt Rachel's-store." Literary skill comes by long practice and although you might succeed, you should be slow to abandon a reliable field for one in which there are many disappointments. Ascertain which publication accepts manuscripts of the class to which yours belongs, and forward it to the editor.—Subscriber, Romeo, Mich. Between 420,000,000 and 430,000,000. See answer to F. V. T., Scottsburg, Ore., in issue of Nov. 1.—Harry W. Hubbard, Pana, Ill. Write to Harper's or Scribner's publishing houses in New York City.—W. C. Coon, Fort Madison, Iowa. We are already overcrowded with MSS.—S. M. S., De Soto, Iowa. It is so presumed, the other being probably an inferior race.

As these offers hold good only as long as our supply may last, prompt action is advisable. Subscribers whose terms expire at any time during the coming year, may now avail themselves of the Premium Offers, and have their terms extended one year by remitting the amounts named.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

In Tippoo Tib's Parlor.

THE illustration on this page represents a scene recently witnessed in the home of Tippoo Tib, the African potentate, on whose assistance Stanley mainly relied for reaching Emin Pasha on his expedition of rescue. An artist of the English journal Black and White, who has been exploring in Africa, waited on Tippoo Tib and found there Mr. and Mrs. Swann of the London Missionary Society conversing with the powerful chief. He took a photograph of the group, which we reproduce. Mr. Swann is the missionary who first obtained authentic information of the death of Emin Pasha. Being asked if he thought there was no hope of the news being false, Mr. Swann said that there was none. He received the information from men who knew Emin and had full details of his murder. They said that in passing through a native village, Emin had demanded a quantity of cloth, which represents money, from the people. It was refused and thereupon he seized it and in the struggle that ensued, Emin's men killed five of the natives. Soon afterward Emin was overpowered by a strong party and was killed in revenge. Mr. Swann has been travelling in Central Africa, with brief intervals, since 1882. He had charge of the expedition which carried the London Missionary's steamer, Good News to Lake Tanganyika. It was during that journey and his subsequent stay at the Lake, that he made the acquaintance of Tippoo Tib, who conceived a strong liking for him and gave him his protection. He would probably be much surprised at Mr. Swann's news of the killing of Emin, as he had so recently assisted Stanley to rescue him, andwell knew at what a cost of money and life the rescue had been effected. He would naturally wonder that having once been rescued with so much difficulty he should voluntarily return. It is not so much of a puzzle to us as it might be to Tippoo Tib, but we are often surprised at a similar temerity in spiritual matters which has not the excuse that Emin's had. It is when a man who has been spiritually enlightened and has understood that to rescue men from sin Christ gave his life, and has almost availed himself of the offer of salvation, returns to his sins. (Heb. 6: 4-6.)

TIPPOO TIB ENTERTAINING REV. AND MRS. SWANN AT STANLEY FALLS

A Fierce Fight in a Menagerie.

A desperate struggle took place in the tigers' cage in the Park menagerie at Providence, R. I., on October 18. A royal Bengal tiger, weighing about 350 pounds, was in the cage with his mate, a powerful tigress, as fierce as he. They were well known as the finest pair in captivity, and menagerie keepers from all parts of the country went to see them. That morning they appeared to be on good terms, although from the time they were first put in the same cage the tiger had been vicious and had frequently ill-used the tigress. His unwonted good humor was, however, of short duration. He struck her a blow with his heavy paw. In a moment she turned upon him with a ferocity equal to his own and they fought desperately. The tigress was getting the worst of the conflict, when she drew off to a corner of the cage, as if exhausted. But only for a moment. With a sudden spring she leaped on the tiger's back and tore at his throat savagely with her cruel claws. In less than a minute she had torn deep into his neck and he rolled over helpless, bleeding to death. The tigress had no mercy. She bit and tore until her adversary's head and neck were a shapeless mass, and when the keepers came, they found her crouched and panting, with her great paw proudly laid on the dead tiger's head. It was a terrible spectacle of brute passion, and it is dreadful to realize that a like nature exists in man, as we perceive that it does, by the details of some of the murders that are reported. It is stronger in some than others, but with all, there is the same need of a new birth by divine power through which alone our natures can be changed. (1 John 3: 15.)

A Natural Barometer.

A remarkable geological substance found in Finland is a stone which foretells by a change of color, the probable character of the weather in the near future—a natural barometer—known by the name of semakuir; and which is said to turn black shortly before an approaching rain, while in fine weather it is mottled with spots of white. For a long time, it appears, this interesting phenomenon was inexplicable, but on an analysis of the stone it was shown to be a fossil mixed with clay and containing a portion of rock salt and nitre. This fact being known, the explanation of the changes became easy; the salt, absorbing the moisture, turns black when the conditions are favorable for rain, while the dryness of the atmosphere must as naturally bring out the salt from the interior of the stone in white spots on the surface. Thus the mystery is explained and perhaps an analogous principle would explain the changes in the manner and conversation of some Christians in different social atmospheres, when the whole nature has not been given up to the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, the remains of the old nature are responsive to worldly influences and the man whose piety is conspicuous in church and prayer meeting is worldly in business and worldly society (Ezek 33:31).

A Magnanimous Wife.

An extraordinary instance of a wife's fidelity to a worthless husband is reported in a press dispatch from Bath, N. Y. Near that town lives a man who does no work, but lives on the money his wife earns by doing chores for the people of the neighborhood. She was returning home recently after her day's work when her husband met her and demanded money. She told him that she had not been paid. He did not believe her and insisted on her giving him the money. Finally he knocked her down and dragged her to the edge of the bridge on which they were standing and held her suspended over the canal a hundred feet below. Two men working near, rescued the woman from her brutal husband and proceeded to punish him for his brutality, when the woman seized a club which he had let fall and went to his assistance, vigorously belaboring her rescuers. They retired in disgust, and the man and his wife walked on along the railroad track. The dispute continued and the vile man seized his wife and threw her in front of an approaching train. A switchman saw the act and dragged her away, not a moment too soon to save her from death. He berated the husband and the latter attacked him, but was getting the worst of the fight when the wife again interfered and put the switchman to flight. He had the husband arrested, however, and he was put on trial. The wife was called as a witness, but she denied every charge that was made against her husband. Her evidence failed to save him, and he was convicted and sent to the penitentiary for four years. We are mysterious beings. This woman is faithful to her husband under the vilest ill-usage, yet the infinitely kind and loving God has comparatively few who say of him, "Though he slay me yet will I trust in him." (Job 13: 15).

An Omission in the Code.

It was supposed, when the code of signals for communication between vessels at sea was constructed, that every contingency had been provided for. It appears, however, that there was one omission. In an article on the code recently published, the circumstances which led to the discovery of the omission are narrated. It appears that the day before the Guion steamer Arizona collided with the iceberg off the shores of Newfoundland some years ago she met the Anchoria of the Anchor line. The captain of the Anchoria had seen several icebergs drifting across the track which the Arizona was taking and knew that she would be in danger of collision. He at once consulted his code to find the signal "Icebergs ahead." No such signal was in the book and before the words could be spelled out, the doomed ship was beyond signalling range The captain's apprehensions were verified. The Arizona struck on an iceberg and but for her watertight bulkheads would have gone to the bottom The omission in the code was soon afterward rectified, but it came near costing many lives. If the captain had happened to think of it, there was a signal on the code which might have served his purpose. It was the signal, "You are running into danger." If he had displayed that signal, the Arizona's captain would have been put on the alert and the accident might have been averted. Ministers and Christian workers who are challenged to produce from the Bible specific condemnation of gambling, attending races, card-playing, etc., are unable to do so, but there is no difficulty in finding there the general warning which applies to all such pursuits, "You are running into danger." (Prov. 13: 20.)

Not Responsible for Panic.

The plaintiff in a suit against a railroad company in Philadelphia has been surprised by a judge's ruling. She is a lady, who, ten months ago was traveling on a street car, over a road which crosses the railway tracks at a level crossing. Just as the car reached the tracks the passengers were horrified by seeing a locomotive approaching at full speed. Instantly there was a panic. Every one rushed to the door to jump off. The lady went with the others, but she was crowded in the doorway and on reaching the platform was pushed off the car by terrified passengers behind her. She fell and was trodden on and severely injured. She therefore sued the company for damages. To her astonishment, the judge directed a nonsuit. He held that as there was no real danger of collision and the passengers would have been safe if they had kept their seats, they had no valid claim against the company for compensation for injuries resulting from their own panic. In the affairs of life the Christian sometimes suffers in the same way. If when calamity seems to be impending, while he is in the path of duty, he endeavors to save himself byworldly means instead of waiting for the salvation of God he is likely to fall into mischief. (Psa 37: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Prof. Alfred Momerie, the distinguished Biblical scholar of London, delivered a powerful address on the irrationality of Agnosticisim a few days ago at Union Theological Seminary, New York.

Dr. Chapman s meetings at Georgetown, Ky., have been the largest ever known in that section. From fifteen hundred to two thousand people were present at the evening services. Dr. Brown of Louisville and Evangelist Bilhorn have been assisting in the work.

The Rev. Benjamin Griffith, D.D., of the American Baptist Publication Society, died a few days ago at his home in Upland, Penn. He was born in 1821, became a pastor in 1850, and was connected with the Publication Society from 1858 till the day of his death.

The American Bible Society has been notified by its agent in Rio Janeiro that its premises in that city have been injured by one of Admiral Mello's shells. He also states that the war has seriously retarded his work in other districts of the country.

The Christian Men's Union for Total Abstinence has been organized and legally incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. Its object is practically identical with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The National Headquarters of the Union are at 433 Lexington ave., New York. It proposes to organize local unions in every town and county of the United States with men who abstain on Christian principles from intoxicating drinks. It is to be Inter-Denominational and non-political. The incorporators are John S. Huyler, Samuel H. Hadley, William Evans, George F. Langenbacher and Henry H. Hadley.

Rev. Benjamin Labaree, D.D., who was for many years a successful missionary in Western Persia, and has had charge of the revision in this country of the Syriac Bible, has been appointed Recording Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Dr. Labaree is a profound scholar and a most indefatigable worker.

One of the results of the World's Fair Congress on Sunday Rest, in which Protestants and Catholics united, is an organization of men in Chicago to aid in securing Sunday as a day of rest by pledging themselves not to buy anything on that day. The movement has the support of the Retail Clerks' Association, and of many merchants who have heretofore kept open doors on Sunday.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, pastor of the Hebrew Christian Church in New York, has been helping Rev. E.O. McFarland of Newark, N. J., in very successful revival services. One of the press notices of the meetings says: "Mr. Freshman is a remarkable preacher, having a profound religious experience. Knowing the rigor of the law, he preaches it most forcibly, yet lovingly. He imparts his intense convictions to his hearers."

Rev. B. Fay Mills went to Scranton, Pa., for a series of services after closing at Binghampton, N. Y. At the latter place no less than twenty churches united in the movement, and a temporary building capable of accommodating four thousand persons was erected for the work. Even this was not large enough and overflow meetings were held in the First Presbyterian Church. On one Sunday evening the Electric Railroad Company suspended its service and the conductors and motormen occupied seats in the building. On Oct. 17 the Mayor issued a proclamation requesting suspension of business for "religious purposes."

CHAPTER XVI.

VANITY AND VEXATION OF SPIRIT.

IN the old library at the Park Mrs. Dangerfield and Yolante sat together. They had been talking of Guy and Yolante said, "Then he has known it all the time?"

"Yes, he has known it for some time, and has seen that it would be best to remain silent. It is a great load off my mind. I hardly expected so much sense and good feeling from Guy. Yolante, what have you in your mind? You look as if this knowledge had brought no comfort to you."

"In one way it has not," answered the girl bitterly. "One cannot help thinking what might have been, if we had taken Guy into our confidence from the first."

"It would doubtless have saved us some anxiety and trouble of mind, but beyond [illegible]—"

But Yolante was not even listening. "Does [illegible] all—everything?" she asked abruptly, and her eyes rested upon the carved work of the old secretary in a fashion that was not to be mistaken."

The color rose slowly in Mrs. Dangerfield's face, which had lost something of its accustomed healthy tint, and roundness of contour, but her eyes had regained their old calm directness of gaze, and the nervous hesitancy and agitation of manner which had distressed those who knew her best whilst she had been ill, had now almost entirely disappeared.

"I did not think it needful to enter into more detail than was necessary, or to complicate matters needlessly," was the steady answer. "Guy knew that he had a claim, and made up his mind not to exercise it, feeling as no one could help doing, who fully understood the family history of the past years, that Monk's moral claim was stronger than any legal quibble. As he has said to me since—if he had intended to speak at all, he ought to have done so at once, before Monk engaged himself to Joyce. I quite agree to this. It would be a cruel thing to disturb his possession now. Nor do I believe that any number of documents such as the ones to which you allude, would shake his determination."

"But still the fact remains that he does not know he was meant in the will which our grandfather drew up? He believes that Monk was the Guy Monkswold named there?"

"Possibly—I am really not responsible for his private opinions."

"And he thinks that we have been in total ignorance all this time!"

Mrs. Dangerfield felt slightly irritated. Hitherto Yolante had always shown the good sense and good taste to avoid needless allusions to a subject that could not but be painful. Why she was now so determined to put everything in the most unvarnished colors, just when things really were growing comfortable at last, was more than her mother could imagine.

"He thinks exactly what he chooses, and what is for his best happiness," was the sharp reply. "Really, Yolante, I do not know why you talk so oddly to-day."

The girl heaved a long sigh, and passed her hand across her eyes.

"I hardly know myself—only I had a vague hope that I was going to get free of this horrid black weight that has been shadowing my life so long, and now it seems almost blacker than ever: for whilst Guy is acting with the [illegible] —well, we will not further explain what we are doing."

Mrs Dangerfield turned a searching and almost angry look upon her daughter. "Yolante, you are strangely unlike yourself to-[illegible]. What [illegible]? And are you [illegible]. It [illegible]

There was no mirth in the girl's smile, as she sat looking into the fire, bearing her mother's close scrutiny with the greatest indifference.

"I can soon explain what I mean, and you will see that I do not speak without due warrant. I threw away the love of two faithful and honest hearts, partly through pride, but more because I could no longer feel myself an honest woman, and I dreaded that some day they should discover all, and my complicity, and repent that they had ever loved a being who had fallen so low."

Rising abruptly, as if she were afraid of breaking down if she said more, Yolante made her way to Monk, who was now promoted to the drawing-room sofa, and allowed to go about the house pretty much at will. He had not yet been out of doors, as the keen winds of early spring were still blowing from the east: but he looked almost himself again, was gaining flesh and color, and had quite regained his old cheery buoyancy of spirit since Guy had begun to come backwards and forwards to the house. Guy did not return there to live—his own work tied him to his quarters in the riverside house and as Monk's marriage was talked of for the ensuing summer, it would have been foolish to disturb himself again: but he came and went at will now, and it was admitted on all hands that some misunderstanding had been cleared up since Monk had come to the full possession of his faculties.

Monk was alone, with Cissy's dachshund for a companion.

"I did not know you were by yourself, Monk. Has Guy not come over yet?"

"No, he said he should be busy to-day. I daresay he will look in later on, when Geoffrey comes."

"I should almost have thought you were able to dispense with regular attendance from Geoffrey now," remarked Yolante, as she seated herself at her tapestry frame, "You don't look much like the invalid now."

"No, thank goodness—I believe I could try a fall with Geoffrey now and not come off so very badly: but—" and here a mischievous smile lighted Monk's eyes—"I suspect I am not the only cause of these daily visits."

Yolante looked suddenly up, her cheek flushing as she did so, and a great throb of hope setting all her pulses racing. Then she bent over her frame and said, "You are mysterious, Monk."

He laughed in his good-humored fashion. "Well I think that's about the first time in my life that I've had that adjective applied to me. And certainly there seems uncommonly little mystery about this business."

Yolante stitched away diligently, as if her work absorbed all her attention. Monk continued speaking, lazily pulling the dog's soft ears the while. "I must say I feel uncommonly glad. I always did think Geoffrey a right good fellow, and since he's been so good to poor old Guy, when he was down on his luck, I've liked him even better. I always did think he would be the best kind of a brother for one of my sisters to give me. The fun of it is to think that little Cissy is a grown-up young lady, whom fellows are falling in love with."

Monk laughed at the notion, and Yolante sat drawing her needle in and out, but without making the least progress in her work. It was rather as if someone had dashed a pitcher of ice water in her face. She felt numb and cold, and rather wondered if it were not all some bad dream. Cissy—the sister she had looked upon as a mere child hardly out of the nursery (for whilst Yolante had always been old for her age, Cissy had been content to remain a child as long as possible) that this little insignificant sister with her unformed ways and childish mind should have succeeded where she—the thought was intolerable, it was not to be borne. She was glad that Monk was speaking again. Perhaps it was all one of his teasing jests.

"I'm not surprised though. I never knew till I was ill what a capital nurse and companion little Cissy could be. I suppose it has been waiting on Humphrey all her life that has given her such a turn for it. I know when I was bad, I'd rather have her about me than any of those trained women, though they were awfully kind and clever, too. I used to see how Geoffrey would watch her—and how he would follow her about with his eyes when she moved across the room. It was the first thing that I began to notice and take an interest in—and it was so pretty to see how unconscious she was all the time. But I think it is beginning to dawn upon her now."

"She is such a child," said Yolante with dry lips.

"Well, she seems so to us—though she's no child in a sick room. You're more the child there, madam, let me tell you. But she is nearly eighteen, and not too young to be wooed, as she will very soon find out. I do not think her little heart will be very hard where Geoffrey is concerned. And she is just the one woman in the world for him—even such a fellow as I can see that."

"I should have expected Geoffrey to look for more character."

Monk laughed, and turned to look at Yolante. "It strikes me that the little one has a good deal more character than some of us have given her credit for, quite enough to make her husband happy. There is such a thing, my dear, as a little too much of that valuable commodity. You know I fancied once that Geoffrey had his thoughts turned in another direction (when Cissy really was little more than a child) but he got frightened by what he saw and heard. Have you heard the expression 'A hurricane in petticoats'? Well, there are women like that—and as a rule after a bit, we poor placable men rather fight shy of them, though they're generally the best looking of the whole race—worse luck."

Yolante was silent: she knew that this was Monk's first and possibly last allusion to the attitude she had adopted towards Guy, of which of course he had been aware, though he had been peculiarly reticent upon the subject, his masculine reserve and sound sense alike telling him that the least said the soonest mended. All was right now—he did not exactly know how and never cared to ask—and this was just one little fraternal hit, which she saw through, and accepted with unwonted humility. Yet all the time she felt as if a fire raged within, and though she sat at her frame, she started at every sound, and when Cissy came in presently with her hands full of flowers which she began arranging in the vases of the room, her sister's dark eyes were fixed upon her with a glance of the keenest scrutiny.

Yes, there was no denying it, Cissy was a very fair young maiden, with a sweet, fresh, unconscious beauty that had in it something fragrant and flower-like. No scorching passions had swept over it to destroy its dewy freshness, no idle trifling had rubbed the bloom from the tender fruition of a first young love. Yolante looked and saw and realised the gulf that lay between her sister and herself—so little different in years and in surroundings, and her heart felt suddenly crushed and dead. Again it was forced upon her that she had chosen—and lost, and a bitter wave of self-condemnation surged over her heart.

There was another sound outside. The door opened to admit Geoffrey and Guy. The latter went straight over to Monk, the former to Cissy, as if he had eyes for her alone. Yolante in the shadow of the curtain, and half concealed by her frame was not observed by either. She was free to look on and judge for herself of the truth of Monk's surmise.

Yes, it was all true—there was no mistaking it—the earnest tender depth of his glance, the trusting sweetness of hers. Old friends and comrades they might be, but that look in their eyes was due to no feeling of mere good fellowship and camaraderie. It was something deeper, purer, holier than that, and Yolante suddenly rising from her seat slipped noiselessly out into the garden. She felt unable to bear the sight of it longer.

"Lost, lost, everything lost—thrown away in blind wilfulness. I am the most miserable girl in all the world, and the sting of it all is that I have so richly deserved it—have brought it all deliberately on myself."

A picnic had been planned for the next day. The party was to celebrate Monk's recovery by a journey to an old ruined castle picturesquely situated at the head a deep gorge, lined with great trees. Yolante was not in the mood for pleasure, but the consequence of her refusal to go would have been questions and explanations, and these Yolante was anxious to avoid. She, therefore, went with the party, but when they went to look for an old grotto in which a gypsy was said to be living, Yolante wandered gloomily away by herself along the gorge which as a child she had often visited.

She was recalling somewhat bitterly the promise of those days, and wondering how it was that everything seemed to turn to ashes beneath her touch Everybody else was happy—she had seen Geoffrey and Cissy wandering along the opposite bank of the ravine, lost in their own happiness and one another. Monk and Joyce were now so absorbed in each other that there seemed no place for her in her brother's heart, and he had never been quite the same to her since she had helped to drive and keep Guy from the Park. Even Norman and Cicely had not noticed when she drew away from them. She, who used to be such a power wherever she went, now appeared to be superflous in any company. Nobody loved her, nobody wanted her. She was one of those many superfluous women of the world, who seem to have no place save in the butterfly round of fashion. When once that whirl was over, her occupation was gone: and this year she had not even had the satisfaction of a London season.

"There is no room for me in the world," was the melancholy conclusion she reached, "it would be much better if I were out of it. I do not think there is a creature here who would miss me."

By this time she had reached a very lonely part of the ravine, having wandered in an opposite direction from the bridge where it could be crossed. Down below in the water she saw growing some very beautiful flags, and thought she should like to have some to take home for the decoration of her room. The bank was very high and precipitous, but Yolante thought she could make her way down without very much difficulty.

There was no path of any kind, but she plunged down boldly, clinging to the young willow saplings, and slipping sometimes as the sandy ground gave way beneath her feet, or the loose stones rolled as she stepped upon them, and fell with a crash and splash into the torrent below. Presently it began to dawn upon her that she had tried a descent beyond her skill, and as she found that the ravine in this place actually overhung the rapid stream below, it seemed hopeless to try and descend in that place, and she attempted to regain her former level. But this she found to be actually impossible. There was no foothold in the yielding sand. The shrubs would not stand the strain put upon them when she tried to raise herself by them. One to which she was clinging gave way in her grasp, and with a sharp cry of terror and despair she felt herself falling—falling—slipping and sliding without the power to save herself.

But there was a stunted willow somewhat stronger than its fellows directly in the path of her descent, and with the tenacity of despair she clung to its tough boughs, and felt herself stopped in her downward race. But she saw at a glance the peril of her position. Once let her grasp of this frail support relax, and she must fall helplessly into a deep dark pool into which the torrent widened out at this point. Grasping the boughs with frantic force, and clutching at them too with her feet, Yolante shrieked aloud for help.

To her immense relief her shout was answered—by what voice she did not know and could not think—but, alas! the voice came from the opposite side of the torrent. She hid her face and did not even try to see, absorbed in the frightful strain of holding herself up till help could reach her.

"Hold on—hold on for a few minutes. I am coming," cried the voice, and next moment a loud splash told her that the river was no obstacle to her rescuer. Next came the sound of scrambling and climbing, and after what seemed almost endless suspense, Yolante felt her hands grasped and herself drawn up little by little to a ledge above, where she found herself face to face with Guy.

He was pale at first, his face set in lines that told of anxious strain, but when once he saw her in safety, these relaxed, and he almost laughed as he shook his head and said,

"O, Yolante, Yolante, what did you mean by getting yourself in such a hobble. It makes me giddy to think of it."

But she could not speak, and he saw that she had better be got into a place of greater safety before her nerve gave way. He had seen from the opposite bank the track of an old pathway, and bit by bit they traced it out till they stood on the top of the bank again, and Yolante sank down burying her face in her hands.

"O, Guy, Guy, Guy," she cried in great tearless sobs, "to think that after all that has happened I should owe my life to you. What can I do? What shall I do? O, I never thought of such a thing as that."

But Guy did not understand. He thought she was upset by her fright and only laughed her out of her tragic mood.

What the Story Did.

GREAT was the peril of Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, of the Arcot Mission, India, in a walled town in Hyderabad. The natives, in a rage at his telling of a different God from theirs, bade him leave at once. He replied that he had a message which he must first give; but they declared that if he should say another word he would be instantly killed. He saw them standing with arms filled with paving stones, and heard them say to one another, "You throw the first stone, and I will throw the next;" but he lifted his heart to him who can subdue man's angry passions, and asked leave to 'tell them a story," with the understanding that then, if they pleased, they might stone him.

It was the "old, old story" that he told them, beginning with the birth of Jesus. When he spoke of the Cross, and explained that the agony there suffered was for each one of them, they listened with wonder. Surely God was speaking through the words of the missionary. Their anger ceased, their hearts were touched, they threw down their heavy stones. After telling of Jesus Christ's cry, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" of his resurrection and ascension to heaven, and of the glorious offer of salvation for all, Dr. Chamberlain said he was done—now they might stone him. But he had nothing to fear, for those men, lately infuriated, were weeping. They gathered around to buy his books, that they might read for themselves of these wonderful things.

DUCAL OCULISTS.

The correspondent of a society paper says that Duke Carl Theodore of Bavaria is a most charitable man and an extremely clever oculist. He has established three hospitals for persons suffering from disease of the eyes—one at Meran, one on the Tegernsee, where he passes most of his time, and one at Munich. He makes no charge for poor patients, but at the door there is a box into which those who can afford it are expected to place contributions for the good of the poor of the place. The Duke is a general in the Bavarian army, and is the brother of the Empress of Austria. His eldest daughter is the Duchess Sophie, who has inherited her father's skill, and is his principal assistant in his work as an oculist. The Duke always enters his consulting-room by seven o'clock in the morning, and the young Duchess takes her share in soothing the sufferers, and enters with enthusiasm into the charitable work. As an example of the Duke's skill, he recently removed a splinter of iron from the eye of an iron-turner, an operation which had defied the skill of several other oculists. The Duke is the heir presumptive to the throne of the palatinate of Bavaria, as his elder brother, Ludwig, who married a commoner, has renounced his right. Such conduct is unusual among dukes and princes. As a rule they are not famous for opening the eyes of their subjects metaphorically or physically.

CALLING THE FLOCK.

An illustration of a passage of Scripture not generally understood was witnessed in the province of Aran, Northern Africa, by Mr. Barrow, a missionary to the Jews. He writes: "I was travelling in the diligence from a place inland to a town on the coast. All was quiet in that little place as we jumped out of the diligence. There was no one in sight until quite suddenly an Arab appeared, and planting himself in the middle of the street of houses which formed the town, took out from the folds of his robe a little bamboo whistle or pipe, and began to play upon it. I could not think what he meant, but as he piped I saw to my astonishment some cows coming from one direction, some goats from another, and from all directions they came and gathered round the man. It was the voice of the shepherd calling the flock to him, that he might lead it out to pasture. When the whole flock was gathered he led them away, walking before them until he disappeared beyond our vision. As I watched the shepherd I realized for the first time the meaning of Zech. 10:8 that prophecy so dear to my people which, correctly interpreted, reads: 'I will pipe for them and gather them,' and it refers to the action of the shepherd who pipes sweet music to his flock calling them to him."

A FREE GIFT OF OLIVE WOOD.

To any one of our readers who will send us the names and full addresses of twenty-five church officers, church members, or Sunday School workers, no two being of the same family, we will send a beautiful section of Olive-Wood cut from the Mount of Olives, polished by native workmen in Jerusalem and bearing on its face in English and Hebrew characters the name of the Holy City.

"IF THOU HADST KNOWN!"

"When He beheld the city He wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known. . . ."—Luke xix. 41, 42.

"IF thou hadst known!" so spake the Saviour Lord [Word,
To those who spurned his pure, life-giving
As o'er Jerusalem his tears were poured—
"If thou hadst known!"

"If thou hadst known!" heaven-chosen, favored race,
What meant the lifting on thee of his face,
Thou could'st not have despised such wondrous grace,
"If thou hadst known."

Lord, make us know, "while it is called to-day,"
The things that to our peace belong, and may
We never hear Thee, sorrowing o'er us, say,
"if thou hadst known."

And when we reach the presence of the King,
"The half hath not been told," our hearts shall sing,
Such joy had borne us, as on eagle wing,
If we had known.

THE SOUL'S ANCHORAGE.

NOW I have found the ground wherein Sure my soul's anchor may remain;
The wounds of Jesus, for my sin
Before the world's foundation slain;
Whose mercy shall unshaken stay,
When heaven and earth are fled away.

O Love, thou bottomless abyss,
My sins are swallowed up in thee!
Covered is my unrighteousness
Nor spot of guilt remains on me,
While Jesus' blood, through earth and skies,
Mercy—free, boundless mercy—cries.

By faith I plunge me in this sea;
Here is my hope, my joy, my rest;
Hither, when hell assails, I flee;
I look into my Saviour's breast:
Away, sad doubt and anxious fear!
Mercy is all that's written here.

THE PLAN OF THE VISION.

The Structure of the Book of the Revelation and the Arrangement of Times.

BY THE LATE SIR S. A. BLACKWOOD.*

THE duplication of visions is in accordance with what appears to be the Divine plan in foretelling future events, if we may judge from other examples. Such, for instance, was the method employed when, in his dreams, Joseph foresaw his exaltation to be head over his brethren. It was revealed to him in the double visions of the sheaves and the stars. So again in the case of the dreams of Pharaoh concerning the seven years of plenty aad the seven years of famine, which were made known to him under the symbolic forms of the seven fat and lean kine, and the seven good and bad ears. And on that occasion we are told the reason for the double revelation, "For that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice, it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass." It was to indicate the absolute certainty of accomplishment of the things revealed.

It is, therefore, reasonable to expect that, when communicating to his servants in the Churches the things which were shortly to come to pass, and which were to end in the completion of the mystery of God, and the establishment of Christ's kingdom forever, a similar method would be adopted, and a double prefiguration of the future be vouchsafed. And such we find to be the case. The Revelation declares the future history of the Church militant here on earth, and of that part of the world which had been the subject of previous prophecies, in a twofold series of visions, for "the thing is established."

The structure of that part of the Book which deals with the things which were to happen immediately after the then existing condition of the churches is, I believe, as follows: (The scene and action recorded in the fourth and fifth chapters are introductory to the actually prophetic portion, which accordingly commences with the opening of the first seal, as recorded in the sixth chapter.)

The seven seals, the seventh of which expands into the seven trumpets, ending with the "last trump," under which the assumption of power by the Lord Jesus Christ, the resurrection, and judgment take place.

Seven signs (the first two and the last of which are thus designated, the intervening ones being left to be discovered); the seventh expanding into the seven vials, ending with the completion of the mystery ("It is done,") the fall of great Babylon, and the final "shaking" of all things.

Both series end, it will be observed, with the "great hail" (ch. 11: 19; 16: 21).

These two sets of visions are followed by the explanation of the mystery of Babylon given in ch. 17; the fuller delineation of her fall in ch. 18; the marriage of the Lamb and the victorious advent of the King of kings in ch. 19; the millennium and first and second resurrections and judgment of the great white throne in ch. 20; and the manifestation of the Church, in chs. 21 and 22.

It will at once be seen that this view of the structure of the Apocalypse differs in one important respect from that which has so long been held with practical unanimity by Protestant interpreters, who have regarded the book as consisting, in its main prophetic portion, of three septenaries, or series of seven visions—the seven seals, the seven trumpets, the seven vials. To that theory the very serious objection attaches that, whereas the trumpet series concludes at the end of ch. 11, the next series, that of the vials, does not commence till ch. 15, thus making a great gap or break in the order of the book.

I now subjoin the following enumeration of the seven signs, mentioned above taken from Garrett's "Commentary on the Revelation," wherein he expounds the view which, so far as I am aware, he was the first to set forth.

First sign (and thus designated). The woman clothed with the sun, ch. 12: 1-2.

Second sign (and thus designated). The ten-horned wild beast, ch. 12: 3-17 and 18: 1-10.

Third sign. The beast with the lamb-like horns, ch. 13: 11-18.

Fourth sign. The 144,000 on Mount Zion, ch. 14: 1-5

Fifth sign. The three angels flying through the midst of heaven, ch. 14: 6-13.

The sixth sign. The harvest and the vintage, ch. 14: 14-20.

The seventh sign (and thus designated.) The seven angels having the seven last plagues, chs. 15 and 16.

THANKSGIVING:

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Nov. 26 Ps. 68: 19; 92: 1-5.

WHILE it is ever true that the thanksgiving most acceptable to God is a humble, pure and beneficent life, no man can realize in the slightest degree his obligations to God, without desiring to offer vocal thanks to him. A human benefactor who gives a library, or a park to his town, is pleased if he sees that his gift is used and enjoyed, but he would think the beneficiaries strangely lacking in gratitude if they forgot him and took his gift without thanking the giver. We can conceive of God only through ourselves and of our duty to him only as we perceive our duty to our fellow man. Toward one who confers benefits upon us we look with grateful affection and would feel ashamed of our neglect of duty if we failed to thank him for his kindness. Yet, as a great divine has said, all our thanks to man are like thanking the clouds for rain. Our thanks are due to him who sends the clouds The Christian, who has entered into the closer relation to God, is especially under the obligation of thankfulness. He knows more of God than others do and he owes him more. He knows enough of himself to be profoundly conscious that it is not by his own merits, nor by his own power, that he has attained the high position of sonship of God. He differs from the savage, from the cultured Hindoo, from the sceptical philosopher and from the degraded criminal, not by his superior wisdom, but by the circumstances of his birth and education and by the power of the Holy Spirit, the gift of God. His position and his hope of future blessedness both urge him to offer thanks to God with heartfelt gratitude. Knowing whence his blessings come, he cannot be silent regarding them.

It is well that as a nation we set apart a day every year for this purpose and it would be still better if we did not so frequently forget the purpoe for which it is set apart. As a people we should thank God for our national blessings, not taking them as matters of course or as the products of our own effort. "Except the Lord keep the city the watchman waketh but in vain." Knowing and realizing this fact the Christian part of our nation ought to set the example of recognizing the Source of national blessing and offering thanks. It is not only in seasons of national and personal prosperity that thanks should be offered. Adversity in both cases calls for thankfulness. In national and personal experience the time of darkness and sorrow has again and again been the time of richest spiritual benefit, so that we have had to say, as did the patriarch, "The Lord hath given and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." It is in this constant recognition of the divine nearness and unremitting beneficence, in infinite variety of forms, that faith grows and strengthens. To forget God is to die spiritually and to come before him daily with petitions, offering no word of thanks for past and present kindnesses is to behave toward him as we would not behave toward one to whom we owe infinitely less. Therefore we adopt the words of the Psalmist and say, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord and sing praises unto thy name, O Most High!"

A CANADIAN CIRCLE.

The beneficent work of the King's Daughters is seen nowhere more conspicuously than in the Dominion. One circle, meeting at Chatham, Ont., is a specimen of many others. Miss L. Sandys, the secretary, in describing the work of the year in a report to the Headquarters of the Order, says: "We have furnished and endowed a room in the new general hospital. This room is called the King's Daughters' room. The furniture is of oak, except the bedstead, which is of iron, enameled in white, the dainty curtains, and pretty fawn and brown rug, giving a home-like, cheerful appearance, and doing away largely with the usual bareness of our hospital rooms. The members have subscribed and endowed their room, which entitles them to a free bed in the hospital for any deserving case requiring such assistance.

One of our "scattered members," who has gone out as a missionary to the "Rupert's Land School," writes to say that she has organized a Circle among the Indian girls there, and is much encouraged by the good results. Our Circle has purchased an organ for the Home for the Friendless, and some of the members go out each Thursday to assist in the usual weekly services."

THE NEW BROOKLYN BRANCH.

The rapid growth during the last few years of the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., has demanded increased effort and greater facilities on the part of the Young Men's Christian Association. Neither the elevated roads nor the improved surface-car service make the Central Association the home for the young men in the outlying districts that an Association should be. Several prominent residents of the Twenty-sixth Ward have realized the fact and have co-operated with the Central Association in establishing a branch in that ward. The building, of which a picture appears on this page, is the result of their efforts. It was ready for occupancy on November 1st, and through the kindly interest and help of the ladies of the ward, is being thoroughly and tastefully furnished. The building is situated on the corner of Pennsylvania and Liberty Avenues, in the centre of a population of a hundred thousand souls. It is four stories high, and is built of wood and galvanized iron. In the basement are the gymnasium, running track and swimming bath. On the second floor the Secretaries' offices, the parlors, class-rooms and reading room. The third floor is given up to public meeting-rooms and the auditorium. On the fourth floor are the janitor's apartments and a meeting-room for general purposes. The entire structure is 100 feet long and fifty feet wide; it is fitted up with all the latest improvements and will be a valuable acquisition to the new section of the city.

A NEW COURSE OF STUDY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature announces its usual correspondence courses for the year, in the Hebrew, the New Testament Greek and the English Bible. This department of the Institute work goes steadily on from year to year, graduating a goodly number annually, and enrolling about the same number. The work is of such a thorough, scholarly character that it cannot increase faster than the desire of the people to devote time and earnest mental effort to the study of the Bible.

Many plans for widening the field of the Institute work are under consideration. Among these a plan of Bible study for the numerous organizations for Christian work, notably the Young People's Societies.

Two great advantages of this plan are that the time required is but fifteen minutes a day, and that the cost is but fifty cents a year. Further, the course embraces four years of work, covering in that time the entire Bible under four great subjects, viz: The Life of Christ, the Founding of the Christian Church, Old Testament History and Prophecy, and Old Testament Legislation and Poetry. No books are required save the Revised Version of the Bible, and a small Bible Dictionary, everywhere available. The work may be done by individuals or in clubs. No leader is required, as the Institute supplies all directions for work, question sheets, etc., and reports are made directly to the headquarters of the Institute. A specimen of the first month's work may be obtained by addressing the office of the Institute, Hyde Park, Chicago, Ills. Dr. William R. Harper, Principal.

THE THREE C'S

An earnest appeal to the Baptist Young People's Unions to take up the Christian Culture Courses was made by Dr. W. H. Stifler at the recent convention at Aberdeen, S. D. In the course of his address describing the respective advantages of the three lines of study he said: As to the first line of study, the Word of God, "This is of first importance. Long ago the immortal Chrysostom said, 'Herein is the cuse of much ill, that the Scriptures are so poorly understood.' A clear and intelligent knowledge of the Bible is the sheet-anchor of our denominational life. If our young people early learn to know the Scriptures they cannot be carried about with every wind of doctrine. He who who would refute or even withstand the opinions of men must know the word of God as few of our young people do, until they have given heed to Paul's exhortation to the young man Timothy, "Give attendance to reading." No man can have spiritual power who does not have an intelligent conception of what the Bible teaches. And as knowledge increases, power may increase. I have said "may increase" deliberately. Knowledge in and of itself has no power. More than that, it may be a power for evil as well as for good.

"Our second line of studies is to take us to the mission fields where this Bible is winning its victories in turning the people from nature's darkness to God's marvelous light and from the power of Satan unto God. Our young people are to know our mission fields as they know their own church field. They are to know the noble men and women of God who have not counted their own lives dear unto themselves that they might finish their course with joy, and the ministry they received to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

"We take our third line of studies in the fields of sacred literature. Our Bible has a history. This history our young people are to know. Here they will learn that not only that 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' but that God has preserved in a most marvelous way that which was written, and has given us as clear confirmation of the reliability of these sacred records as we should have if we saw them written before our own eyes. As our young people roam through these fields of sacred literature they will be more and more convinced that we do not follow cunningly devised fables in following that which Moses and the prophets did write.

"These lines of reading will lead to two beneficent ends: they will equip us for service. They will keep us out of the quagmires of error and superstition Our motto is to be, "We study that we may serve."

AMONG THE ORDERS

A project has been started by the Christian Endeavor Societies of the Reformed Church to send an Endeavor missionary to Japan. To accomplish it ten dollars a year will have to be contributed by every Society in connection with a Reformed church in America.

At the annual meeting of the Baptist Young People's Unions of New York State at Oswego, the report of the secretary showed that associational unions have now been organized in seventeen of the associations of the State, and unions are in process of organization in several other associations.

The sailors whose ships touch at San Francisco are looked after by the Christian Endeavor Societies. A sociable for them is provided every Thursday evening by some of the societies in the city and a society at Berkeley, Cal., collects papers and magazines to be distributed on board of vessels.

At the anniversary of the Baptist Young People's Union of Philadelphia a few days ago, Rev. A. M. Brinckle retired from the Presidency in which he has rendered excellent service for three years. Rev. Frank M. Goodchild was elected as his successor.

The Epworth Leagues of East Tennessee have been holding an enthusiastic Convention. Among the addresses were three on different aspects of the League. Bishop Joyce viewed it from the bishop's standpoint; the local minister from the pastor's standpoint and a representative layman from the layman's standpoint.

Three new Young Women's Associations have been organized. They are at Lincoln, Neb., Mt. Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass., and Illinois Female College, Jacksonville, Ill.

At the great rally of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Boston, Mass., held recently in the Union Congregational Church, over a thousand Endeavorers were present, representing the majority of the churches in the union.

At the twenty-first convention of the Illinois Young Men's Christian Associations over $6,200 was raised for the work of the State committee, though only $5,000 was asked for. At the young men's meeting on Sunday seventy-two young men signed cards saying they desired to live a Christian life.

At the forty-second annual meeting of the Y. M. C. A. of Washington, D. C., fifty-seven young men were elected to membership, and the religious work committee reported an average attendance of 176 at Gospel meetings on Sunday afternoons. There were 175 requests for prayer and eighty conversions were reported.

The Epworth League at Pearl street Church, Brockton, Mass., under the direction of the pastor, Rev. J. E. Johnson, holds a monthly missionary meeting. Some of the leaguers and converts who have been organized into a praying band go into the homes of the irreligious to read, talk, pray, and persuade them to better things.

Family Life in Corea.

A Country where Woman's Lot is a Hard One—A Great Gospel Field.

STRICTLY speaking, there is no family life in Corea—in unevangelized households, at least. Missionaries who have had ample opportunities to become familiar with the social life of the people, have concluded that a Corean woman has no recognized moral existence. She is never made the companion or equal of man, has no distinctive name, her childhood's appellation being dropped the moment she becomes a woman. "After her marriage," writes William Elliot Griffis, in his book entitled: "Corea, the Hermit Nation," "her name is buried! Her own parents allude to her by the name of the district or ward in which she has married. Her parents-in-law speak of her by the name of the place in which she lived before marriage. When she has children, she is 'the mother of so-and-so.'" She does farm labor, even the meanest and eats what is left after the men laborers make their meal. She carries the heavier load to market. Among the upper classes, it is true, her condition is somewhat better, but the same lack of recognition is apparent. Her children are separated after the age of 8 or 10, the boys being taught that it is wrong to enter that part of the house where their sisters are, and the girls that they must never be seen by their brothers. The father rarely converses with his wife and then only as though she were a creature far beneath him. The women, after marriage, are practically prisoners and dare not even look out of their windows on the streets without the permission of their lords. Instances are on record where fathers have cruelly killed their daughters, husbands their wives, and wives have committed suicide, because strangers have simply touched them with their fingers. Corean women have little to do with the choice of a husband, the entire arrangement being made between the fathers of the young people on either side, even to the appointment of a wedding-day, which is generally set, after consulting the astrologers. Women are frequently married at thirteen. On the wedding-day, a platform is erected in the bridegroom's house, and decorated with rich woven draperies. A crowd of friends assembles and in their presence the young couple, who probably never met before, bow profoundly to each other, on the platform. The bride bows four times to her father-in-law and twice to the groom and the latter four times to the bride. This is the entire ceremony, and it is followed by feasting and amusement. Throughout the whole day, the bride must preserve absolute silence. She signs the hon-sechi or wedding document and if unable to write her name, spreads out one hand and with a pencil traces the outlines of the fingers. On the ring finger she wears two golden circlets in token of wifehood.

There is, however, a brighter side to the social life of many Corean households than that already pictured—homes where the advent of a child is hailed with pleasure, where its tender years are pleasant ones, where its nursery is full of toys and games and pleasant companions of its own age, and where the mother enjoys the social dignities and estate of her husband.

Christian mission work is progressing favorably in Corea. In several letters published in previous issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dr. W. J. Hall, writing from Seoul, the capital, furnishes interesting reports of the condition of Gospel and medical missionary work in that promising field. A few months ago, he was appointed by the Methodist Board to the Pyeng Yang circuit, 180 miles from Seoul. "We loaded our little pack ponies with drugs and books, and started on our tiresome journey over rough roads, fording streams and mountains," he writes, "I have the privilege of being the first missionary appointed to exclusive work in the interior." At Pyeng Yang he was cordially received. He found that his medical work brought him into favor with the natives and gave him greater opportunities for preaching the Gospel and distributing the Word than could otherwise have been done.

MISSIONARIES PREPARING TO "MOVE ON PYENG YANG," COREA.

In a letter just received from Dr. Hall, dated Sept. 18, he writes:

"What experiences the past year has brought — trials, persecutions, dangers without—perfect peace within. During April and May, soldiers guarded our houses night and day. We knew not what would befall us but the dear Master has protected us, so nothing has harmed us. Eight years ago our church commenced work here. Up to last year little had been done outside the treaty parts. Again this year, I am appointed to the same work in the interior. How vastly different it is from our work in the parts where we have our fairly comfortable homes with dear ones there, and surrounded by our fellow laborers. As we penetrate this dark kingdom carrying with us this message of salvation, I am sure we shall have the prayers of thousands of warm Christian hearts in America.

"I told you of our little room, eight feet square, in Pyeng Yang, with its mud walls and floor, in which I ate, slept and treated my patients. On my return to Seoul, at the children's meeting, I told about our work and how much we needed a better house in which to do this work for Jesus. The children said, 'Well, Dr. Hall, we will ask God to give you a house!' I shall not forget those prayers—they went straight to the throne and soon the answer came. After the meeting closed Bertie Ohlinger came to my room with a bright silver dollar and said, 'Dr Hall, here is a dollar to help buy a house in Pyeng Yang—I wish I could give more, but it is all I have.' At Christmas he had received two dollars; with one he bought a present for his mother, the other he gave to God. Next came Willa, his sister, a dear little girl of nine, with ten cents. Following her came Augusta Scranton, with fifty cents, saying, 'I was saving it to help buy a piano, but I would rather help with God's work.' It was only one dollar and sixty cents, and the prayers of God's little ones, but he who fed the five thousand with five loaves of bread and two fishes, has multiplied the children's gifts until they have grown in eight months to one thousand four hundred and seventy-nine dollars and ninety-nine cents. To-day we have our building for hospital and dispensary well situated in Pyeng Yang. God has since taken Bertie and Willa home to heaven, but still their work goes on. We wish to express our gratitude to the many dear friends in America and Corea for the deep interest they are manifesting in our work."

Plans for Home Reading.

Rev. Dr. Vincent writing of the benefits to the home circle, of the Chautauquan plan, says: "Many a frontier cabin, southerly plantation, ship on the seas, has felt the influence of the Chautauqua Circle. Wherever there are earnest people who would make life more than dull routine or idle play, Chautauqua is ready to go with a definite plan of reading, with specified books, with hints and suggestions, with a monthly magazine and other means of stimulus and aid. Individual readers may join, even though there be no 'circle' in the community. There is genuine satisfaction in cultivating the intellectual side of one's nature, in accumulating mental measures which are beyond the reach of fickle fortune. There is discipline in it as well. Chautauqua urges that education ends not with school and college days, but with life only, and that every intelligent man or woman is by nature under obligation to obtain all possible self-culture. The Chautauqua course for 1893–94 is very attractive. It deals with the rise and fall of Rome, and with the making of modern Europe during the much maligned Middle Ages. It has to do with the art and letters of those times, and lays the foundation for that thorough knowledge of the nineteenth century which every one should seek, as this great page of history is at the turning point. Do you dread age? The body must grow old, though activity is a wonderful preventive of decay. But the soul! Keep it young. Keep it vigorous. How? Use all its powers. Think; commit to memory; be interested in every good thing. Read good books; make them your own by reviewing and re-reviewing. In short, be a Chautauquan!"

FOUR THINGS.

FOUR things a man must learn to do
If he would make his record true:
To think without confusion clearly;
To love his fellow-men sincerely;
To act from honest motives purely;
To trust in God and heaven securely.

FOUND

A SOUL once sought to find out God—
The holy and the true,
And many weary steps it trod
Before its search was through.
It sought him over all the earth
With unremitting care,
It sought him in the halls of mirth
But did not find him there.

It sought him in the market-place
Where busy men were rife,
In church, 'mid feeble signs of grace,
It found unseemly strife.
It tried amid the laughing throng
Where pleasure seemed to be,
But still the quest seemed vain and long—
God's smile it could not see.

Then to itself this poor soul said,
"My search has been astray,
Surely his love cannot be dead—
I'll look some other way."
It sought him where high hopes prevail,
At court, and everywhere,
Then it looked down through sorrow's vale,
And lo! it found him there.

A PHYSICIAN'S HEROISM.

The death of Mr. William Freer Lucas, a London physician, was due to as real a piece of heroism as ever was rewarded by medal or Victoria Cross. He lately performed an operation on a poor child-patient suffering from diphtheria. While administering chloroform he must have inhaled the patient's breath or been poisoned by the mucus thrown off by the unconscious sufferer in a fit of coughing and spluttering. The child died in a few hours. Three days after Mr. Lucas found himself in the grip of the disease, and was put in the diphtheria ward. From the first, the attack was severe; soon the bronchial tubes, as well as the throat, were affected, and although all that medical science and skill could do was done, the brave young fellow succumbed. This sad instance of the risks of the profession produced a deep feeling in the hospital, and the funeral service in the board room was attended by the members of the surgical and medical staff. The sadness of the case is intensified by the fact that he failed to save the life of the patient as well as sacrificed his own life. Infinitely more sad is it to think that although the Great Physician laid down his life to save the world, thousands, through their own perversity, derive no benefit from the sacrifice.

Economise the Hours.

It is wonderful to see how many hours prompt people contrive to make of a day; it is as if they picked up the moments the dawdlers lost. And if ever you find yourself where you have so many things pressing upon you that you hardly know how to begin, let me tell you a secret: Take hold of the very one that comes to hand, and you will find the rest will all fall into file, and follow after, like a company of well drilled soldiers; and though work may be hard to meet when it charges in a squad, it is easily vanquished if you can bring it into line. You may have often seen the anecdote of the man who was asked how he had accomplished so much in his life. "My father taught me," was the reply, "when I had anything to do, to go and do it." There is the secret—the magic word now!

A Habit to be Avoided.

People in the country more rapidly fall into the habit of scolding than the people in town. Women contract the habit more frequently than men. This may be because they live in a confined and heated atmosphere, very trying to the nervous system and the health in general, and it may be partly that their natures are more susceptible, and their sensitiveness more easily wounded. One case is found in indigestion and dyspepsia. But "bad air" is undoubtedly to be held as the cause of many scoldings which would never have occurred in well-ventilated apartments. By getting into the way of kind words, and seeking to benefit rather than wound one will escape much displeasure, and in time entirely lose the habit.

Woman's Trip to the Sahara.†

FRIENDS advised her not to attempt it. She wrote to me and asked me what I thought. I said it was madness in one of her age to start on such a trip; she would probably have to ride in many places, and how could she sit all day on a horse—she who had reached an age when ladies generally spend life in an easy-chair or in taking mild exercise? How could she travel, except in carriages; and were there carriages in the Desert? I doubted it. Then, again, what about beds? Could she always hope to have a comfortable bed, and was there not danger of her getting stiff and lame from trying to sleep on a hard couch? And the food—what about that? Simplicity of diet was all very well, but everyone should have good and nutritious food, and plenty of it. I knew nothing about the hotels in the Sahara, but I had grave doubts. Then the expense was another matter. She was a poor woman, living on an income that hardly ever reached five hundred dollars, and in which her charities made large holes. Would she be able to accomplish such a trip without great expense? In short, it seemed an impossible undertaking, and so I wrote to her.

She asked other people too, and they all endeavored to dissuade her. The landlord of her hotel in Algiers strongly advised her against going to the Sahara.

'What if you are massacred, mademoiselle? Catastrophes as shuddering sometimes accomplish themselves in the desert.'

'That would certainly put an end to all my travels,' she replied; 'but old women are seldom murdered. Why should anyone kill me? What possible advantage could it be to any human being to take my life? I don't fear anything of the sort.'

'Ah! but mademoiselle knowns not the Arab. He is a creature most depraved. He is eager for plunder. He fears not the police, nor even the Government. The Government reaches him not in the distant oasis.'

'Yes; but why should I be murdered there any more than here in Algiers? What would any one kill me for?

'For your money and your garments.'

'Pshaw! my clothes won't tempt a beggar when I go to the Desert; and as for money, I shall carry but little with me.'

'Ah! but one knows not. I have fear I see you never again.'

'Yes, you will. I shall come out of the Desert all the browner and better for my trip.'

'What if you get lost?' asked another friend, a nervous lady.

'Lost? How can I get lost?' was the reply. 'I may as well be in one place as another. I can't fall out of the world, and, short of that, I don't see how I am to be permanently lost.'

We all objected and protested, but in vain. She was not to be turned back from her purpose. She said she did not mind not having comfortable beds, she would sleep on the ground; she did not want a carriage, she would ride on a camel. She did not want a baggage train, her clothes would go into a hand bag. All she wanted was a couple of dresses, with one change of undergarments, and a waterproof cloak made up of pockets, in which she carried (as it turned out) ink and paper and books, and paint-box, and slippers, and handkerchiefs, and brushes and soap, and pins and needle and thread, and buttons and scissors and her knife. She said, in fact, that would have gone, never would have had that two months of wild life, never would have enriched her portfolio with the Desert flora, never would have seen the Arabs as they live in their own homes, and, in short, never would have taken the most unique and enjoyable trip of her life.

* * * *

Towards three o'clock in the afternoon of a December day in the year 1888, a small party might have been seen approaching the Arab town of Stetin, a fortified place in a southwesterly direction, some 250 miles from Algiers. The expression 'fortified place' is indeed likely to lead the unwary astray, for Stetin is no fortress bristling with guns, nor has it even an earthwork with gaping embrasures. The fortifications of Stetin consist mere of a wall eight feet high, which surrounds the couple of hundred houses that constitute the town. A walled garden in a London suburb has higher 'fortifications' than these which defend Stetin from its foes. The party which was directing its course towards this walled town consisted of three persons: El Ebib, a negro mule-driver, Bel-Ouari, a well-armed spahi, acting as guard and guide, and, finally, the Sid. For all her apparent unsuitableness on the score of age and sex, there never was a person more eminently fitted for travelling in the Desert than the Sid. She can go without food like a camel for an indefinite period, or can dine very blissfully upon rouina, which is wheat roasted and coarsely ground.

The observant stranger is struck with sadness, upon first landing in Valletta, at sight of the swarming hordes of the unemployed who throng the shore and some of the public squares of the city. He sees before him an ignorant, hopeless, poor, hungry mass of humanity, and wonders where these people can obtain sufficient bread to keep them from starving. The manifest poverty of the prolific lower classes of Malta is appalling to the political economist. Who would dare to sound the depth of this sea of human want and misery, the daily lot of these hordes of half-fed men? While looking upon such a scene, a resident with whom we were in company was asked: "Where can this army of poor, portionless creatures bestow themselves at night?" The reply was brief and significant: "They have always the skies over them!"

There are many rich people in Malta, while the churches—supposed emblems of charity, peace and good-will towards men—are uselessly decorated with gold and silver candlesticks, precious stones, costly marbles, valuable tapestry, and priceless works of art, articles as foreign to any true principle of devotion as snow is to the vegetation of the tropics. No one can travel in Spain, Italy, Mexico, or South America—all Roman Catholic countries—without being brought face to face with a similar state of affairs: costly cathedrals and churches crowded with gorgeous display, upon which gold has been recklessly lavished in all possible ways, often surrounded by a ragged and starving populace steeped in ignorance. Is there any amount of sophistry which

On coming out of the magnificently adorned Cathedral of Guadalupe, situated a league from the City of Mexico, not long since, the author was literally dazed by the strong contrast which presented itself. Passing by a dozen steps from within this rich and gorgeous temple, upon which millions of dollars have been lavished, into an atmosphere of the most abject poverty and dismal want was like changing from brightest sunshine into the valley and shadow of death. A half-naked, starving army of beggars—men, women and children—stared one in the face, their cadaverous features and attenuated forms, all too clearly defined, appealing for them with more eloquence than words could do. What sort of religion is that which can hoard jewels of fabulous value, together with plate of gold and silver in its churches, while the poor, crippled, naked multitude starve outside of its towering and gilded walls?

THE TIME OF JESUS' BIRTH.†

THE death of Herod the Great is relied on with most certainty to fix the year of Christ's birth. Josephus, who gives a full account of Herod's death, mentions an eclipse of the moon which occurred shortly before he died, (Ant. 17: 6, 4) This eclipse is the only one alluded to by Josephus, and fixes with absolute certainty the time after which the birth of Jesus could not have occurred, since, according to Matt. 2: 1,6, Jesus was born while Herod was still living. The question to be determined would be the year of this eclipse. Astronomical calculations name an eclipse of the moon March 12 and 13, in the year of Rome 750, and no eclipse occurred the following year that was visible in Palestine. Josephus (Ant. 17: 8, 1), says that Herod died thirty-seven years after he was declared King by the Romans. In 714 he was proclaimed King, and this would bring his death, counting from Nisan to Nisan, as Josephus usually does, "in the year from 1st Nisan 750 to 1st Nisan 751, according to Jewish computation, at the age of seventy" (Andrews). Herod died shortly before the Passover of 750, then, according to the eclipse and the length of his reign. Gaspari contends for Jan. 24, 753, as the date of Herod's death, because there was a total eclipse of the moon Jan. 10. So he puts his death fourteen days later. Mr. Page argues for the eclipse that occurred July 17, 752, as the one preceding Herod's death. He thinks that this makes unnecessary the subtraction of two years from the reign of Tiberius, on the theory that Tiberius was contemporary ruler with Augustus for two years. But he finds difficulty in lengthening Herod's reign so long, and his theory has gained no great acceptance as yet.

Our present era makes the birth of Christ in the year of Rome 754, and is due to the Abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century. Hence it is clear that if Herod died in the early spring of 750, Jesus must have been born at least four years before 754, the common era, and likely in the year 749.

It has been inferred by some that Jesus was at least two or three years old when Herod slaughtered the infants at Bethlehem, Matt. 2: 16. Thus the year would be put two years further back to the end of 749 or beginning of 748. But this is not demanded by the "two years" of Matthew, for Herod would naturally extend the limit so as to be sure to include the child in the number slain, and a child just entering the second year would be called "two years" old by Jewish custom. No more definite note of time comes from this circumstance, save that the massacre probably took place some months before Herod's death, which fact would bring the Saviour's birth back some time into the year 749.

TYNDALE'S STRANGE CUSTOMER.*

THOUSANDS of copies of the Testament were seized in their various disguises, and were burned with solemn ceremony at the old cross of St. Paul's, as "a burnt-offering most pleasing to Almighty God;" and still other thousands supplied their place. Tyndale was but little discouraged at their efforts, for he knew the printing press could defy them all. "In burning the book," he says, "they did none other thing than I looked for; no more shall they do if they burn me also, if it be God's will that it should be so."

It was quite clear that they could not hinder the entrance of the book into England. And then a brilliant thought occurred to the Bishop of London. He sought out Augustine Pakington a merchant trading to Antwerp, and asked his opinion about the buying up of all the copies across the water.

"My lord," replied Pakington, who was a secret friend of Tyndale, "if it be your pleasure I could do in this matter probably more than any merchant in England; so if it be your lordship's pleasure to pay for them—for I must disburse money for them—I will insure you to have every book that remains unsold."

"Gentle Master Pakington," said the bishop, 'deemyng that he hadde God by the toe, whanne in truthe he hadde, as after he thought, the devyl by the fiste,' "do your diligence and get them for me, and I will gladly give you whatever they may cost, for the books are naughty, and I intend surely to destroy them all, and to burn them at Paul's Cross."

A few weeks later Pakington sought the translator, whose funds he know were at a low ebb.

"Master Tyndale," he said, "I have found you a good purchaser for your books."

"Who is he?" asked Tyndale.

"My lord of London."

"But if the bishop wants the books it must be only to burn them."

"Well," was the reply, "what of that? The bishop will burn them anyhow, and it is best that you should have the money for the enabling you to print others instead."

And so the bargain was made. "The bishop had the books, Pakington had the thanks, and Tyndale had the money."

THE GOOD OF BEING IN COLLEGE.†

College education gives a certain openness of mind and heart. Matthew Arnold said that a serious lack in the English nation was the lack of lucidity. Lucidity is an intellectual quality, but it has ethical and emotional affiliations. The college man has this quality more than most. Mr. Arnold also divided society into three classes: an upper class, which is materialized, a lower class, which is brutalized, and a middle class, which is vulgarized. From these three curses of being vulgarized, brutalized, materialized, the college tends to give freedom. And the method by which the college achieves this freedom I call a certain openness of mind and heart. This openness of mind and heart is akin to largeness of character; it is opposed to narrowness of any kind; it is freedom from the miserly spirit; it is a willingness to receive light; it is the appreciation of the best in men and things; it embodies sympathy; it is responsive to the best ideals and worthiest methods; it makes one liberal without looseness, and fosters the holding of opinions with firmness but without bigotry. The perils of the self-made man—and many self-made men have perished in making through these perils—are narrowness and hardness. They have bought their success at the cost of the largeness of their mental constitution and of the tenderness of their heart. Heavy price to pay—some would say too heavy, others that the success is worth the price. But the college man is seldom called upon to pay this price. He is able to win, keeping his intellectual vision large, his heart warm, and his energies strong, without any faculty suffering.

TREE PLANTING ON THE MESA.‡

The mesa was surrounded on three sides by spurs of the mountains, behind which rose the sublime summits of the Sierras into the cloudless sky. To the south the ground fell away almost precipitously, givine a view of the great valley with its varied hues melting into distance, and bounded by the silver line of ocean.

They went out together and watched the tree planting, and then the girls prepared the most festal meal which the resources of the house afforded, and at which Mr. Thornton, unbending to an extraordinary degree, became positively sociable, told some old-time stories, and encouraged Oliver in his alarming sayings.

When the planting was resumed, Mr. Burton proposed that each one of the family should set out a tree, to be called after his or her own name. Accordingly, the places were made ready, two for Mr. Burton, for the tree next to his own he set in memory of the dear lost mother of his children. Elaine's came next, and as she set it in its place, a momentary look of sadness passed over her bright face, remembering that while her tree would be growing with its fellows, she herself would have taken root in a distant home. Then came Chrissie's tree and the others.

By sundown a goodly number of orange and lemon trees stood bravely in the rich, brown earth, and already seemed to feel conscious that a career of honor and usefulness had opened before them on the mesa.

Hood's Is a Blessing

To the suffering. Ever since I was in camp in '62, when I caught a severe cold, I have suffered with kidney trouble and severe pains in my back, and have been unable to do any heavy work. After I had the grip last spring, I had a bad cough, was very weak, in fact my system was completely run down. I tried a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla and it made me feel so much better that I have taken six bottles. It has done

THE BIBLE IN ECUADOR AND PERU

Rev. T. B. Wood, a Methodist clergyman in Peru, writing to The Gospel in all Lands, says: "The year 1892 will be notable in the history of the republic of Ecuador for the beginning of the preaching in that "branch of the Vatican" (sucursal del Vaticano), as Penzotti calls it. He and Fernandez tried to introduce a quantity of Bibles, but were estopped in the custom-house. Nevertheless, they were allowed to take in a number of copies of the Scriptures along with their baggage, and these they sold publicly in the city of Guayaquil. They found there a Peruvian family named Castro with moral courage sufficient to open their house for services. At the first there was an audience of ten, all men. Other meetings followed, with increasing numbers, including both sexes. When the brethren came to leave the city they were accompanied at their embarkation by a group of friends who did not hesitate to show them notable marks of attachment and appreciation, and that publicly. No small excitement had spread through the city with news of the meetings. Doubtless a pretext would have been found for imprisoning them if they had remained long. As it was, the authorities knew they were soon to leave, as their books had been left in the custom-house for re-exportation.

"Since then Brother Irigoyen has been selling Bibles and hymn books in the Peruvian provinces nearest to Ecuador with such success that his family has been moved from Callao to that region, making it a centre of operations."

A BIBLE LEAF BROUGHT SALVATION.

A poor man who had spent a life of ignorance and sin, was found by a London clergyman apparently dying in a miserable garret. He was in great anxiety of mind from an apparently accidental cause. A stray leaf torn from a Testament had caught his eye. It was part of Rom. iii. He had read the vivid description of the ungodly man which that chapter contains, and saw its application to his own case. But where was the remedy, and where the Gospel? Alas! the paper was torn off in the middle of the 21st verse, "But now the righteousness of God without the law . . . . ." "Is what!" said the anxious man. "Do the next words give any hope of such a sinner as I" The remainder of the chapter was read and explained simply to him, and the Gospel was "as cold water to a thirsty soul."

For Dyspepsia

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. [illegible] White, Pittsfield, Mass., says: "I can recommend it as a prompt and efficient remedy. In the exhaustion of all other remedies, I attribute the restoration to health of a patient who was emanciated to the last degree, in consequence of nervous prostration and dyspepsia. This patient's stomach was in such an irritable condition that he could not bear either liquid or solid food. An accomplished physician of many years' experience, whom I called in consultation, pronounced his case an incurable one. At this stage I decided to use Horsford's Acid Phosphate, which resulted as above mentioned."

IN ANSWER

A HEARTFELT longing, yet undefined,
To dwell in a higher sphere,
Where harmony, love and peace combined
Soothe back each rising tear.

Then gently there steals a healing balm
Into this yearning heart;
It comes unasked with a quieting calm
In which earth can have no part.

And I know that God, in that tender love
Which marks e'en the sparrow's fall,
Has lent His sweet presence from above
To my soul's unconscious call.

GRACE H. SHARP.

'A PLAYRIGHT'S CONVERSION.

"Parsian literary society," says the Paris correspondent of the London Daily News, "is greatly exercised at present over a remarkable change through which one of their number, M. Albin Valabregue, has lately passed. His frinds, who generally belong to a brilliant but fast set, have noticed with astonishment his all but complete disappearance from their literary haunts and his evident distaste for certain of their frivolities. Their astonishment has grown into amazement on learning that the merry author of several scores of comedies and farces, as broad as the playreader would allow, is about to publish a book called "The Word of God." M. Valabregue, who was not particularly qualified for a theologian either by birth—he is a Jew—or by his education, which was that of Free Thought, has, to use his own words, "received the revelation of Christian mysteries in their sublime truth, not only in a state of wakefulness, but in a state of absolute calm and reason." The author of the Premier Mari de France, a farce of the most audacious description, which is having an extraordinary run at the Varietes, intends to show that the true God is Christ, and that never such another Word will enlighten this planet."

WHERE TWO SEAS MEET.

"Off Cape Horn," says Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, "we witnessed a singular sight. For some miles there was a narrow strip of water, where the great waves flew in broken spray and dashed high over the ship. On either side the sea was comparatively calm, whilst this boiled with fury, rolling and surging. Yet there was no rock about which the sea surged, nor was there any such fierce wind as to account for it. Overhead the air was thick with sea-fowl. Thousands of the birds dived into this troubled water. The smaller fish were, I suppose, flung up by the toss, and thus fell a prey to the birds. I asked, naturally, what was the reason of this strange sight, and found it was the point at which the tide met the strong current of the sea, and here they raged together. Within, the tide only ran, and it was calm. Without, the current prevailed, and there, too, was calm. On this troubled bit they met and neither prevailed. It is the picture of those who are at once too religious to belong to the world—too worldly to belong to religion; torn by both and satisfied by neither." Pastor Spurgeon used to say that men who try to hold with the hare and yet run with the hounds must not be surprised if the dogs bite them.

THE FOUNTAIN CRITICISED.

A certain man placed a fountain by the wayside, and he hung a cup near it by a little chain. He was told some time afterward that a great art critic had found much fault with his design as being lacking in the artistic quality, being in fact a blemish on the landscape. "But," he said, "do many persons drink at it?" Then they told him that thousands of people—men, women and children—slaked their thirst at the fountain. He smiled, and answered, that he was little troubled by the critic's observations, only that he hoped that on some sultry summer's day, the critic himself might fill the cup and be refreshed. Something like this the Bible has to undergo. Learned men complain of many things in it, point out that it is unscientific, although it does not profess to teach science, and point out other deficiencies in it; but it satisfies the spiritual thirst of millions and those are happiest who do not criticize it but drink of its living waters.

A TRAVELLER'S CONFESSION.

As remarks disparaging foreign mission work are often published by the daily press the wide publication of the following fact is but common justice: "Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, whose writings, especially her two volumes on Unbeaten Tracks in Japan, have interested a multitude of readers, has recently spoken of her change of views in regard to missionary work, of which she has seen so much. She has not merely passed through, but has lived in several lands where missionary work has been carried on, and has seen all sides of it, and her testimony is as clear as it is gratifying. She says: 'I am a convert to missions through seeing missions and the need of them. Some years ago I took no interest whatever in the condition of the heathen. I had heard much ridicule cast upon Christian missions, and perhaps had imbibed some of the unhallowed spirit. But the missionaries, by their lives and character and by the work they are doing wherever I have seen them, have produced in my mind such a change and such an enthusiasm, as I might almost express it, in favor of Christian missions, that I cannot go anywhere without speaking about them and trying to influence others in their favor who may be as indifferent as I was before I went among heathen countries."

A Missionary Martyr.

Harrison R. Thornton, a Gospel Pioneer, Murdered in Alaska—Mrs. Thornton's Touching Recital—The Close of a Brave, Consecrated Life.

HARDSHIPS and peril are the lot of the missionary, in whatosever part of the globe he finds his field of labor. Hundreds of noble, consecrated lives have been laid down for the work in Africa, in Polynesia, Australia and among the semi-savage peoples of Asia. In our own land, too, we have a record of martyrdom in the early days, and the roll of sacrifice is even yet incomplete. Late mails from Alaska bring intelligence of the death, at the hands of the Eskimo, of Harrison R. Thornton, a young missionary who, for some time past, had been stationed with his wife at Cape Prince of Wales, Alaska, where they had opened up a promising Gospel field. This event occurred on August 10th last, the crime having been committed by a native desperado named Titalk, aided by two other young Eskimos, who had been guilty of various depredations. All three murderers fled immediately after the deed of blood was finished, but the other natives, many of whom loved their missionary, pursued and killed two. Titalk, the leader of the trio, although wounded, suceeded in escaping to the mountains.

Mrs. Thornton, who has returned to her home in Auburn, Me., has furnished to the American Missionary Association, under whose auspices she and her husband labored, the details of Mr. Thornton's martyrdom. From her story it would appear that drink, the deadliest foe of missionary progress, was the cause of stirring up an otherwise peaceful and affectionate people to violence, which resulted in a series of attempts on the missionary's life. "We did not fear the people when they were sober, but feared from the whiskey, for when they were drunk they shot at us," she wrote afterward. "We feared the chief, Elignok, the one who shot at us last fall, but I think later in the summer we feared more from the three boys who broke into the schoolhouse several times. The leader, Titalk, is considered by all the natives in the village a desperado. He steals from the natives. He could hardly be considered a pupil, for he was expelled from the school on account of breaking into the schoolhouse. They had broken in several times recently. From the fact of their breaking into the schoolhouse and not being punished, we thought that the other natives would see that we were without protection. Then there was a quantity of whiskey brought over this year, and at last Mr. Thornton so felt the danger that he had decided we had better not stay for the winter. Everything was arranged for us to leave, and we had fastened up all we could, expecting that the steamer Bear would be up there about the 1st of September.

"On Saturday night, the 19th of August," Mrs Thornton's narrative continues, "about midnight, we were both of us awakened by a very loud rap. It was very, very dark. We thought that perhaps some one was sick and needed medicine, for the people were all very friendly and were in the habit of coming to us. Mr. Thornton felt sure that no one was going to harm us, and when he went out he said he might be gone a few minutes. Everything was quiet, and oh! the first thing I heard was an awful report. The hole in the door was the size of a door-knob, and the bullet had gone straight through. This was done with a whaling gun, but there was also a rifle shot in the door. The whaling gun was so close to the outside door that the door was burned. The shot came through and cut his body. How he ever did it, I do not know; but Mr. Thornton shut both doors as he came toward me. He said in quite a strong voice, 'I am shot.' Then I lighted a lamp, for it was dark. He was just inside the sitting-room door, unconscious, and covered with blood. He did not move; I do not think he suffered; he was not conscious; he could not speak. I stayed in the room and walked to and fro until daylight; then I looked through the hole in the door and saw the whaling gun, and lying down beside it, a shoulder gun. I opened the window, and looking out saw a boy halfway between our house and the next. I did not dare to go out, and I took the field-glass and looked out, and thought it was surely Titalk. When he was gone I went to one of the windows and shouted to Ipsenook, an Eskimo who lived two or three hundred yards from our house to come out."

MISSIONARIES AND ALASKAN NATIVES AT CAPE PRINCE OF WALES.
(Messrs. Thornton and Lopp are recognized by their white fur head coverings.)

This native was friendly. His wife came out and together they went over to the missionary's house, and lifted the body of the murdered missionary from the floor to a couch. Then Ipsenook went out and soon shooting was heard and Mrs. Thornton was presently asked to step out. When she did so, the natives showed her the bodies of Titalk's two associates, whom they had just slain. The vengeance that overtook these two murderers was swift indeed!

Ipsenook, his wife and daughter cared for Mrs. Thornton very kindly. She found an opportunity to send a letter by a trusty native to Captain Healy of the steamer Bear, telling him of the death of her husband and her own peril, and asking him to stop at Port Clarence and convey her to San Francisco. On the following day she set out for Port Clarence, in escort of some friendly natives. On the arrival of the Bear, Captain Healy sent them on shore and with the assistance of the natives, the body of the murdered missionary was laid

THE "IFS" OF THE BIBLE.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Exodus 32: 32, "If thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book."

THERE is in our English language a small conjunction, which I propose, by God's help, to haul out of its present insignificancy and set upon the throne where it belongs, and that is the conjunction "If." Though made of only two letters it is the pivot on which everything turns. All time and all eternity are at its disposal. We slur it in our utterance, we ignore it in our appreciation, and none of us recognize it as the most tremendous word in all the vocabulary outside of those words which describe Deity. If! Why that word we take as a tramp among words now appearing here, now appearing there, but having no value of its own, when it really has a millionaire-dom of worlds, and in its train walk all planetary, stellar, lunar, solar destinies. If the boat of leaves, made water-tight, in which infant Moses sailed the Nile, had sunk, who would have led Israel out of Egypt? If the Red Sea had not parted for the escape of one host, and then come together for the submergence of another host, would the Book of Exodus ever have been written? If the ship on which Columbus sailed for America had gone down in an Atlantic cyclone, how much longer would it have taken for the discovery of this continent? If Grouchy had come up with reinforcements in time to give the French the victory at Waterloo, what would have been the fate of Europe? If the Spanish Armada had not been wrecked off the coast, how different would have been many chapters in English history. If the battle of Hastings, or the battle of Pultowa, or the battle of Valmy, or the battle of Metaurus, or the battle of Arbela, or the battle of Chalons, each one of which turned the world's destiny, had been decided the other way. If Shakespeare had never been born for the drama, or Handel had never been born for music, or Titian had never been born for painting, or Thorwaldsen had never been born for sculpture, or Edmund Burke had never been born for eloquence, or Socrates had never been born for philosophy, or Blackstone had never been born for the law, or Copernicus had never been born for astronomy, or Luther had never been born for the reformation! Oh, that conjunction "If!" How much has depended on it. The height of it, the depth of it, the length of it, the breadth of it, the immensity of it, the infinity of it, who can measure? It would swamp anything but Omnipotence. But I must confine myself to-day to the "Ifs" of the Bible, and in doing so I shall speak of the "If" of overpowering earnestness, the "If" of incredulity, the "If" of threat, the "If" of argumentation, the "If" of eternal significance, or so many of these "Ifs" as I can compass in the time that may be reasonably allotted to pulpit discourse.

First, the "If" of overpowering earnestness. My text gives it. The Israelites have been worshipping an idol, notwithstanding all that God had done for them, and now Moses offers the most vehement prayer of all history, and it turns upon an "If." "If thou wilt forgive their sins;—and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book." Oh, what an overwhelming "If?" It was as much as to say, "If thou wilt not pardon them, do not pardon me; if thou wilt not bring them to the Promised Land, let me never see the Promised Land; if they must perish let me perish with them; in that book where thou recordest their doom, record my doom; if they are shut out of heaven, let me be shut out of heaven; if they go down into darkness, let me go down into darkness." What vehemence and holy recklessness of prayer! Yet there are those here who, I have no doubt, have, in their all-absorbing desire to have others saved, risked the same prayer, for it is a risk. You must not make it, unless you are willing to balance your eternal salvation on such an "If." Yet there have been cases where a mother has been so anxious for the recovery of a wayward son that her prayer has swung and trembled and poised on an "If" like that of the text. "If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book. Write his name in the Lamb's Book of Life, or turn to the page where my name was written ten or twenty or forty or sixty years ago and with the black ink of everlasting midnight erase my first name and my last name and all my name. If he is to go into shipwreck, let me be tossed amid the same breakers. If he cannot be a partner in my bliss, let me be a partner in his woe. I have for many years loved thee, O God! and it has been my expectation to sit with Christ and all the redeemed at the banquet of the skies, but I now give up my promised place at the feast, and my promised robe, and my promised crown and my promised throne, unless John, unless George, unless Henry, unless my darling son can share them with me. Heaven will be no heaven without him. O God, save my boy, or count me among the lost." That is a terrific prayer, and yet there is a young man sitting in the pew on the main floor, or in the lower gallery, or in the top gallery, who has already crushed such a prayer from his mother's heart. He hardly ever writes home, or, living at home, what does he care how much trouble he gives her? Her tears are no more to him than the rain that drops from the eaves of the house on a dark night. The fact that she does not sleep because watching for his return late at night does not choke his laughter or hasten his step forward. She has tried coaxing and kindness and self-sacrifice and all the ordinary prayers that mothers make for their children, and all have failed. She is coming toward the vivid and venturesome and terrific prayer of my text. She is going to lift her own eternity and set it upon that one "If," by which she expects to decide whether you will go up with her or she down with you. She may be this moment looking heavenward, and saying: "O Lord, reclaim him by thy grace," and then adding that heart-rending "If" of my text: "If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book." After three years of absence a son wrote his mother in one of the New England whaling villages that he was coming home in a certain ship. Mother-like, she stood watching, and the ship was in the offing, but a fearful storm struck it and dashed the ship on the rocks that night. All that night the mother prayed for the safety of the son, and just at dawn there was a knock at the cottage door, and the son entered, crying out, "Mother, I knew you would pray me home!" If I would ask all those in this assemblage who have been prayed home to God by pious mothers to stand up, there would be scores that would stand, and if I should ask them to give testimony it would be the testimony of that New England son coming ashore from the split timbers of the whaling ship, 'My mother prayed me home!"

Another Bible "If" is the "If" of incredulity. Satan used it, when Christ, with his vitality depressed by forty days' abstinence from food, the tempter pointed to some stones, in color and shape like loaves of bread, and said: "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread." That was appropriate, for Satan is the father of that "If" of incredulity. Peter used that same "If" when, standing on the wet and slippery deck of a fishing-smack of Lake Galilee, he saw Christ walking on the sea as though it were as solid as a pavement of basalt from the adjoining volcanic hills, and Peter cried out: "If it be Thou, let me come to Thee on the water." What a preposterous "If!" What human foot was ever so constructed as to walk on water? In what part of the earth did law of gravitation make exception to the rule that a man will sink to the elbows when he touches the wave of river or lake, and will sink still further unless he can swim? But here Peter looks out upon the form in the shape of a man defying the mightiest law of the universe, the law of gravitation, and standing erect on the top of the liquid. Yet the incredulous Peter cries out to the Lord, "If it be Thou." Alas! for that incredulous "If." It is working as powerfully in the latter part of this nineteenth Christian century as it did in the early part of the first Christian century. Though a small conjunction, it is the biggest block to-day in the way of the Gospel chariot. "If!" "If!" We have theological seminaries which spend most of their time and employ their learning and their genius in the manufacturing of "Ifs." With that weaponry is assailed the Pentateuch, and the miracles and the divinity of Jesus Christ. Almost everybody is chewing on an "If." When many a man bows for prayer, he puts his knee on an "If." The door through which people pass into infidelity and atheism and all immoralities has two door-posts, and the one is made up of the letter "I" and the other of the letter "F."

There are only four steps between strong faith and complete unbelief. First, surrender the idea of the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures, and adopt the idea that they were all generally supervised by the Lord. Second, surrender the idea that they were all generally supervised by the Lord, and adopt the theory that they were not all, but partly supervised by the Lord. Third, believe that they are the gradual evolution of the ages, and men wrote according to the wisdom of the times in which they lived. Fourth, believe that the Bible is a bad book and not only unworthy of credence but pernicious and debasing and cruel. Only four steps from the stout faith in which the martyrs died to the blatant caricature of Christianity as the greatest sham of the centuries. But the door to all that precipitation and horror is made out of an "If." The mother of unrests in the minds of Christian people and in those who regard sacred things is the "If" of incredulity. In 1879, in Scotland, I saw a letter which had been written many years ago by Thomas Carlyle to Thomas Chalmers. Carlyle, at the time of writing the letter, was a young man. The letter was not to be published until after the death of Carlyle. His death having taken place, the letter ought to be published. It was a letter in which Thomas Carlyle expresses the tortures of his own mind while relaxing his faith in Christianity, while, at the same time, he expresses his admiration for Dr. Chalmers, and in which Carlyle wishes that he had the same faith that the great Scotch minister evidently exercised. Nothing that Thomas Carlyle ever wrote in "Sartor Resartus," or the "French Revolution," or his "Life of Cromwell," or his immortal "Essays," had in it more wondrous power than that letter which bewailed his own doubts and extolled the strong faith of another. I made an exact copy of that letter, with the understanding it should not be published until after the death of Thos. Carlyle, but, returning to my hotel in Edinburgh, I felt uneasy lest somehow that letter should get out of my possession and be published before its time. So I took it back to the person by whose permission I had copied it. All reasons for its privacy having vanished, I wish it might be published.

Perhaps this sermon finding its way into a Scottish home may suggest its printing, for that letter shows more mightily than anything I have ever read the difference between the "I know" of Paul and the "I know" of Job and the "I know" of Thomas Chalmers and the "I know" of all those who hold with a firm grip the old Gospel on the one hand, and the unmooring, bestorming and torturing "If" of incredulity on the other. I like the positive faith of that sailor boy that Captain Judkins of the steamship "Scotia" picked up in a hurricane. "Go aloft!" said Captain Judkins to his mate, "and look out for wrecks." Before the mate had gone far up the ratlines, he shouted "A wreck! a wreck!" "Where away?" said Captain Judkins. "Off the port bow," was the answer. Life-boats were lowered, and forty men volunteered to put out across the angry sea for the wreck. They came back with a dozen ship-wrecked, and among them a boy of twelve years. "Who are you?" said Captain Judkins. The answer was: "I am a Scotch boy. My father and mother are dead and I am on my way to America." What have you here?" said Captain Judkins, as he opened the boy's jacket and took hold of a rope around the boy's body. "It is a rope," said the boy. "But what is that tied by this rope under your arm?" "That, sir, is my mother's Bible. She told me never to lose that." "Could you not have saved something else?" "Not and saved that." "Did you expect to go down?" "Yes, sir, but I meant to take my mother's Bible down with me." "Bravo!" said Captain Judkins, "I will take care of you." That boy demonstrated a certainty and a confidence that I like. Just in proportion as you have few "Ifs" of incredulity in your religion, will you find it a comfortable religion. My full and unquestioning faith in it is founded on the fact that it soothes and sustains in time of trouble. I do not believe that any man who ever lived had more blessings and prosperity than I have received from God and the world. But I have had trouble enough to allow me opportunity for finding out whether our religion is of any use in such exigency. I have had fourteen great bereavements, to say nothing of lesser bereavements, for I was the youngest of a large family. I have had as much persecution as comes to most people. I have had all kinds of trial, except severe and prolonged sickness, and I would have been dead long ago but for the consolatory power of our religion.

Another Bible "If," is the "If" of eternal significance. Solomon gives us that "If" twice in one sentence, when he says: "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." Christ gives us that "If" when he says: "If thou hadst known in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace, but now they are hidden from thine eyes." Paul gives us that "If" when he says: "If they shall enter into my rest." All those "Ifs" and a score more that I might recall put the whole responsibility of our salvation on ourselves. Christ's willingness to pardon: No "If" about that. Christ's willingness to help: No "If" about that. Realms of glory awaiting the righteous: No "If" about that. The only "If" in all the case worth a moment's consideration, is the "If" that attaches itself to the question as to whether we will accept, whether we will repent, whether we will believe, whether we will rise forever. Oh, decide. Perhaps your arrival here to-day may decide. Stranger things than that have put to flight forever the "If" of uncertainty.

A few Sabbath nights ago in this church, a man, passing at the foot of the pulpit, said to me: "I am a miner from England," and then he pushed back his coat sleeve and said: "Do you see that scar on my arm?" I said, "Yes. You must have had an awful wound there some time." He said: "Yes, it nearly cost me my life. I was in a mine in England six hundred feet under ground and three miles from the shaft of the mine, and a rock fell on me, and my fellow-laborer pried off the rock, and I was bleeding to death, and he took a newspaper from around his luncheon and bound it around my wound, and then helped me over the three miles underground to the shaft, where I was lifted to the top, and when that newspaper was taken off my wound, I read on it something that saved my soul, and it was one of your sermons. Good-night," he said as he passed on, leaving me transfixed with grateful emotion.

And who knows but the words I now speak, blessed of God, may reach some wounded soul deep down in the black mine of sin, and that these words may be blessed to the staunching of the wound and the eternal life of the soul? Settle this matter instantly, positively and forever. Slay the last "If." Bury deep the last "if." How to do it? Fling body, mind and soul in a prayer as earnest as that of Moses in the text. Can you doubt the earnestness of this prayer of the text? It is so heavy with emotion that it breaks down in the middle. It was so earnest that the translators in the modern copies of the Bible were obliged to put a mark, a straight line, a dash, for an omission that will never be filled up. Such an abrupt pause, such a sudden snapping off of the sentence. You cannot parse my text. It is an offense to grammatical construction. But that dash put in by the type-setters is mightily suggestive. "If thou wilt forgive their sin (then comes the dash)—; "and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book." A prayer may have in style the gracefulness of an Addison, and the sublimity of a Milton, and the epigrammatic force of an Emerson, and yet be a failure, having a horizontal power but no perpendicular power, horizontal power reaching the ear of man, but no perpendicular power reaching the ear of God.

Between the first and the last sentences of my text there was a paroxysm of earnestness too mighty for words. It will take half of an eternity to tell of all the answers of earnest and faithful prayer. In his last journal, David Livingstone, in Africa, records the prayer so soon to be answered: "19 March—Birthday. My Jesus, my God, my Life, my All, I again dedicate my whole self to thee. Accept me, and grant O gracious Father that ere this year is gone, I may finish my task. In Jesus' name, I ask it. Amen." When the dusky servant looked into Livingston's tent and found him dead on his knees, he saw that the prayer had been answered.

There is only one kind of prayer in which you need to put the "If," and that is the prayer for temporal blessings. Pray for riches and they may engulf us, or for fame and it may bewitch us, or for worldly success of any sort and it may destroy us. Better say "If it be best," "If I can make proper use of it," "If Thou seest I need it." A wife, praying for the recovery of her husband from illness, stamped her foot and said with frightful emphasis, "I will not have him die; God shall not take him." Her prayer was answered, but a few years after, the community was shocked by the fact that he had in a moment of anger slain her. A mother, praying for a son's recovery from illness, told the Lord he had no right to take him, and the boy recovered, but plunged into all abominations and died a renegade. Better in all such prayers and all prayers pertaining to our temporal welfare, put an "If," saying, "If it be Thy will!" But praying for spiritual good and the salvation of our soul we need never insert an "If." Our spiritual welfare is sure to be for the best, and away with the "Ifs."

Abraham's prayer for the rescue of Sodom was a grand prayer in some respects but there were six "Ifs" in it, or "peradventures," which mean the same thing "Peradventure there may be fifty righteous in the city, peradventure forty-five, peradventure forty, peradventure thirty, peradventure twenty peradventure ten." Those six peradventures, those six "Ifs," killed the prayer and Sodom went down and went under. Nearly all the prayers that were answered had no "Ifs" in them. The prayer of Elijah that changed dry weather to wet weather. The prayer that changed Hezekiah from a sick man to a well man. Oh, rally your soul for a prayer with no "Ifs" in it. Say in substance, "Lord, thou hast promised pardon and I take it. Here are my wounds, heal them. Here are my chains of bondage, by the Gospel hammer strike them off. I am fleeing to the City of Refuge and I am sure this is the right way. Thanks be to God, I am free."

Once, by the law, my hopes were slain,
But now, in Christ, I live again.

With the Mosaic earnestness of my text and without its Mosaic "Ifs," let us cry out for God. Aye, if words fail us, let us take the suggestion of that printer's dash of the text, and with a wordless silence implore pardon and comfort and life and heaven. For this assemblage, all of whom I shall meet in the last judgment, I dare not offer the prayer of my text, and so I change it, and say: "Lord God, forgive our sins, and write our names in the book of thy loving remembrance, from which they shall never be blotted out."

A MISSIONARY MARTYR.

to rest to await the resurrection. A simple cross of wood, with an inscription, marks the spot.

There was great mourning in the little Alaskan village, where the missionaries, through their loving labor, had endeared themselves to the hearts of the natives. It is not believed that the good work, so well begun there, will be abandoned, and doubtless, courageous and devoted men and women, will be found to carry it forward.

The American Missionary Society's station at Cape Prince of Wales was established in July 1890. It is located on the extreme western western point of the North American continent, forty-six miles from East Cape, Siberia, and 1000 miles north of Sitka, 3000 north of San Francisco, and just south of the Arctic circle. It is the largest mission station in Alaska. The natives live in underground houses, ill-ventilated and ill-lighted, and their food is almost exclusively flesh and fish. Many are wretchedly poor, vermin-infested and drunken. Every summer, nine-tenths of the natives go up to Kotzebue Sound to catch salmon and to attend a grand fair or fur-trading market to which thousands of the Eskimos of that section resort. Thus the Christianized Cape Prince of Wales natives become apostles to spread Christianity and civilization through that whole section of Alaska. They make frequent trading trips in summer to Siberia. The church of Russia (the Greek church) is doing nothing for the Siberian natives; and almost the only apparent means of saving the immortal souls of these countless Siberian and interior Alaskan Eskimos would seem to lie in the vigorous prosecution of the work at the station at Cape Prince of Wales.

THE LATE HARRISON R. THORNTON, MISSIONARY.
Martyred at Cape Prince of Wales, Alaska.

The work is threefold: religious, educational, and philanthropic. The late Mr. Harrison R. Thornton of Hampden, Sidney, Va., and Mr. W. T. Lopp of Valley City, Ind., were the workers selected by the American Missionary Association to open up the field. Mr. Thornton was last year united in marriage to Miss Neda Pratt while on a vacation in the East and he was accompanied on his return by his wife and Miss Ellen L. Kittredge, who, a few months after reaching Alaska, was married to Mr. Lopp. There were thus two Christian families as teachers and ensamples among the savages on the westernmost verge of the continent. They found that the Eskimos had no regularly systematized religion, although they believed vaguely in a future existence and in spirits, etc. During the first school year 304 were enrolled, the average attendance being 109 and during the last five months 156. This is the largest mission school in Alaska. The mission house is a substantial wooden building. The progress of the pupils during the first session amazed the missionaries. Almost the only discipline needed to secure order and obedience was exclusion from the schoolroom, a fact which shows the high value their pupils set upon the privileges of education. At one time the Eskimo boys and girls began to use the roof of the house as a toboggan slide, for they are as full of life and fun as American children; but a suspension of school for one day broke up the habit.

That the natives, under Christian influences, are kind and docile, has been proved in a thousand ways by their conduct toward the missionaries. The latter busied themselves in teaching, doctoring, hunting, repairing, reading and explaining. "Charley," and "Mary," two Christianized Eskimos from St. Michaels, were their cooks and housekeepers. They were totally secluded from the civilized world and communication with the rest of mankind was only possible at long intervals, a mail coming but once a year!

Trouble was experienced occasionally with the native "doctors" or "medicine men." "Our new school bell," wrote Mr. Lopp some time ago, "has not been received with universal favor. In October, a short time after we had put it on top of the house, Doctor Oomalig-zrock, after consulting the Toonwooks (spirits), informed me that the tone of the bell would keep foxes and seals away and requested me not to ring it." . . "Another of this class tried to convince the people by a series of trials that he was a big doctor. While seal-hunting, he pretended to shoot himself through the body with an express rifle. When he had recovered and found many still doubting, he had a man to shoot him twice in the presence of twenty or thirty people. Although blood flowed freely from his mouth they still doubted, saying that no one saw that the cartridge contained a ball. Later while hunting, he claimed to shoot himself with buckshot in the head, but the people still pronounced him a fraud. During the winter, a young 'medicine man' at Ke-gik-tuk pretended to make money, ammunition, whiskey, tobacco, etc. He also was doubted, and in a short time after pretending to do these miraculous things was shot dead, because he had threatened the lives of three or four men (i.e., according to Eskimo custom, 'in self-defense'). The power and influence of these spirits seems to be on the decline. Many of the people believe in them only when it is convenient."

The Eskimos, as a race, are not given to violence, yet when their passions are influenced by drink, they are capable of almost any crime. There are some among them, as in all countries, who are apparently worthless and renegade and the desperado, Titalk and his companions, apparently belonged to this class who live drunken, quarrelsome lives. Some time before the fatal attack on Mr. Thornton, several times last summer, the free use of liquor among the natives came very near to producing a series of tragedies. One native was shot and killed by another for a slight grudge, both being drunk. An intoxicated native on the beach fired at Mr. and Mrs. Thornton, but fortunately missed; another in the same maudlin state threatened them with a knife. Mr. Thornton would almost seem to have had a premonition of what afterward happened when he wrote, a few months ago: "When sober, the natives are friendly, but for the most part grateful for the benefits conferred upon them by the mission, but when drunk, a vague recollection of the Gilly affair in 1877, in which thirteen natives were killed by white men, might cause the death of some of us. The more they fall a prey to designing white men the more we feel they need us." Mr. Lopp had left Cape Prince of Wales and assumed charge of the government reindeer station at Port Clarence, where 180 domesticated deer had been introduced during the year for the benefit of the natives. For the present, therefore, the mission station at the former place is without a teacher; but the Lord, having established his Word by the hands and hearts of faithful servants there, will not permit it to suffer, and will in due time raise up a successor to the faithful missionary who has passed to his reward—a martyr for the truth in Alaska.

The portrait of Mr. Thornton on this page is engraved from a photograph in The American Missionary. On the first page, missionaries Thornton and Lopp, in winter clothing, are seen grouped with three natives, one a walrus hunter, with poised spear; another a "magic-maker," with native drum, and a third holding a spiked club, such as are used in securing game. The village of Kasa-an—a typical Alaskan Eskimo settlement—but much nearer to civilization than Cape Prince of Wales, is shown in another illustration, with its quaintly carved "totems," indicating that at no remote period the Alaskans were "nature worshippers," each "totem" representing the special deity of a clan or family.

Alaska is a field ripe for the Gospel. Dr. Sheldon Jackson, government superintendent of education in Alaska, mentions a typical case. Referring to the deserted mission on the island of St. Lawrence, midway between Alaska and Siberia, which island was nearly depopulated by whiskey some years ago, he writes: "The unoccupied mission building has been purchased by two believers in missions. It has stood empty for some years, with a small supply of coal still in it, and yet all is unmolested, in spite of the actual sufferings of the people for fuel. These poor people gather by hundreds around the building each year, when The Bear makes its annual visit, to see if a teacher has come, and every time are disappointed, and beg that one be sent next year.

GRATEFUL OBEDIENCE.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 3 James 1: 16-27 Golden Text, John 27: 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter

DISOBEDIENCE is departure from God; obedience is return to and subjection to God; and this can only be as we know, and receive, and bow to the Word of God. "Be not deceived, my beloved brethren," says the apostle James; "Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above and cometh down from the Father of lights with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven." Everything which is spiritually received is received by direct contact with God." "The things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God." But we received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God that we might know the things which are freely given to us by God." What is the priceless gift which cometh down from the Father of lights, which is given us from heaven, and which cannot be known but by the Spirit of God? In his last great prayer Jesus says of his own to his Father:

"I have Given them Thy Word."

It was the greatest gift he could bestow, it was "spirit" and "life." "Of his own will begat he us with or brought us forth by the Word of truth, that we might be a firstfruits of his creatures." Having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, through the Word of God, which liveth and abideth." Have we ever realized the inexpressible dignity of our being, our "new man" as being begotten and brought forth by the Word of God? Have we realized that just as surely as we have inherited from our earthly parents corruption and decay in our mortal nature, and all that we have of them has in it the elements of corruption;—just so surely, if we are born again of the incorruptible Word of God, we have in us, as that Word possesses us, elements of incorruption, eternal life, the power of an endless life? Do we see how unbecoming our position as so begotten of God it is to be occupied with things seen and temporal as final and powerful, rather than, as consistent with our heaven-born nature, things unseen and eternal? We live by the will of God: of his own will he begat us, and he tells us his wondrous, glorious purpose, to make us "firstfruits of his creatures." Just as Adam was a firstfruits of his first creation, so now he is seeking a firstfruits of his new creation; purchased from among men to be a firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb" (Rev. 15: 4), a people "in whose mouth is found no guile, who are without fault before the throne of God," who "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth."

Where shall he find such a people? He is seeking them and has been seeking them since he came to earth the first time, and their number is gradually being filled up. "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath, for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God."

Swift to Hear!

This does not accord with the pride of the to hear; ready to give out, slow to take in God must wait for us until we have learned to tent, meek and lowly in heart. And all taught." "Wherefore putting away all with meekness the engrafted Word which is able to save your soul." God would have us not only study his word, but give it authority over our lives. It is only real to us as we receive it, and we cannot receive it without obeying it. Just as far as it transforms us it glorifies God and convinces others that God is true. It is just impossible to understand a word of God's which we do not intend to put into practice. How many talk about the Lord's coming as a kind of theory or doctrine! The Daystar has not arisen in their hearts; his coming is no reality to them, or their whole life would take its color from this glorious expectation. Then how many discuss and try to understand divine healing! They cannot, unless they both yield up and trust their own bodies to the Lord. The most orthodox divines who write on justification can only mislead and puzzle others until they can testify: "I am justified, I have passed from death unto life." Let a drunkard who has been set free; let one who hast escaped the terrible power of some mastering sin by faith in Christ through his Word, explain that Word to others about the truth which makes us free. He has received the Word; it is his own, it has made him another man, he is a proof of its power. "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself." God puts a veil over his Word of truth so that profane eyes may not clearly see into it; and thus the wisdom of God "is to them that are perishing foolishness." Judged by man's standard, by his intellect, and his experience, it is foolishness, for it is it is not subject to the laws which govern him; it is a thing of eternity, and he is a creature of time as far as his consciousness goes, he being a natural unrenewed, unconverted man. Thus the apostle says: "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. In all the creation, God's Word has had room, manimate matter could not resist him, and his thought was carried out, bringing forth life, order, and beauty in the world. Where his Word finds no resistance, but intelligent and willing cooperation in his children, then God can bring about a new creation on quite another level, a reproduction of himself in his people—"the new man which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness;" "the new man, which is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him. "We all with unveiled face, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."
